heretofore, and all to defend and recouer their liberty. And yet for all that, they could neuer fo joyfully, nor more affuredly obtaine is, then they did even at that prefent, receiving the honorableft reward, and that which deferued greatest fame through the world: that by the valiantnesse of strangers who fought for the same (without any spilt bloud of their ownein comparison, or that they loft the life of any one man, whose death they had cause to lament) they were so restored to their ancient freedome and liberty. It is a very rarething amongst men, to find a man very valiant, and wife withall: but yet of all forts of valiant men; it is harder to find a iust man. For Agesilaus, Lysander, Nicias, Alcibiades, and all other the famous captaines of former times, had very good skill to leade an army, and to win the battell, as well by sea as by land: but to turne their victories to any honourable benefite, or true honour among men, they could neuer skill of it. And if you do except the battell against the barbarous people, in the plaine of MARATHON, the battel of SALAMINA, the lourny of PLAT ÆEs, the battel of THERMOPYLES, the battel Cimon fought about Cyprvs, and vpon the river of Eurymedon: all the other wars and battels of GRECE that were made, fell out against themselves, and did ever bring them into bondage; and all the tokens of triumph which euer were set up for the same, was to their shame and losse. So that in the end, GRECE was vtterly destroyed and ouerthrowne, and that chiefly through the wickednesse and selfe-will of her gouernors and captaines of the cities, one enuying anothers doing. Where a strange nation, the which (as it should seeme) had very small occasion to moue them to do it, (for that they had no great familiaritie with ancient GRECE, and through the counsell and good wisdome of the which, it should seeme very strange that GRECE could receiue any benefite) haue notwithstanding with dangerous battels and infinite troubles, delinered it from oppression and seruitude of violent Lords and tyrants. This and such like talke, did at that time occupie the GRECIANS heads: and moreover, the deedes following did answer and performe the words of the proclamation. For at one selfetime, Titus sent Lentulus into A- Quintin SIA, to fet the BARGILIANS at liberty, and Titillius into THRACIA, to remoue the garrifons out care to flat of the Iles and cities which Philip had kept there: and Publius Iulius was sent also into Asia, vnto liberty of king Antiochus, to speake unto him to set the GRECIANS at liberty which he kept in subjection. the Greek. And as for Titus, he went himselfe vnto the citie of Chalcide, where he tooke sea, and ans. went into the province of MAGNESIA, out of the which he tookeall the garrifons of the cities, and redelinered the government of the commonwealth vnto the citizens of the same. After- The feel of wards when time came that the feast of Nemea was celebrated in the citie of AR GOS in the ho- Nemea nour of Hercules, Titus was chosen judge and rector of the games that were plaid there; where, af- kpr at Arter he had set all things in very good order, pertaining vnto the solemnitie of the feast, he caused 2006. againe folemne proclamation to be made openly, for the general liberty of all GR BC B. Furthermore visiting the cities, he did stablish very good lawes, reformed instice, and did set the inhabitants & citizens of euery one of them in good peace, amitie and concord one with another; and dideall home also all those that were outlawes and banished men, & pacified all old quarrels and discentions among them. The which did no lesse please and content him, that by periwasions he could bring y GRECIANS to be reconciled one with the other, then if he had by force of armes ouercome the MACEDONIANS. In fomuch, as the recovery of the liberty which Titus had reflored vnto the GRECIANS, seemed vnto them the least part of the goodnesse they had received athis hands. They fay that Lycurgus the orator feeing the collectors of taxes, cary Zenocrates the Lycurgus Philosopher one day to prison, for lacke of payment of a certaine imposition, which the stran-theorator, gers inhabiting within the citic of ATHENS were to pay: he rescued him from them by force, restruct and moreouer profecuted law so hard against them, that he made them pay a fine for the iniurie they had done with so worthy a person. And showed the them had so the fine for the iniurie the philothey had done vnto fo worthy a person: And they tell, that the same Philosopher afterwards sopher, and meeting Lycurgus children in the city, said vnto them: I do well requite your fathers good turne fauedhim he did me: for I am the cause that he is praised and commended of enery man, for the kindnesse he shewed on my behalfe. So the good deedes of the ROMAINES, and of Titus Quintius Flaminius vnto the GRECIANS, did not only reape this benefite vnto them, in recompence that they were praifed and honoured of all the world: but they were cause also of increasing their dominions and Empire ouer all nations, and that the world afterwards had great affiance and trust inthem, and that most iustly. So that the people and cities did not onely receive the Captaines and Gouernours the ROMAINES fent them: but they also went to ROME vnto them, and procuredthem to come, and did put themselves into their hands. And not only the cities and communalties, but kings & princes also which were oppressed by other more mighty then themselves had no other refuge, but to put themselves vnder their protection: by reason whereof in a very fhort time (with the fauour and helpe of the gods, as I am perswaded) all the world came to sub. mit themselves to their obedience, & vnder the protection of their Empire. Titus also did glory more that he had reftored GRBCB againe vnto liberty; then in any other feruice or exploit he had ever done. For when he offered vp vnto the temple of Apollo in the city of DELPHES, the targets of filter with his owne shield, he made these verses to be grauen youn them, in effect as followeth:

> O noble twins Tyndarides, Dan Ioue his children deare, Throw out lowde shouts of ioy and mirth reioyce and make good cheere. O noble kings of Spartan soyle, which take delight to ride Your trampling steeds with fomy bit, and trappings by their side: Reioyce you now, for Titus he, the valiant Romaine Knight. Thefe gifts fo great to you bath got, even by his force and might: That having taken cleane away from off the Greekish neckes, The heavy roke of seructude, which heldshem thrall to checkes, Unto their former liberty he hath restorde them free, Which altogether perisht was, as men might plainely see.

He gauea crowne of massie gold vnto Apollo, vpon the which he made this inscription to be written:

> A valiant Romaine Knight, even Titus by his name, A captaine worthy by defert of high renowne and fame: To thee (Apollo god) this crowne of pure fine gold Hath given, thy godhead to adorne with iewels manifold: Therefore let it thee please (Apollo god of grace) With fauour to requite this love to him and to his race: That his renowned fame and vertue may be spred, And blazed through the world so wide, to shew what life he led.

So hath the city of Corinth enjoyed this good hap, that the Grecians have bene twice proclaimed to be set at liberty: the first time by Titus Quintius Flaminius, and the second time by Nero in our time, and at the felfe fame instant when they solemnely kept the feast called Ishmia. Howbeit the first proclamation of their liberty (as we have told you before) was done by the voice of an herald. & the fecond time it was done by Nero himself, who proclaimed it in an oration he made vnto the people in open affembly, in the market place of the city of Corint H. But it was a long time after. Furthermore, Tiens began then a goodly and iust warre against Nabis the curfed and wicked tyrant of LACEDEMON. Howbeit in the end he deceived the expectation of GRECE: for when he might have taken him, he would not do it, but made peace with him, forfaking poore Sparta, vnworthily oppreffed under the yoke of bondage: either because he was affraid that if the warre held on, there should come a successour vnto him from Rome, that should carry the glory away to end the same or else he stood icalous and enuious of the honour they did vito Philopamen: who having shewed himselfe in every place as excellent a captaine as cuer came in GRECE, and having done notable acts and famous service, both of great wisdome, and also of valiantnesse, and specially in the Achains warre; he was as much honoured and reuerenced of the Achaian's in the Theater and common affemblies, euen as Titus was. Whereat Titus was maruelloufly offended for he thought it vnreasonable that an Ar-CADIAN who had neuer bene Generall of an army but in small litle wars against his neighbors, should be as much esteemed and honoured as a Confull of Rome, that was come to make wars for the recourry of the liberty of GRECE. But Titus alledged reasonable excuse for his doings, faying, that he faw very well he could not deftroy this tyrant Nabis, without the great losseand mifery of the other Spartans. Furthermore of all the honours the Achaian's euer did him (which were very great)me thinkes there was none that came neare any recompence of hishonourable and well deferuing, but one only prefent they offered him, and which he about all the rest most esteemed: and this it was. During the second warres of Africk E, which the Ro-MAINES had against Hannibal, many Romaines were taken prisoners in fundry battels they loft, and being fold here and there, remained flaues in many countries: and among ft other, there were differ fed in GRECE to the number of twelve hundred, which from time to time did move men with spitcand compassion towards them that saw them in so miserable change and state Trelue of fortune. But then much more was their mifery to be pitied, when these captines found in the hundred Romaines army, some of them their sonnes, other their brethren, & the rest their fellowes and friends, free and conquerours, and themselves slaves and bondmen. It grieved Trus much to slaves. fee thefe poore menin fuch miferable captituitie, not with standing he would not take them by force from those that had them. Whereupon the Achains redeemed and bought them for fine hundred pence a man, and having gathered them together into a troupe, they prefented all The Addition the Romain captines vnto Titus, euch as he was ready to take ship to returne into Iral viwhich any redee present made him returne home with greater toy and contentation, having received for his noble deeds fo honourable a recompence, and worthy of himfelfe, that was follouing a man to his that were citizens and country. And furely, that onely was the ornament (in my opinion) that did most flater in beautifie his triumph. For these poore redeemed captines did that, which the slaves are wont to Greece. do on that day when they be fet at liberty: to wit they shaue their heads, and do weare little Thecete. hats vpon them. The Romaines that were thus redeemed, did in like maner: and so followed flutte man Titus chariot, on the day of his triumph and entry made into Rome in the triumphing maner. It remissed was a goodly fight also, to see the spoiles of the enemies, which were carried in the shew of this T Quintius triumph: as ftore of helmets after the Grecian s fashion, heapes of targets, shields, and pikes after the MACEDONIAN manner, with a wonderfull summe of gold and filter. For Itanus the Hiftoriographer writeth, that there was brought a maruellous great maffe of treafure in niggots of gold, of three thousand seuen hundred and thirteene pound weight; and of filter, of forty three thousand two hundred, threescore and ten pound weight; and of gold ready coyned in peeces called Philips, four eteene thousand, fine hundred & four teene, besides the thousand talents king Philip should pay for a ransome: the which summe, the Romaines afterwards forgaue him, chiefly at Titus fite and interceffion, who procured that grace for him, & caused him to be called a friend and confederate of the people of Rome, and his fon Demetrius to be fent vnto him againe, who remained before as an hostage of Rome. Shortly after king Antiochus went out of Manius Asia into Grece with a great fleet of ships, & a very puissant army, to stir vp the cities to forfake their league & alliance with the Romains, and make a differtion among them. To further this his defire and enterprife, the Atolians did aide and backe him, which of long time had Livutenant borne great and fecret malice against the Romains, and defired much to have had warres with fent anto them. So they taught king Intiochus to fay, that the war which he tooke in hand, was to fet the Grees. GRECIANS at liberty, wher of they had no neede, because they did already enjoy their liberty: but for that they had no just cause to make warre they taught him to cloke it the honestest way he could. Wherfore the Romaine's fearing greatly the rifing of the people, and the rumour of the power of this great king, they fent thither Manius Acilius their Generall, and Titus, one of his Lieutenants for the GRECIANS fakes. Which arrivall did more affure the that already bare goodwill to the ROMAINES, after they had once feene Manius and Titus: and the rest that began toflie out, and to shrinke from them, those Titus kept in obedience from starting, remembring them of the friendship and goodwill they had borne him, even like a good skilfull Phisitian that could give his patient. Phisieke to preserve him from a contagious ditease. Indeede there were fome(but few of them) that left him, which were won & corrupted before by the Atolians: and though he had just cause of offence towards them, yet he saued them after the battell. For king Antiochus being overcome in the country of THERMODYLES, fled his way, & in great haft tooke the sea to returne into As I A. And the Consul Manius following his victory, entred into Antioinus the country of the Arolians, where he took certaine townes by force, and left the other for a constitution prey vnto king Philip. So Philip king of MACEDON on the one fide, spoiled and sacked the Do- in Thermo-LOPLANS, the MAGNESIANS, the ATHAMIANS, & the APERANTINES: and the Confull Ma-Maninithe nius on the other fide, destroyed the city of Heracle a, and laid fiege to the city of Navpac- confull. TVM, which the ÆTOLIANS kept. But Titus taking compassion of them to see the poore people of GRECE thus spoiled and turned out of all went out of PELOPONNES VS (where he was then) vnto Manius Acilius campe, and there reproued him for fuffering king Philip to vsurpe the benefit and reward of his honourable victory, ftill conquering many people, kings and countries, whilest he continued siege before a city, and onely to wreake his anger vpon them. Afterwards, when they that were befreged faw Titus from their walls, they called him by his name, and held vp their hands vnto him, praying him he would take pitie vpon them'; but he gaue them neuer a word at that time, and turning his backe vnto them, he fell a weeping. Afterwards he spake with Manius, and appealing his anger, got him to grant the ÆTOLIANS truce for certaine dayes, in which time they might fend Ambassadors to Rome, to see if they could obtain grace & pardon of the Senate. But the most trouble and difficulty he had, was to intreat for the CHALCIDIANS. with whom the Confull Manius was more grieuoufly offended, then with all the rest because that king Antiochus after the wars was begun, had maried his wife in their citie, when he was paff yeares of mariage, and out of all due time. For he was now very old, and being in his extreme age, and in the middelt of his wars, he fel in dotage with a young gentlew oman, the daughter of Cleoptolemus, the fairest woman that was at that time in all GRECE. Therefore the CHALCIDI. AN s were much affected vnto king Antiochus, and did put their city into his hands, to serue him in this warre, for a strong and safe retiring place. Wherevpon, when Antiochus had lost thebartell, he came thither with all possible speed, and taking from thence with him his passing faire young Queene which he had maried, and his gold, his filuer and friends, he tooke the feas incontinently, and returned into As ra. For this cause the consult Manins having wonne the bartell, did march straight with his army towards the city of Chalcide in a great rage and furie. But Titus that followed him, did alwaies lye vpon him to pacific his anger, and did so much intreate him, together with the other Romaines of state and authoritie in councell: that in the end, he got him to pardon them of CHALCIDE also. Who because they were preserved from perill by his meanes, they to recompence this fact of his, did confecrate vnto him, all their most flately and fumptuous buildings and common works in their city, as appeareth yet by thefuperferiptions remaining to be feene at this day. As in the shew-place of exercises: the people of CHALCIDE did dedicate this shew-place of exercises, vnto Titus and Hercules. And in the temple called Delphinium; the people of CHALCIDE did confecrate this temple vnto Titus, and vnto Apollo. And furthermore, vinto this present time, there is a Priest chosen by the voice of the people, purposely to do sacrifice vnto Titus: in which sacrifice after that the thing sacrifised is offered vp, and wine powred vpon it, the people standing by, do sing a song of triumph made in praise of him. But because it were too long to write it all out, we have onely drawne in briefe the latter end of the same : and this it is:

The cleare unspotted faith of Romaines we adore, And vow to be their faithfull friends both now and enermore. Sing out you Muses nine to Ioues eternall fame : Sing out the honour due to Rome, and Titus worthy name. Sing out (I (ay) the praise of Titus and his faith : By whom you have preserved bene from ruine, dole and death.

Now the Chalcidians did not along honour and reverence Titus, but he was general rally honoured also by the GRECIANS as he deferued, and was maruellously beloued for his courtesse and good nature: which argueth plainely that they did not fainedly honour him, or through compulsion, but even from the heart. For though there was some iarre betwixt him and betwize Ti- Philopamen at the first about service, for emulation of honour, and after betwixt him and Diophanes also, both Generals of the Achaians, yetheneuer bare them any malice in his heart, net. ther did his anger moue him at any time to hurtthem any way, but he ever ended the heate of his words in counfell and affemblies, where he vttered his mind frankely to them both. Therefore none thought him euer a cruell man, or eager of reuenge: but many haue thought him rash, and hastie of nature. Otherwise, he was as good a companion in company as possible could be, and would vse as pleasant wise mirth as any man. As when he said to the Achaians, on a time, who would needs vniustly vsurpethe Ile of the Zazinthians, to diffwade them from it: My Lords of Achaia, if ye once go out of Peloponnesus, you put your sclues in danger, as y torteyfes do, when they thrust their heads out of their shelles. And the first time he parled with Philip to treate of peace: when Philip faid vnto him, you have brought many men with you, and I am come alone: Indeede it is true you are alone, said he, because you made all your friends and kin to be flaine. Another time, Dinocrates MESSINIAN being in ROME, after he hadtaken in his cups in a feast where he was, he disguised himselfe in womens apparell, and danced in that maner: and the next day following he went vnto Titus, to pray him to helpe him through with his fute, which was, to make the city of MESSINA to rebell, and leave the tribe of the ACHAIANS.

Tim made him answer; that he would thinke vpon it: but I can but wonder at you (faid he) how you can dance in womens apparel, & fing at a feast, having such matters of weight in your head. In the councel of the Achaias, king Antiochus Ambafladors being come thither, to moue the to breake their league with the ROMAINES, and make their alliance with the king their mafter, down do they made a maruellous large discourse of y great multitude of souldiers that were in their mafters army, and did number them by many divers names. Whereunto Titus answered, and told great army. how a friend of his having bidden him one night to supper, and having served so many dishes of little Quin. meat to his boord, as he was angry with him for bestowing so great cost vpon him, as wondring affirer to how he could so sodainly get so much store of meat, and or so divers kinds: my friend said to the the Ambast againe, that all was but porke dreffed fo many wayes, and with fo fundry favores. And cuen fo fadors transfer bragger. (quoth Tisus) my lords of ACHAIA, esteeme not king Antiochus army y more, to heare of so manymen of armes, numbred with their lances: and of such a number of footmen with their pikes: for they are all but Syrians, diucifly armed, only with ill fauored litle weapons. Furthermore, after Titus had done the fethings, & that the war with Antiochus, was ended, he was chofen Cenfor at Rome, with the fon of that same Marcellus, who had bene fine times Consul. This office is T. Quini. ofgreat dignitie, and as a man may fay, the crowne of all the honors that a citizen of Rost a can using in haue in their common wealth. They put offthe Senate, foure men onely, but they were not fa- Conformation mous. They received all into the number of citizens of Rome, that would present theselves to beenrolled in their common register: with a prouiso, that they were borne free by father & mother. They were compelled to do it, by Terentius Culeo, Tribune of the people, who to despite the Nobility perswaded the people of Rome to comand it so. Now at that time two of the noblest &most famous men of Rome were great enemies one against another: Publius Scipio African, Psapie, and Marcus Portins Cato. Of the letwo, Titus named Publius Scipio African, to be prince of the and st. Senate; as the chiefest & worthiest person in the city: and got the displeasure of the other, which was Cato, by this mishap. Titus had a brother called Lucius Quintius Plaminius, nothing at all like Secret him incondition: for he was so dissolutely & licentiously ginen to his pleasure, that he forgotal grudge becomlinesse and honesty. This Lucius loued well a yong boy, & caried him alwaies with him whe hewent to the wars; or to the charge and gouernment of any prouince. This boy flattering him, cate. oneday faid vnto Lucius Quintius, that he loued him fo well, that he did leave the fight of the fword-players at the sharpe, which were making ready to the fight, although he had neuer scene man killed before, to waite vpon him. Lucius being glad of the boyes words, answered him straight. Thou shalt lose nothing for that my boy, for I will by and by please thee as well. So he commanded a condemned man to be fetched out of prison, and withall called for the hangman, whohe willed to strike off his head in the midst of his supper, that the boy might see him killed. Valerius Antias the Historiographer writeth, that it was not for the loue of the boy, but of a woman which he loued. But Tetus Linius declareth, that in an oration which Cato himselfe made, it was written that it was one of the GAVLEs: who being a traitor to his countrymen, was come to Flaminius gate with his wife and children, and that Flaminius making him come into his hall, kilkdhim with his own hand, to please a boy he loued, that was desirous to see a man killed. Howbeit, it is very likely that Cato wrot in this fort, to aggravate the office, & to make it more cruell. For, many haue written it that it is true, and that he was no traitor, but an offender condemned todie: & among other, Cicero the grator doth recite it in a book he made of age, where he made itobe told vnto Catoes owne person. Howsocuer it was, Marcus Cato being chosen Censor, and cleanling the Senate of all vn worthy persons, he put off the same Lucius Quintius Flaminius, alcensor did though he had bin Confull: which difgrace did feeme to redound to his brother Titus Quintius put Lucius Flaminius also. Wherupon both the brethren came weeping with al humility before the people, Quintius and modes a partition that some description that some weeping with all humility before the people. and made a petition that seemed very reasonable and civill which was that they would comand off the St. Cato to come before the, to declare the cause openly why he had with such open shame defaced water. so noble a house as theirs was. Cate then without delay, or shrinking back, came with his copanio into the market place, where he asked Titus out aloud, if he knew nothing of the supper where sucha fact was comitted. Titus answered, he knew not ofit. Then Cato opened the whole matter as it was, and in the end of his tale, he bad Lucius Quintius sweare openly, if he would denie that he had faid was true. Lucius an swered not a word. Wherupon the people judged the shame was infly laid vpon him : and so to honour Case, they did accompany him from the pulpit for orations, home vnto his owne house. But Titus being much offended at the difgrace of his brother,

T. Quintins became enemy to Cato, and fell in with those that of long time had hated him. And so by practife he procured of the Senate, that all bargaines of leafes, & all deedes of fales made by Cato during his office, were called in, and made voide: and caused many suits also to be commenced against him. Wherein, I cannot fay he did wifely or civilly, to become mortall enemy to an honest man a good cirizen, & durifull in his office for his yeare, for an vnworthy kinfinan, who had iutly deferued the shame laid vpon him. Notwithstanding, shortly after when the people were assembled in the Theater to fee games played, & the Senators were fer according to their custome in the most honourable places: Lucius Flaminius came in also, who in lowly and humble manner. went to fit downe in the furthest seates of the Theater, without regard of his former honour which when the people faw, they tooke pity of him, and could not abide to fee him thus diffionoured. So they cried out to have him come and fit among the other Senators and Cofuls, who made him place, and received him accordingly. But to returne again to Titus. The naturallambition and conetous greedy mind he had of honour, was very well taken & effected, fo long as he had any occasion offered him to exercise it in the wars, which we have spoken of before. For after he had bene Confull, of his owne feeking he became a Colonell of a thousand footemen. not being called to it by any man. So when he began to stoupe for age, and that he hadginen ouer as a man at the last cast, to beare office any longer in the state: they faw plainly he was ambitious beyond measure, to suffer himselfe in old age to be ouercome with such youthfull violence, being far vnmeete for any of his yeares. For methinkes his ambition was the only cause that moved him to procure Hannibals death, which bred him much difliking & ill opinion with many. For, after Hannibal had fled out of his owne country, he went first vnto king Antiochus who, after he loft the battel in Phrygia, was glad the Romains granted him peace, with fuch conditions as themselues would. Wherfore Hannibal fled again from him, and after he had long wandered vp and down, at the length he came to the Realme of BITHYNIA, & remained there about king Prusias, the Romaines knowing it well enough: and because Hannibal was then an old broken man, of no force nor power, and one whom fortune had spurned at her seete, they made no more reckening of him. But Titus being fent Ambassadour by the Senate, vnto Prusas king of BITHYNIA, and finding Hannibal there, it grieved him to feehim alive. So that not withflanding Prusias maruellously intreated him, to take pitie vpon Hannibal a poore old man, & his friend who came to him for fuccour; yet he could not perfwade Titus to be content he should live. Hannibal long before had received answer of his death from an oracle to this effect:

Titus fant ambaff z. der voto Prusias king of Bithynia Hannibal deceined by angraele conserving bis death.

Midas and Themistoclas baifomed them-

Hannibals luft words.

The land of Labor, Shall couer under mould, The valiant corps of Hannibal, when he is dead and cold.

So Hannibal understood that of Libya, as if he should have died in Afrik E, and bene buried in CARTHAGE. There is a certain fandy country in BITHYNIA, neare to the feas fide, where there is a litle village aclled Librasa, and where Hannibal remained continually. He mistrusting king Prufits faintheart, and fearing the Romains malice also, had made feuen privile caues and vaults vaider ground long before, that he might fecretly go out at either of them which way he would, and every one of them came to the maine vault where himfelfe did lie, and could not be discerned outwardly. When it was told him that Titus had willed Prusias to deliver him into his hands, he fought then to faue himfelfe by those mines but he found that all the vents out, had watch and ward vpon them by the kings commandement. So then he determined to kil himfelf Now fome fay, that he wound a limin towell hard about his necke, and commanded one of his men he should fet his knee vpon his buttocke, and weighing hard vpon him, holding the towell fast, he should pull his necke backward with all the power and strength he could, and neuer leave pressing on him, til he had strägled him. Others say that he drank buls bloud, as Midas & Themiflocies had done before him. But Titus Livius writeth, that he had poison which he kept for such a purpose, and tempered it in a cup he held in his hands, & before he drank he spake these words: Come on, let vs deliner y Romains of this great care, fith my life is fo grieuous vnto them, that they thinke it too long to tary the naturall death of a poore old man, whom they hate so much: and yet Titus by this shal winne no honourable victory, nor worthy the memory of the ancient ROMAINES, who aductifed king Pyrrus their enemy, even when he had warres with them, and had won battels of them, that he should beware of poisoning which was intended towards for the flery him. And this was Hannibals end as we find it written. The newes wherof being come to Rome vnto the Senate, many of them thought Titus too violent and cruell, to have made Hannibal kill himfelf in that fort, when extremity of age had ouercome him already, and was as a bird left naked, her feathers falling from her for age and fo much the more, because there was no instant occasion offered him to vrge him to do it, but a couetous mind of honour, for that he would be chronicled to be the cause & Author of Hannibals death. And the in contrariwise they did much honour and commend the elemencie & noble mind of Scipio AFRICAN: who having overcome scipio d-Hannibal in battell, in Africk felfe, being then indeed to be feared, and had bene neuer ouer- fricans elecome before: yet he did not cause him to be driven out of his country, neither did aske him of the wended. CARTHAGINIANS, but both then, and before the battell, when he parled with him of peace, he tooke Hannibal courteously by the hand, and after the battell, in the conditions of peace he gaue them, he neuer spake word of hurt to Hannibals person, neither did he shew any cruelty to him in his mifery. And they tell how afterwards they met againe together in the city of Eph Bsvs, Talke beand asthey were walking, that Hannibal took the vpper hand of Scipio and that Scipio bare it pa- twist seitiently, and left not off walking for that, neither shewed any countenance of miss iking. And in entring into discourse of many matters, they descended in the end to talke of ancient Captains; and bal. Hamibal gave indgement, that Alexander the Great was the famousest Captaine, Pyrrus the se- Hannibals cond, & himfelf the third. Then Scipio smiling, gently asked him: What wouldest thou say then, of captains, if Ihad not ouercome thee: Truly, quoth Hannibal, I would not then put my selfe the third man, but the first, and about all the Captains that cucr were. So diverse greatly comending the goodlyfayings and deeds of Scipio, did maruelloufly miflike Titus, for that he had (as a man may fay) laidhis hands vpon the death of an other man. Other to the contrary againe faid, it was wel done ofhim, faying, that Hannibal fo long as he lined, was a fire to the Empire of the ROMAINES, which lacked but one to blow it:and that when he was in his best force and lusty age, it was not hishand nor body that troubled the Romains fo much, but his great wisdome, & skill he had in the wars, & the mortal hate he bare in his heart towards the Romains, which neither yeares, norage would diminish or take away. For mens naturall conditions do remaine still, but fortune doth not alwaies keepe in a state, but changeth still, and then quickneth vp our desires to set willingly vpon thosethat war against vs, because they hate vs in their hearts. The things which fell outafterwards, did greatly proue the reasons brought out for this purpose, indischarge of Titus. Aristonica For one Aristonicus, son of the daugher of a plaier vpon the citherne, vnder the fame and glorie of Eumenes, whose bastard he was, filled all As 1 A with war and rebellion, by reason the people rose in his fauour. Againe Mithridates, after so many losses he had received against Sylla & Fimbia, and after so many armies ouerthrowne by battell and wars, and after so many famous captaines lost and killed: did yet recouer againe, and came to be of power both by sea and land against Lucullus. Truly Hannibal was no lower brought then Caius Marius had bene: for he had a King to his friend that gaue him entertainement for him and his family, and made him Admiral Marius. of his ships, and General of his horsmen & footmen in the field. Marius also went vp and down AFRICKE a begging for his liuing, infomuch as his enemies at Rome laughed him to scorne: & some after notwithstanding they fell downe at his feete before him, when they saw they were whipped, murthered, and flaine within Rome by his commandement. Thus we see no man can sycertainly he is meane or great, by reason of the vncertainty of things to come: considering Tobemeane there is but one death, and change of better life. Some fay also, that Titus did not this act alone, or great in and of his owne authority, but that he was fent Ambassador with Lucius Scipio to no other end, nothing thus but to put Hannibal to death, by what meanes foeuer they could. Furthermore after this Ambassade, we do not find any notable thing written of Titus worthy of memory, neither in peace, nor in warres. For he died quietly of a naturall death at home in his

THE COMPARISON OF

Titus Quintius Flaminius with Philopæmen.

T Quintius benefits vnlo Grece.

T is time now we come to compare them together. Therefore as touching the great benefites that came to the GRECIANS, neither Philosamen, nor all the other former captains are to be compared with Titus. For all the ancient Captaines almost being GRECIANS, made warres with other GRECIANS: but Titus being a Romaine, and no Gre-CIAN. made warrs for the liberty of GRECE. When Philopæmen was not able to help his poore citizens distressed fore & vexed with wars, he failed away into CRETA. Titus having overcome Philip King of MACEDON in battell, did restore agains to liberty all the people and

cities of the same, which were kept before in bondage. And if any will narrowly examine the battels of either party, they shall find that Philopamen being Generall of the Achaians, made more GRECIANS to be flaine, then Titus did of the MACED ON IANS, fighting with them for the liberty of the GRECIANS. And for their imperfections, the one of the was ambitious, the other was as obstinate: the one was quicke & fodainly angred, the other was very hard to be pacified. Titus left King Philip his Realme and Crowne after he had ouercome him, and vsed great clemency towards the Atolians: where Philopamen for spite and malice, took townes & villages from his owne native country and city wherein he was borne, that had alwayes payed them tribute. Furthermore, Titus continued a found friend to them, to whom he had once professed friendship, and done pleasure vnto: and Philopamen in a geare and anger, was ready to take away that he had given, and to overthrow the pleasure and good turne he had shewed. For Philopamen when he had done the Laced DEMONIANS great pleasure, did afterwards raze the wals of their city, and spoiled and destroyed all their countrey; and lastly, ouer threw their whole gouernement. It seemeth also by reason of his immoderate choler, he was himselfe cause of his owne death, for that he made more hast then good speed, to go out of time to set ypon those of Masssina: and not as Titus, who did all his affaires with wifedome, and euer confidered what was best to be done: But if we look into the number of battels, and victories: The warre which Titus made against Philip was ended with two battels: whereas Philopamen in infinit battels in which he had the better, neuer left it doubtfull, but that his skill did cuer help him more to the victory, then the good fortune he had. Moreouer, Titus wan honour by meanes of the power of Rome, when it flourished most, and was in best prosperitie: Philopemen made himselfe, famous by his deedes, when GRECE began to stoupe and fall altogether. So that the deedes of the one, were common to all the Romaine s: and the deeds of the other, were private to himselfe alone. For Titus was Generall ouer good and valiant fouldiers, that were already trained to his hand: and Philopamen being chosen Generall, didtraine his men himselfe, and made them afterwards very expert and valiant, that were but meane and greene fouldiers before. And whereas Philopamen had continuall warres with the GRECIANS, it was not for any good fortune he had, but that it

TitmQainthen Philo

Quinting commanded good foul-Philopæ men made made a certain proofe of his valiantnesse. For where all other things are answerable to his, there we must judge that such as ouercome, have the most courage. Now Philosemen making warres with the most warlike nations of all GRECE, (as the CRETANS, & the LACED EMONIANS) did ouercome the subtillest of them, by finenesse and policie; and the most valiant by prowesse and hardinesse. But Terms ouercame, by putting that onely in practise, which was already found and flablished: as the discipline of warres, and order of battell, in the which his souldiers had long before bene trained. Whereas Philopamen brought into his country, both the one and the other, and altered all the order which before they were accustomed vnto. So that the chiefest point how to win a battell, was found out anew, and brought in by the one, into a place where it was neuer before: and onely employed by the other, which could very good skill to vieit, and had found it out already before. Againe, touching the valiant acts done in the person of themselues, many notable acts may be told of Philopemen, but none of Titus: but rather to the contrary. For there was one Archedamus an ATOLIAN, who flouting Titus one day, said in his reproch: that at a day of battel, when Philopamen ran with his fword in his hand, to that fide where he faw the MACE DONIANS fighting and making head against the enemy, Titus held vp his hands vnto hea- A Generall uen, and was busine at his prayers to the gods, not stirring one foote, when it was more time to must not be uen, and was butte at his prayers to the gous, not itirring one roote, when it was more time to handle the fword, and to fight of all hands. All the goodly deeds Titus ever did, were done alwayes as a Confull, or Lieutenant, or Magistrate: whereas Philopæmen shewed himselfe vnto Bould or the Acharan s, a man no lesse valiant and of execution, being out of office; then when he was supple his company to the Acharan s, a man no lesse valiant and of execution, being out of office; then when he was a Generall he did drive Nabiathe tyrant of values of the company o a Generall. For when he was a Generall, he did drive Nabisthe tyrant of ŷ Laced Amonians out of Messina, and deliuered the Messinians out of bondage; and being a privateman, he shut the gates of the city of Sparra, in the face of Diophanes (Generall of the Achaians) and of Titus Quintius Flaminius, and kept them both from coming in, and thereby faued the citie from facking. Thus being borneto command, he knew not onely how to command according to the law, but could command the law it felfe vpon necessity, and when the common wealth required it. For at fuch a time he would not tary while the Magistrates which should gouerne him, did giue him authority to command, but he tooke it of himselse, and vsed them when the time ferued: esteeming that he which knew better then they what was to be done, was moretruly their Generall, then he whom they had chosen. And therefore they do well, that do Quintino commend Titus acts, for his elemencie and courtesse vsed to the GRECIANS: but much more the elemente noble and valiant acts of Philopamen vntothe Romaines. For it is much easierto pleasure and to the Gregraisse the weake, then it is to hurt and resist the strong. Therefore sithence we have throughly philopormis examined & compared the one with the other, it is very hard to judge altogether the difference lowels the

that is between them. Peraduenture therefore the judgement would not feeme very ill, if we do giuethe GRECIAN for discipline of warre, the preheminence and praise of a good Captaine: and to the Romaine for iustice and clemencie, the name and dignitic of a most instand courteous gentleman.

The end of Titus Quintius Flaminius life

THE LIFE OF Pyrrus:

Tis written, that fince Noes floud, the first King of the THESPROTE ANS, and of the Molossians, was Phaeton, one of those who came with Pelasgus into the Realme of Epirvs. But some say otherwise, that Dencation, and his wife Pyrra remained there, after they had built and founded the temple of Dodone, in the country of the MOLOSSIANS. But how to over it was, a great while after that, Neoptolemus the fonne or Achilles, bringing thither a great number of people with him, conquered the country, and after him lefta fuccession of Kings, which were called after his name, the Pyrrides : because that fio his infan-cie he was furnamed Pyrrus, as much to fay, as red: and one of his legitimate fonnes whomhe had by Lanaffa, the daughter of Cleodes the sonne of Hillus, was also named by him Pyrrus. And this is the cause why achilles is honored as a god in Erravs, being called in their language, Afpetos, that is to fay, mighty, or very great. But from the first kings of that race vntill the time of Tharrytas, there is no memory nor mention made of them: nor of their power that raigned in the meane time, because they all became very barbarous, and vtterly voide of civility. Tyrritas was indeed the first that beautified the cities of his countrey with the GRECIAN tongue, brought in ciuilllawes and customes, and made his name famous to the posterity that followed, This Tharrytas left a sonne called Alcetas; of Alcetas came Arymbas, of Arymbas and Troiade his wife, came MEacides, who maried Phthia the daughter of Menon THESSALIAN, a famous man in the time of the warres, furnamed Lamian, and one that had farre greater authority then any other of the confederates, after Leosthenes. This Eacides had two daughters by his wife Phthia, to fay, Deidamea and Troiade, and one fonne called Pyrrus. In his time the Molos sians rebelled, draue him out of his kingdome, and put the crowne into the hands of the fons of Neoptolemus. Whereupon a'l the friends of Asacides that could be taken, were generally murthered and flaine outright. Androclides and Angelus in the meane time stole away Pyrrus, being but a sucking babe, (whom his enemies neuertheleffe eagerly fought for to have destroyed) and sled away with him as fast as possibly they might, with few feruants, his nurses and necessary women only to look to the child and give it fucke: by reason whereof their flight was much hindred, so as they could go no great iorneys, but that they might eafily be ouertake by the that followed. For which cause they pur the child into the hands of Androclion, Hippias, & Neander, three lufty yong men whom they trusted withhim, and commanded them to runne for life to a certaine city of MACEDON, called MEGARES, and they themselves in the meane time, partly by intreaty, and partly by Megares a. force made flay of those that followed them till night. So as with much ado having driven them on of Mabacke, they ran after them that carried the child Pyrius, whom they ouertooke at Sunne set. And now, weening they had bene fafe, and out of all danger, they found it cleane contrary. For when they came to the river vnder the towne walles of MEGARES, they faw it so rough and fwift, that it made them afraid to behold it: and when they gaged the forde, they found it vn-possible to wade through, it was so high risen & troubled with the fall of the raine, besides that the darknesse of the night made enery thing seeme searefull vnto them. So as they now that carried the child, thought it not good to venture the passage ouer of themselues alone, with the women that tended the child: but hearing certaine countriemen on the other fide, they prayed and befought them in the name of the gods, that they would helpethem to passe ouer the child, shewing Pyrrus vnto them afarre off. But the countrimen by reason of the roaring of the river understood them not. Thus they continued a long space, the one crying, the other listning, yet could they not understand one another, till at the last one of the company bethought himselfe to pill off a peece of the barke of an oke, and vpon that he wrote with the tongue of a buckle, the hard fortune and necessity of the child. Which hetied to a stone to give it weight, and so threw it ouer to the other fide of the river:other fay, that he did prick the barke through with the point of a dart which he cast ouer. The countriemen on the other side of the riner, having read what was written, and vnderstanding thereby the present danger the child was in: felled downe trees in all the haft they could possible, bound them together and so passed ouer the river. And it fortuned that the first man of them that passed ouer, and tooke the child, was called Actilles: the refidue of the countrimen passed ouer also, and tooke the other that came with the child, and conueyed them ouer as they came first to hand. And thus having escaped their hands, by easie iourneys they came at the length vnto Glaucias king of ILLYRIA, whom they found in his house sitting by his wife: and layd downe the child in the middeft of the floore before him. The king ting of the floore before him. hereupon staiced a long time without vttering any one word, weighing with himselfe what was best to be done : because of the feare he had of Cassander, a mortall enemie of Aacides. In the meane time, the child Pyrrus creeping of all foure, tooke hold of the kings gowne, and fcrawled vp by that, and so got vp on his feete against the kings knees. At the first, the king laughed to see the child: but after it pitied him againe, because the child seemed like an humble suter that came to feek sanctuary in his armes. Other say, that Pyrrus came not to Glaucias, but vnto y altar of the familiar gods, alongst the which he got vp on his feete, and embraced it with both his hands. Which Glaucias imagining to be done by gods providence, presently delivered the child to his wife, gave her the charge of him, and willed her to see him brought vp with his owne. Shortly after, his enemies fent to demand the child of him : and moreouer, Casander caused two hundred talents to be offered him, to deliuer y child Pyrress into his hands. Howbeit Glancias would neuer grant thereunto, but contrarily, when Pyrrus was come to twelue yeares old, he brought him into his countrey of Epires with anarmy, and stablished him king of the realme againe, Pyrrus had a great maiefly inhis countenance, but yet indeed more fearefull then friendly. He Prrus con. had also no teeth in his vpper iaw that stood distinctly one from another, but one whole bone through the bound between the state of th throughout his gumme, marked a litle at the top onely, with certaine rifes in the place where the teeth should be deuided. Men held opinion also, that he did healethem that were sicke of the spleene, by facrificing a white cock, & touching the place of the spleene on the left fide of them that were ficke, fof ly with his right foot, they lying on their backs: and there was not so poore that were nor simple a man that craued this remedy of him, but he gaue it him, and tooke the cocke he fa- ficke of the crificed, for reward of the remedy, which pleafed him very wel. They fay also, that the great toe filene. of his right foot had some secret vertue in it. For when he was dead, and that they burnt his body, all the rest being consumed to ashes, his great toe was whole, and had no hurt at all: but of The fire that, we will write more hereafter. Now, when he was scuenteene yeares of age, thinking himselfe fure inough of his kingdome, it chanced him to make a journey into IL EYRIA, where he rugress maried one of Glaucias daughters, with whome he had bene brought vp. But his backe was no fooner turned, but the Molossians rebelled againe against him, and draue out his friends and Pyron feruants, and destroyed all his goods, and yeelded themselues vnto his aduersary Reoptolemus, realments King Pyrrus having thus loft his kingdome, and feeing himselfe for saken on all sides, went to Demetrius (Antigonus sonne) that had maried his fister Deidamia, who in her yong age was affured absence.

metrius for helpe, and called in Pyrrus alfo to his aide. Demetrius being troubled with other mattaine lands also that were not belonging to the ancient crowne & reuentics of the kings of Ma-CEDON, but were added vnto it by force of armes, as Ambracia, Acarnania, and Amphilochia. All these, the yong king Alexander leaving vnto him, he tooke possession thereof, and put good gar-rifons into the fame in his owne name: and conquering the rest of MACEDON in the name of Alexander, put his brother Antipater to great distresse. In the meane time king Lysimachus lacking nogoodwill to help Antipater with his force, but being bussed in other matters, had not the mean to do it. Howbeit knowing very well that Pyrrus in acknowledging the great pleasures he had dred talents. Pyrrus opening the letters, knew straight that this was but a fetch & denice of Lyfimachus. For king Ptolomies common manner of greeting of him, which he vied at the beginning of his letters, was not in them observed: To my son Pyrrus, health. But in those counterfeit was,

King Ptolomie, vnto king Pyrrus health. Whereupon he presently pronounced Lysimachus for a naughty man: neuerthelesse, afterwards he made peace with Antipater, and they met together at aday appointed, to be sworne vpon the facrifices vnto the articles of peace. There were three bealts brought to be facrififed, a goate, a bull, and a ramme; of the which, the ramme fell downe dead of himself before he was touched, whereat all the standers by fell a laughing. But there was him, knowing well inough at his coming that Alexander had no more need of his aide, and that hedidit onely but to feare him. They had not bene many dayes together, but the one beganne to mistrust the other, and to spie all the waies they could to intrappe each other: but Demetrius embracing the first occasion offered, preuented Alexander, and slue him, being a yong man, and proclaimed himselfe king of Macedon in his roome. Now Demetrius had certaine quarrels before against Pyrrus, because he had ouerrun the country of THESSALIE: and furthermore, tweene them, and were to make division of one selfe kingdome: now I say began the matter and occasion of quarrell to grow the greater betweene them. Whereupon Demetrius went with his

to Alexander the sonne of Alexander the Great, and of Roxane, and was called his wife. But when all that race was brought to wicked end, Demetrius then maried her, being come to full & able age. And in that great battell which was striken neareto the city of HIPSVS, where all the kings fought together, Pyrrus being then but a yong man, and with Demetrius, put them all to flight that fought with him, and was worthily reputed for the valiantest prince amongst them all. Furthermore, when Demetrius was ouercome, and had loft the battell, Pyrrus neuer forfooke him, but faithfully did keepe for him the cities of GRECE, which he put into his hands. And afterwards when peace was concluded betwixt Demetrius and Ptolomie, Pyrrus was fent an hostage for Demetrius into the realme of Agypt: where he made Ptolomie know (both in hunting and in other exercises of his person) that he was very strong, hard, and able to endure any labour. Furthermore perceiuing that Berenice amongst all king Ptolomies wives, was best beloued and esteemed of her husband, both for her vertue and wisedome, he began to entertaine and honour her aboue all the rest. For he was a man that could tell how to humble himselfero-Pirrue be- wards the great (by whom he might win benefit) and knew also how to creepe into their credit: and in like maner was he a great scorner and despiser of such as were his inferiours. Moreouer, for that he was found maruellous honourable and of faire condition, he was preferred beforeal other yong princes, to be the husband of Antigona, the daughter of Queene Berenice, whom she had by Philip, before the was maried unto Ptolomie. From theneeforth growing through the alliance of that mariage, more and more in estimation and fauour by meanes of his wife Antigona: who shewed her selfe very vertuous and louing towards him; hee found meanes in the end, to get both men and money to return eagaine into the Realme of Erinvs, and to conquerit; for was he then very well received of the people, and the better, for the malice they bare to Neople. lemus, because he dealt both hardly and cruelly with them. That not with standing, Pyrrus fearing lest Neoptolemus would repaire vnto some of the other kings, to seeke aide against him, thought fored to his good to make peace with him. Whereupon it was agreed between them, that they should both rogether be kings of Epirvs. But in processe of time, some of their men secretly made strife againe betweene them, and fet them at defiance one with another: and the chiefest cause as it is faid, that angred Pyrrus most, grew vpon this: thekings of Epirvs had an ancient custome of great antiquity, after they had made folcome facrifice vnto Inpiter Martiali, in a certaine place in the province of Molosside (called Passaron) to take their oath, and to be fworners the Epirors, that they would reigne well and infly, according to the lawes and ordinances of the countrey: and to receive the subjects oathes interchangeably also, that they should defende and maintaine them in their kingdome, according to the lawes in like manner. This ceremony was done in the presence of both the kings, and they with their friends did both give and receive prefents each of other. At this meeting and folemnity, among other, one Gelon a most faithfull servant and affured friend vnto Neoptolemus, who besides great shewes of friendship and honour hee did vnto Pyrrus, gaue him two paire of draught oxen, which one Myrtilus a cup-bearer of Pyrrus being present, and seeing, did craue of his master. But Pyrrus denyed to giuethem vnto him, whereat Myrtilus was very angry. Gelon perceiuing that Myrtilus was angrie, prayed him to fup with him that night. Now some fay, he sought to abuse Myrtilus, because he was faire and young: and beganne to perswade him after supper to take part with Neoptolemus, and poyfon Fyrrus. Myrtilus made as though hee was willing to give care to this perswasion, and to be well pleased withall. But in the meane time, hee went and told his mafter of it, by whose commandement he made Alexicrates, Pyrrus chiefe cup-bearer, to talke with Gelon about this practife, as though hee had also given his consent to it, and was willing to bee partaker of the enterprise. This did Pyrrus to hauetwo witnesses, to proue the pretended poyloning of him. Thus Gelon being finely deceined, and Neoptolemus also with him, both imagining they had cunningly spunne the threed of their treason: Neoptolemus was so glad of it, that he could not keepe it himselfe, but told it to certaine of his friends. And on a time going to be merie with his fister, he could not keepe it in, but must be pratting of it to her, supposing no body had heard him but her selfe, because there was no living creature neare them, faving Phanarcta Samons wife, the Kings chiefe heardman of all his beafts, and yet she was layd upon a little bed by, and turned towards the wall: so that flie seemed as though she had slept. But having heard all their talke, and no body mistrusting ber: the next morning she went to Antigona King Pyrrus wife, and told her enery word what thing at that time: but having made facrifice vnto the gods, he bad Neoptolemus to supper to his house, wherehe slue him, being well informed before of the goodwill the chiefest men of the realme did beare him, who wished him to dispatch Neoptolemus, and not to content himself with a peece of Epiros only, but to follow his naturall inclination, being borne to great things: and for this cause, this suspitionalso falling out in the meane while, he preuented Neoptolemus and flue him first. And furthermore, remembring the pleasures he had received of Ptolomy and Berenuce, he named his first sonne by his wife Antigona, Ptolomie, and having built a city in the PRES-QVE, an Ile of Epirvs, did name it Berenicida. When he had done that, imagining great E-micida.

matters in his head, but more in his hope, hee first determined with himselfe how to winne that which lay nearest vnto him; and so tooke occasion by this meanes, first to set foot into the Empire of Macedon. The eldeft fonne of Cassander, called Antipater, put his owne mother Projans. Thessalonica to death, and draughis brother Alexander out of his owne country, who sentto De-ters, could not fo quickly go thither. And Pyrrus being arrived there, demanded for his charge Pyrrus fr fustained, the city of NYMPH ÆA, with all the sea coasts of MACEDON: and besides all that, cerreceived of Ptolomy, would deny him nothing: he determined to write counterfeit letters to him machine in Ptolomies name, and thereby inftantly to pray and require him to leaue off the warres begun eraft to greedy couetousnesses to have the more (which is a common vice with princes and noble men) made, that being so neare neighbours, the one stood in feare and mistrust of the other, and yet much more after the death of Deidamia. But now that they both occupied all Macedon be-with De-him: Pyrrus on the other fide marched on, till he came to the place where Pantauchus was. floutest man, and of the greatest experience in armes, of al the captaines and souldiers Demetrius had. Whereupon Pantauchus trusting in his strength and courage, aduanced himselfe forwards. and luftily challenged the combat of Pyrrus. Pyrrus on the other fide being inferiour to no king in valiantnesse, nor in desire to win honour, as he that would ascribe vnto himselfe the glory of Achilles, more for the inuitation of his valiancie, then for that he was descended of his bloud! passed through the midest of the battell vnto the first ranke, to buckle with Pantauchus. Thus they began to charge one another, first with their darts; and then coming nearer, fought with their fwords, not only artificially, but also with great force and furic : vntill such time as Pyrrus was hurt in one place, and he hurt Pantauchus in two; the one neare vnto his throte, and the other in his leg: fo as in the end Pyrrus made him turne his backe, and threw him to the ground. but neuertheleffe killed him not. For, fo foone as he was downe, his men took him vp, & caried him away. But the Epirors encouraged by the victory of their king, and the admiration of his valiantnes, stucke to it so lustily, that in the end they brake the battell of the MACEDONIAN footmen: and having put them to flight, followed them fo lively, that they flue a great number of them, and took five thousand prisoners. This ouerthrow did not so much fill the hearts of the MACEDONIANS with anger, for the lossethey had received, nor with the hate conceived against Pyrrus: as it wan Pyrrus great fame and honour, making his courage and valiantneffe to be wondered at of all such as were present at the battel that saw him fight, and how he layd about him. For they thought that they faw in his face the very life and agility of Alexander the great, and the right shadow as it were, shewing the force and furie of Alexander himselfe in that fight. And where other kings did but onely counterfeit Alexander the great in his purple garments, and in numbers of fouldiers and guards about their persons, and in a certaine fashion and bowing of their necks a litle, and in vttering their speech with an high voice: Pyrrus only was like vnto him, and followed him in his martial deeds and valiant acts. Furthermore, for his experience & skill in warlike discipline, the bookes he wrote himselfe thereof, do amply proue and make manifest, Furthermore, they report, that king Antigonus being asked, whom he thought to be the greatest Captaine: made answer, Pyrrus, so farre forth as he might live to be old, speaking onely of the captaines of his time. But Hannibal generally faid, Pyrrus was the greatest captaine of experience indexment and skill in wars of all other, scipiothe second, and himselfethe third: as we have written in the life of Scipio. So it feemeth that Pyrrus gaue his whole life and studie to the discipline of warres, as that which indeed was princely & meete for a king, making no reckoning of all other knowledge. And furthermore touching this matter, they report that he being at a feast one day, a question was asked him, whom he thought to be the best player of the flute, Python or Cephesius: whereunto he answered, that Polyperchon in his opinion was the best captaine, as if he would have faid, that was the only thing a prince should seeke for, and which he ought chiefly to learneand know. He was very gentle and familiar with his friends, casie to forgiue when any had offended him, and maruellous defirous to requite & acknowledge any courtefie or pleasure by him receiued. And that was the cause why he did very vnpatiently take the death of Aropus, not so much for his death (which he knew was a common thing to every living creature) as for that he was angry with himselfe he had deferred the time so long, that time it selfe had cut him off from all occasion and meanes to require the courtesies he had received of him. True it is, that mony lent may be repaied againe vnto the heires of the lender: but yet it grieueth an honest nature, when he cannot recompence the goodwill of the lender, of whom he hath received the good turne. Another time Pyrrus being in veity of Ambracia, there were certaine of his friends that gaue him counfell to put a naughty man out of the city, that did nothing but speake ill of him. But he answered: It is better (quoth he) to keepe him here still, speaking ill of vs but to a few, then driuing him away to make him speake ill of vs euery where. Certaine youths were brought before him on a time, who making merrietogether, drinking freely, were bold with the king to fpeake their pleasure of him in very vndutiful sort. So, Pyrrus asking them whether it was true they said so, or no: It is true, and it please your grace, said one of them, we said it indeed, and had not our wine failed vs, we had spoken a great deale more. The King laughed at it, and pardoned them. After the death of Antigona, he maried many wives to increase his power withall, and to get more friends. For he maried the daughter of Autoleon King of PEONIA, and Bircenna the daughter of Bardillis, King of ILLYRIA, and Lanassa the daughter of Agathocles, tyrantof Si-RACVEA, that brought him for her dower the Ile of CORPHVE, which her father had taken.

By Antigona his first wife, he had a son called Ptolomie: by Lanassa another called Alexander: and by Eircenna, another (the yongest of all) called Helenus: all which though they were martiall men by race and naturall inclination, yet were they brought vp by him in wars, and therein trained as it were euen from their cradle. They write, that one of his fonnes being but a boy, asked him one day to which of them he would leave his kingdome: Pyrrus answered the boy, To him that hath the sharpest sword. That was much like the tragicall curse wherewith Oedipus cursed his

Socruell, hat efull, and beaftly is the nature of ambition and defire of rule. But after this battell, Pyrms returned home againe to his countrey, full of honour and glory, his heart highly exalted, and his mind throughly contented. And as at his returne the EPIROTS his subjects called him called an an Eagle, he answered them: If I be an Eagle, it is through you that I am so, for your weapons Eagle. are the kings wings that raised me vp. Shortly after, being aduertised that Demetrius was fallen ficke, and in great danger of death, he fuddenly went into MACEDON, onely to inuade it, and to make prey thereof: howbeit he had indeed almost taken the whole realme, and made himself Maceton. Lord of all without stroke striken. For he came as far as the city of EDESSA, and found no refiftance:but rather to the contrary, many of the countrey willingly came to his campe, and fubmitted themselues. The danger Demetrius was in to lose his Realme, did moue him more, then the disease and sicknesse of his body. And on the other side, his friends, seruants, and Captaines, having gathered a great number of men of warre together in a maruellous short time, marched with great speed towards Pyrrus, being earnestly bent to do some exploite against him: who being come in to Macenon but to make a roade only vpon them, would not tarrie them, but fled, and flying, lost part of his men, because the MACEDONIANS followed him hard, and set vpon him by the way. But now, though they had driven Pyrrus thus casily out of MACEDON, Demetrius for all that did not make light account of him: but pretending greater things (asto recouer the lands and dominions of his father, with an army of an hundred thousand fighting army both men, and of fine hundred saile which he put to the sea) would not stand to make warres against by land or Pyrrus, neither yet leanethe MACEDONIANS (whilft he was absent) so dangerous a neighbour, and so ill to deale withall. But lacking leisure to make wars with Pyrrus, concluded a peace with him, to the end he might with the more liberty fet vpon the other kings. Thus now, the peace concluded betwixt Demetrius and Pyrrus, the other kings and princes began to find out Demevius intent, and why he had made fo great preparation; and being affraid thereof, wrote vnto Pyrus by their Ambassadours, that they wondered how he could let goe such oportunity and occasion, and totary till Demetrius might with better leisure make wars vpon him. And why he chose rather to tary and fight with him for the altars, temples, sepulchers of the Molossians, when he should be of greater power, and have no warres elsewhere to trouble him: then now that hee might easily drive him out of MACEDON, having so many things in hand, and being troubled as he was in other places. And confidering also that very lately he had taken one of his wines from him, with the city of Corphys. For Lanassa misliking, that Pyrrus loued his other wines better then her (they being of a barbarous nation) got her vnto Corphy E: and defiring to marie fome other king, fent for Demetrius, knowing that he of all other kings would foonest be won thereunto. Whereupon Demetrius went thither, and maried her, and left agarrison in Langfa hiscity of Corphy E. Now these other kings that did aduertise Pyrrus in this fort, themselucs Prime did trouble Demetrius in the meane while: who tracted time, and yet went on with his preparation notwithstanding. For on the one side Prolomy entred GRECE with a great army by sea, where he caused the cities to revolt against him; and Lysimachus on the other side also, entring into high Mace Don by the countrey of THRACIA, burnt and spoiled all as he went. Pyrrus also arming himselfewith them, went vnto the city of BERGEA, imagining (as afterwards it fell out) that Demetrius going against Lysimachus, would leaue all the low country of Macedon naked, without garrison or defence. And the selfe same night that Pyrrus departed, he imagined that Pyrrus king Alexander the Great did call him, and also that he went vnto him, and found him sicke in dreams his bed, of whom he had very good words and entertainement: in so much as he promised to helpe him throughly. And Pyrrus imagined also that he was so bold to demand of him againe: How(my Lord)can you helpe me, that ly fick in your bed: & that Alexander made answer: With Mm_3 my name only. And that moreouer he fuddenly therwithall got vp on his horse Nisea, and rode before Pyrrus to guide him the way. This vision he had in his dreame, which made him bold. and furthermore encouraged him to go on with his enterprise. By which occasion, marchine forward with all speed, in few dayes he ended his intended iourney to the city of Beroea. which suddenly he tooke at his first coming to it : the most part of his army hee layed in garrifon there, the residue he sent away vnder the conduct of his captaines, here & there, to conquer the cities thereabouts. Demetrius having intelligence hereof, and hearing also an ill rumour that ran in his campe amongst the Macedonians, durst not leade them any further, for searclest (when he should come neare to Lysimachus, being a Machon lanking by nation, and a prince esteemed for a famous captaine) they should shrinke from him, and take Lysimachus part: for this cause therefore he turned againe vpon the sudden against Pyrrus, as against a strange prince, & ilbeloued of the Macedonians. But when he came to encampe neare him, many coming from BEROEA into his campe, blew abroad the praises of Pyrrus, faying, that he was a noble prince. inuincible in wars, and one that curreoufly intreated all those he tooketo his party and amongst these, there were other that were no naturall Macedonians borne, but set on by Pyrrus, and fained themselves to be Macedonias, who gaucout, that now occasion was offered to set them at liberty, from Demetrius proud & stately rule, & to take king Pyrrus part, that was a curteous prince, and one that loued fouldiers and men of war. These words made the most part of Demetrius army very doubtfull, in so much as the Macedonians looked about, to see if they could find out Pyrrus to yeeld theselues vnto him. He had at that present lest off his head-peece. by meane whereof, perceiving he was not knowne, he put it on againe, and then they knew him afar off, by the fight of his goodly faire plume, and the goates hornes which he caried on the top of his creaft. Wherupon there came a great number of MACEDONIANS to his part, as vnto their fourraigne lord & king, & required the watchword of him. Other put garlands of oken boughs about their heads, because they say his men crowned after that fort. And some were so bold affo, as to go to Demetrius himfelfe, and tell him, that in their opinions he should do very well and wifely to giue place to fortune, and referre all vnto Pyrrus. Demetrius hereupon, seeing his campe in such vprore, was so amazed, that he knew not what way to take, but stole away secretly, difguised in a threed-bare cloke & a hood on his head to keep him from knowledge. Pyrrus foorthwith seazed vpon his campe, tooke all that he found, and was presently proclaimed in the field, king of Mac E DON. Lysimachus on the other side, came straight thither after him, and said that he had holpen to chase Demetrius out of his Realme, and therefore claimed halfethe kingdome with him. Wherefore, Pyrrus not trusting the Macedonians too farre as yet, but rather standing indoubt of their faith: granted Lysimachus his desire, and thereupon devided all the cities and provinces of the Realme of Macedon between them. This partition was profitable for them both at that present, and stood then to good purpose to pacific the warre, that otherwise Liftwarbus might suddenly haue risen betweene them. But shortly after, they found that this partition was no end of their enmity, but rather a beginning of quarrell and diffention betweene them. For they whose audrice & vnsatiable greedy appetite, neither the sea, the mountaines, nor the vnhabitable deserts could containe, nor yet the confines that separate Asia from Evrope determine: how should they be content with their owne, without vsurping others, when their frontiers ioyne so neare together, that nothing deuides them? Sure it is not possible. For to say truly, they are willingly together by the eares, having these two cursed things rooted in them: that they continually seeke occasion how to surprise each other, and either of them enuies his neighbours well doing. Howbeit in appearance they vse these two termes of peace and wars, as they do mony: vsing it as they thinke good, not according to right and instice, but for their private profit. And truly they are men of far greater honesty, that make open war, & auow it, then those that disguise & colour the delay of their wicked purpose, by the holy name of instice or friendship. Which Pyrrus did truly then verifie. For desiring to keepe Demetrius downe from rising another time, and that he should not reviue againe, as escaped from a long dangerous disease: he went to aide the GRECIANS against him, and was at ATHENS, where they suffered him to come into the castle, and to do sacrifice there vnto the goddesse Minerua. But coming out of the castle againe the same day, he told the A ... unians he was greatly beholding vnto them for their courteste, and the great trust they ha posed in him: wherefore to requite them againe, he gaue them counsell, neuer to suffer prince nor king from thenceforth to enter into their city, if they were wife, nor once open their gates vnto them, So after that he had made peace with Demetrius, who within short time being gone to make wars in As 1A, Pyrrus yet once againe (perfwaded thereunto by Lysimachus) caused all THESSALY to rise against him, and went himself to fet voon those garrisons which Demetrius had lest in the cities of GRECE, liking better to continue the Macedonians in war, then to leave them in peace: besides that, himselfe also was of fuch a nature, as could not long continue in peace. Dimetrius thus in the end being vtterly ouerthrowne in Syria, Lysimachus seeing himself free from feare on that side, and being at good Institution leifure, as having nothing to trouble him otherwaies went straight to make warre vpon Pyrrus, with Porwho then remained neare vnto the city of Edessa, & meeting by the way with the conuoy of rush victuals coming towards him, fet vpon the conducters, and rifled them wholly. By this meanes, first he distressed Pyrrus for want of victuals: then he corrupted the princes of Mace Don with letters and messengers, declaring vnto them, what shame they sustained to have made a stranger their king (whose ancestors had euer bin their vassals & subjects) and to have turned all those out of Macedon, that had bene familiar friends of king Alexander the Great. Many of the Mace-DONIAMS were won by these perswasions: which fact so feared Pyrrus, that he departed out of MACEDON with his men of warre, the EPIROTS, and other his confederates: and foloft Ma-CEDON by the selfe same meanes he wan it. Kings and princes therfore must not blame private men, though they change and alter fometime for their profit: for therein they do but follow the example of princes, who teach them al difloyaltie, treason, & infidelity, judging him most worthie of gaine, that least observeth instice and equity. So Pyrrus being come home againe to his kingdome of Epirvs, forfaking Macedon altogether, Fortune made him happy inough and indeed he had good meanes to live peaceably at home, without any trouble, if he could have contented himfelfe only with the four raignty over his own naturall fubicets. But thinking, that ifhe did neither hurt other, nor that other did hurt him, he could not tell how to spend his time, and by peace he should pine away for forrow, as Homer said of Achilles:

He languished and pin'd by taking ease and rest: And in the warres where tranell was he liked ever beft.

And thus feeking matter of new trouble, Fortune prefented him this occasion. About this time, the ROMAINES by chance made warre with the TARENTINES, who could nether beare their force, nor yet devise how to pacifie the same, by reason of the rashnesse, folly, and wickednesse oftheir gouernors, who perswaded them to make Pyrrus Generall, and to send for him forto tine has conduct these warres: because he was lesse troubled at that time, then any of the other kings a- ming war bout them, and was esteemed of every man also to be a noble souldier, and famous captaine. The wishbe Ro. elders and wife men of the city, vtterly misliked that counsell: but some of them were put to silence, through the noise and fury of the people, who cried for warres. Some other seeing them make king checked, and taken vp by the multitude in this maner, would no more repaire to their common thin Geaffemblies. Among the rest, there was one Meton, an honest worshipfull citizen, who when the norall. day was come that the people should conclude in coucel, the decree for the calling in of Pyrrus: Meton all the people of TARENTVM being affembled, and fer in the Theater, this Meton put an old feeling the withered garland of flewers vpon his head, and carying a torch in his hand as though he had bin foleswifely drunke, and having a woman minstrell before him playing on a pipe, went dancing in this good-the Taren. ly aray through the middest of the whole assembly. And there (as it happeneth commonly in times not enery hurly burly of people that will be maisters themselves, and where no good order is kept) to send for fome of them clapped their hands, other burst out in a laughter, and every man suffered him to Tarentum do what he lust: but they all cried out to the woman minstrell, to play and spare not, and to acity in Meton himselfe, that he should sing and come forward. So Meton made shew as though he prepa- Italia. red himself vnto it: and when they had given silence to heare him sing, he spake vnto them with aloudvoice in this maner: My Lords of TARENTVM, ye do wel fure, not to forbid them to play Metons and to be merry that are so disposed, whilest they may lawfully do it; and if ye be wise, every of the sares you alfo (as many as you be) wil take your liberty whilest you may enjoy it. For when king Pyr. tines. rus shall be in this city, you shall live I warrant you after another fort, & not as ye now do. These words of Meton moued many of the TARENTINES, and fuddenly there ran a rumor through all the affembly, that he had faid truly. But they that had offended the ROMAINES, fearing if peace were made, that they should be deliuered into their hands, they checked the people, asking them if they were such fooles, as would abide to be mocked & played withall to their teeth; and with those words al ranne voon Meton and draue him out of the Theater. The decree thus confirmed by voices of the people, they fent Ambassadors into Epirov s, to cary presents vnto king Pyrrus. not only from the TARENTINES, but from other GRECIANS also that dweltin ITALY, saying that they stood in need of a wise and skilfull captaine, that was reputed famous in martiall discipline. And as to the rest, for numbers of good souldiers, they had men inough in ITALY, and were able to bring an army into the field, of the Lycanians, the Messapians, the Sam-NITES, and TARENTINES, of twenty thousand horse, and three hundred thousand footmen being al affembled together. These words of the Ambassadors did not only lift vp Pyrrus heart. but made the Eptro Ts also maruellous desirous to go this journey. There was in King Pyrrac court one Cineas THESSALIAN, a man of great understanding, and that had bene Demossiblenes the orators scholer, who seemed to be the only man of all other in his time in common reputation, to be most cloquent, following the liucly image and shadow of Dimesthenes passing cloquence. This Cineas, Pyrrus ever entertained about him, and fent him Ambalfador to the people and cities thereabouts: where he verified Euripides words:

As much as trenchant blades, in mighty hand may do, So much can skill of eloquence, atchieue and conquer to.

And therfore Pyrrus would often fay that Cineas had won him more towns with his cloquence. then he himfelfe had done by the fword:for which he didgreatly honor & imploy him in al his chiefe affaires. Cineas perceiving that Pyrrus was maruelloufly bent to thefe wars of ITALY, finding him one day at leifure, difcourfed with him in this fortilitis reported, and it pleafe your maiefly, that the Romaines are very good men of war, and that they command many valiant and warlike nations: if it please the gods we do ouercome them, what benefit shal we have of that victory: Pyrrus answered him againe, Thou dost aske me a question that is manifest of it selfe for sion mind. When we have once overcome the Romaines, there can neither Grecian nor barbarous city in all the countrey withfland vs, but we shall straight conquer all the rest of ITALY with ease. whose greatnesse, wealth, and power, no man knoweth better then my selfe. Cineas pawsing a while, replied: And when we have taken ITALY, what shall we do then: Pyrrus not finding his meaning yet, said vnto him: Sicilia, as thou knowest, is hard joyning to it, and doth as it were offer it felfe vnto vs. and is a maruellous populous and rich land, and eafie to be taken; for all the cities within the Iland are one against another, having no head that governes them since Agatho. cles died, more then orators only that are their counfellors, who will foone be won. Indeed it is likely which your grace speaketh, quoth Gineas but when we have won Sicilia, will thenour wars take end. If the gods were pleased, said Pyrrus, that y victory were atchieued, the way were then broad open for vs to attaine great conquests. For who would not afterwards go into A-FRICKE and fo to CARTHAGE, which also will be an easie conquest, since Agathodes secretly Hying from Syracvsa, and having passed the seas with a few ships, had almost taken it: And that once conquered, it is most certaine there durst not one of all our enemies that now do daily vexe and trouble vs. lift up their heads or hands againft vs. No furely, faid Cineas: for it is a cleare case, that with so great a power we may easily recouer the realme of MACEDON againe, & commandall GRECE besides, without let of any. But when we have all in our hands, what shall we do in the end . Then Pyrrus laughing, told him againe: We will then (good Cineas) be quiet, and take our ease, and make feasts every day, & be as merry one with another as we can possible. Cineas having brought him to that point, said, againe to him: My Lord, what letteth vs now to be quiet, and merry together, fith we enjoy that prefently without further trauell & trouble, which we wil now go feeke for abroad, with fuch shedding of bloud, & so manifest danger and yet we know not whether euer we shall attaine vnto it, after we haue both suffered, and caused otherto fuffer infinite for rowes and trouble. The fe last words of Cineas, did rather offend Pyrrus, then make him to alter his mind: for he was not ignorant of the happy state he should thereby forgo, yet could he not leaue offthe hope of that he did so much desire. So he sent Cineas before vnto the Tarbutines, with three thousand footemen: and afterwards the Tarbutines having sent him great store of flat-bottomes, gallies, and of all sorts of passengers, he shipped into them twenty Elephants, three thousand horsemen, and two and twenty thousand footemen, with fine hundred bowmen and flings. All which thus ready, he weighed ankers, and hoifed fails, and was no fooner in the maine fea, but the North wind blew very roughly, out of feafon, and draue him to leeward. Notwithstanding, the ship which he was in himselfe, by great toile of the pilots and mariners turning to windward, and with much ado, and maruellous dangers recovered the coast of ITALY. Howbeit the rest of his fleete were violently dispersed here and there, whereof some of them failing in their course to Iral y were cast into the seas of Ly-RIA. and SICILIA. The other not able to recouer the point of Apvlia, were benighted, and the fea being high wrought, by violence cast them upon the shore, and against the rockes, and made shipwrackes of them, the Admirall onely reserved, which through her strength, and the greatnesse of her burthen, resisted the force of the sea that most violetly beate against her. But afterwards, the wind turning and coming from the land, the fea cruelly raging over the height of her forecastell, in fine brought her in manifest perill of opening, and splitting, and in danger to be driven from the coast, putting her out againe to the mercie of the winds, which changed enery howre. Wherefore Pyrrus casting the perill every way, thought best to leape into the sea. After him foorthwith leapt his guard, his feruants, & other his familiar friends, venturing their liues to faue him. But the darknesse of the night, and rage of the waves (which the shore breaking, forced fo to rebound back you them) with the great noise also, did so hinder their swimming, that it was even day before they could recover any land, and yet was it by meanes that the wind fell. As for Pyrrus, he was fo fea-beaten, and wearied with the waves, that he was able to do no more: though of himielfe he had fo great a heart and ftout a courage, as was able to ouercome any perill. Moreouer, the MESSAPIANS (ypon whose coast the storme had cast him) ran Pyrim cast outto helpe him, and diligently laboured in all they could possible to fauchim, and received also certaine of his ships that had scaped, in which were a few horsemen, about two thousand footemen, and two Elephants. With this small force, Pyrrus marched on his journey to goe by land vnto TARENTYM: and Cineas being advertised of his coming, went with his men to meete him. Now when he was come to Tare not was at the first he would do nothing by force, nor against the goodwill of the inhabitants: vntill such time as his ships that had escaped the dangers of the raof the fea, were all arrived, and the greatest part of his army come together againe. But when he rentine, rehad all his army he looked for, feeing that the people of TARENTYM could neither faue themfelues, nor be faued by any other, without ftraight order and compulfion, because they made voluptions their reckoning that Pyrrus should fight for them, and in the meane time they would not stirre out of their houses from bathing themselues, from banqueting, and making good cheere: first of all he caused all the parks and places of shew to be shurve, where they were wont to walke and disport the seluces in any kind of exercise, & as they walked to talke of wars as it were in pastime, and to fight with words, but not to come to the blows. And further he forbadal feastings, mummeries, and such other like pleasures, as at that time were out of season. He trained them out also to exercife their weapons, and shewed himself very seuere in musters, not pardoning any whose names were billed to ferue in the warres: infomuch as there were many (which vnacquainted with fuch rough handling & gouernment) for fooke the city altogether, calling it a bondage, not to haue liberty to liue at their pleasure. Furthermore, Pyrrus having intelligence that Levinus the Consullent ROMAINE Confull came against him with a great puissant army, and that he was already entred against into the land of LvcANIA, where he destroyed and spoiled all the countrey before him: albeit Pyrime. the TARENTINEs aide of their confederates, was not as yet come, he thought it a great shame to fuffer his enemies approach fo neare him, & therfore taking that final number he had, brought them into the field against Leuinus. Howbeit he sent an Herald before to the Romaines, to vnderstand of them, if (before they entred into this war) they could be cotent the controuersies they had with all the GRECIANS dwelling in ITALY, might be decided by inflice, and therein torefer themselves to his arbiterment, who of himself wold undertake the pacification of them. Whereunto the Confull Levinus made answer, that the Romain is would neuer allow him for a Judge, neither did they feare him for an enemy. Wherfore Pyrrus going on still, came to lodge in the plaine which is betweene the cities of Pandos 1A, and of Heraclea, and having newes Pyron brought him that the Romaine's were encamped very neare vnto him on the other side of the river of Siris, he tooke his horse, and rode to the rivers side to view their campe. So having between throughly considered the forme, the situation, and the order of the same, the maner of charging Pandosia and stera their watch, and all their fashions of doing the wondered much thereat. And speaking to Mega- cite. eles, one of his familiars about him, he faid: This order Megacles (quoth he) though it be of bar- struß. barous people, yet is it not barbaroufly done, but we shal shortly proue their force. After he had thus taken his view, he began to be more carefull then he was before, and purposed to tary till that they would not depose Leninus from his Consulship, notwithstanding the losse he had re-that the winning of the city of ROME was no eafie matter to compaffe or attaine, with that ftrength he prefently had; and also that it would be greatly to his glory, if he could bring uert the glorious fame and reputation of Rome. What is now become of all your great and co mighty bragges you blazed abroad through the whole world? That if Alexander the great himfelfe had come into ITALY, in the time that our fathers had bene in the flower of their age, and "

we in the prime of our youth, they would not have faid every wherethat he was altogether inuincible, as now at this present they do: but either he should have left his body slaine here in ce the wholeaide of their confederates were come together, leaving men at the rivers fide of Sz-RIS. to keepe the passage, if the enemies ventured to passe ouer, as they did indeed. For they made hast to preuent the aide that Pyrrus looked for, and passed their footmen ouer vpon a bridge, and their horsemen at diverse fords of the river; insomuch as the GRECIANS fearing lest they should be compassed in behind, drew backe. Pyrrus advertised thereof, and being a little troubled therewithall, commanded the Captaines of his footmen prefently to puttheir bands in battell ray. and not to stirre till they knew his pleasure: and he himself in the meane time marched on with three thousand horse in hope to find the Romaines by the river side, as yet out of order, and vtterly vnprouided. But when he faw afarre off a great number of footmen with their targets ranged in battell, on this fide the river, and their horsemen marching towards him in very good order: he caused his men to joyne close together, and himselfe first began the charge, being casie to be knowne from other, if it had bene no more but his passing rich glistering armour and furniture, and withall, for that his valiant deeds gave manifest proofe of his well deserving fame and renowne. For though he valiantly bestirred his hands and body both, repulsing them he encountered withall in fight, yet he forgat not himselfe, nor neglected the judgement and forefight, which should never be wanting in a Generall of an army: but as though he had not fought at all, quietly and differently gaue order for enery thing, riding to & fro, to defend and encourage his men in those places, where he saw them in most distresse. But even in the hottest of the battell, Leonatus Macedonian spied an Italian aman of armes, that followed Pyrrue vp and downe where he went, and euer kept in manner of euen hand with him, to fet vpon him. Wherfore he faid to Pyrrus: My Lord, do you not see that barbarous man there vpo a bay horse with white feete? Sure he looketh as though he meant to do some notable feate and mischiefe with his owne hands: for his eye is neuer off you, but waiteth only vpon you, being sharpe set to deale with your felfe and none other, and therefore take heed of him. Prirus answered him. It is impossible Leonatus, for a man to avoid his destiny: but neither he nor any other ITALIAN whatfoeuer, shall have any joy to deale with me. And as they were talking thus of the matter. the ITALIAN taking his speare in the middest, and setting spurs to his horse, charged your parrus, and ran his horfe through and through with the fame. Leonatus at the felfe fame inftant ferucd the ITALIAN's horse in the like maner, so as both their horses fell dead to the ground. Howbeit Pyrrus men that were about him, faued him presently, and flue the ITALIAN in the field, although he fought it outright valiantly. The ITALIAN's name was oplacus, borne in the city of FERENTYM, and was Captaine of a band of men of armes. This mischance made King Pyrrus looke the better to himfelfe afterwards, and feeing his horfemen gine back, fent prefently to haften his footemen forward, whom he straight set in order of battell: and delinering his armour and cloake to one of his familiars called Megaeles, and being hidden as it were in Megaeles armor, returned againe to the battel against the Romaines, who valiatly resisted him, so that the victory depended long in doubt: for it is faid, that both the one fide and the other did chase, and was chased, aboue seuen times in that conflict. The changing of the Kings armour served very well for the fafety of his own person, howbeit it was like to have marred all, and to have made him lofethe field. For many of his enemies fet you Megacles, that wore the kings armor; and for Pyrum, the party that flue him dead, and threw him starke to the ground, was one Dexius by name, who quickly snatched off his head-peece, took away his cloake, & ran to Leuinus the Consull, crying out aloud, that he had flaine Pyrrus, and withall flewed forth the spoiles he supposed to have taken from him. Which being caried about through all the bands, and openly shewed from had to hand, made the Romain es maruellous ioyfull, and the Grecians on the contrary, both afeard and right forrowfull: vntill fuch time as Pyrrus hearing of it, went and passed along all his bands bare headed, and bare faced, holding up his hand to his fouldiers, and giving them to vnderstand with his owne voice, that it was himselfe. The Elephants in the end were they indeed that wan the battell, and did most distresse the Romaines: for, their horses seeing them afarre off, were fore afraid, and durst not abide them, but caried their masters backe in despite of them. Pyrrus at the fight thereof, made his THESSALIAN horsemen to give charge vpon them whilest they were in this disorder, and that so lustily, as they made the Romaine's flie, and sustaine great slaughter. For Diony sius writeth, that there died few lesse, then sifteene thousand ROMAINES at that battell. But Hieronymus speaketh onely of seuen thousand. And of Pyrrus fide, Dionyfius writeth, there were flaine thirteene thousand. But Hieronymus saith, lesse then with the chiefest of the city, and offered presents to them and their wines, in the behalfe of the dor to king his master. Howbeit, neither man nor woman would receive any at his hands, but answeredall with one voice: That if the peace might be generall to all, they all prinatly would be at the The noble kings commandement, and would be glad of his friendship. Moreouer, when Gineas had talked Remants. in open audience before the Senate, of many courteous offers, and had deliucred them profitable capitulations of peace: they accepted none, nor shewed any affection to give eare vnto them, although he offered to deliuer them their prisoners homeagaine wi hout ransome, that had been etaken at the battell, and promifed also to aide them in the conquest of ITALIL, requiring no other recompence at their hands fauing their goodwils onely to his master, and affarance for the TARENTINES, that they should not be annoyed for any thing past, without demand of other matter. Neuertheleffe in the end, when they had heard these offers, many of the Senators yeekded, and were willing to make peace: alledging that they had already loft a great battel, and how they looked for a greater, when the force of the confederates of ITALIE, Applies hould io yne together with king Pyrrus power. But Appius Claudius, a famous man, who distributed differented the company of th came no more to the Senate, nor dealt in matters of state at all by reason of his age, and partly the Ro because he was blind, when he understood of king Pyrrus offers, and of the common bruite that maines from ranne through the city, how the Senate were in mind to agree to the capitulations of peace peace with propounded by Cineas, he could not abide, but caused his servants to carie him in his chaire vpon Pyriu. their armes vnto the Senate doore, his fonnes, and fonnes in law taking him in their armes, ca-them to peace after this valiant victory. And hereupon he fent cineas to Rome, who spake cineas fent ble and worthy personage: and he so soone as they had set him in his seate, began to speake Appins inthis fort: Hitherunto with great impatience (my Lords of Rome) have I borne the loffe Claudius of my fight, but now, I would I were also deafe as I am blind, that I might not (as I do) heare the senate. the report of your dishonourable consultations determined vpon in Senate, which tend to sub-

GRECIANS inhabiting in ITALY, but to flie from his enemies there about his own country of fering you to conquer al y rest of ITALY with an army, wherewith he was nothing able to keep a finall part of MACEDON only for himself. And therefore you must not perswade your selues. that in making peace with him, you shall thereby be rid of him; but rather shall you draw others to come and let vpon you besides. For they wil vtterly despise you, when they shal heare ye are fo eafily ouercome, and that you have suffered Pyrrus to escape your hands, before you made him feele the just reward of his bold presumptuous attempt vnto you: carrying with him for a further hire, this aduantage ouer you that he hath given a great occasion both to the SAMNITES. and TARENTINES, hereafter to mocke and deride you. After that Appins had told this tale you. to the Senate every one through the whole affembly defired rather war then peace. They difpatched Cineas away thereupon with this answer, that if Pyrrus sought the Romaines friend. Thip, he must first depart out of ITALY, and then send unto them to treate of peace; but so long as he remained there with his army, the ROMAINES would make war vpon him, with all the force and powerthey could make, yea although he had ouerthrowne and flaine ten thousand such captaines as Leuinus was. They fay that Cineas, during the time of his abode at Rome, intreating for their peace, did curioufly labour to confider & understand the maners, order, and life of the ROMAINES, and their commonweale, discoursing therof with the chiefest men of the city. and how afterwards he made ample report of the fame vnto Pyrrus: and told him among ft other The maielle things, that the Senate appeared to him, a Councell-house of many kings. And furthermore (for the number of people) that he feared greatly they should fight against such a serpent, as that mate of which was in old time in the marishes of LERNE, of which, when they had cut of one head, se. Rome. uen other came vp in the place; because the Consul Leninus had now leavied another army, twise as great as the first was, and had left at Rome also, many times as many good able men to carrie armour. After this, there were fent Ambassadors from Rome vnto Pyrrus, and amongst other, Caim Fa Caius Fabricius, touching the state of prisoners. Cineas told the king his master, that this Fabricius was one of the greatest men of account in Rome, a right honest man, a good captaine, and a Amba∬ador to Pyr. very valiant man of his hands, yet poore indeed he was not with flanding. Pyrrus taking him fecretly afide, made very much of him, and amongst other things, offered him both gold and sil-Caiss Fauer, praying him to take it, not for any dishonest respect he meant towards him, but onely for a brities a noblecap pledge of goodwill and friendship that should bee betweene them. Fabricius would none taine but of his gift; fo Pyrrus left him for that time. Notwithstanding the next morning thinking to very poore. feare him, because he had neuer seene Elephant before, Pyrrus commanded his men, that when Fabricius refused they faw Fabricius and him talking together, they should bring one of his greatest Elephants, king Pyrru gifts, and fet him hard by them, behind a hanging which being done, at a certaine figne by Pyrrus giuen, fuddenly the hanging was pulled backe, and the Elephant with his trunke was ouer Fabri. cius head, and gaue a terrible and fearefull crie. Fabricius foftly giuing backe, nothing afraid, laughed, and fayd to Pyrrus smiling: Neither did your gold (oh king) yesterday moueme, nor your Elephantto day feareme. Furthermore, whilest they were at supper, falling in talke of diverse matters, specially touching the state of GRECE, and the Philosophers there: Cinear by The opinio chance spake of Epicyrys, and rehearled the opinions of the Epicyrians touching the of the Epi gods and gouernment of the common wealth, how they placed mans chiefe felicity in pleasure, curians how they fled from all office and publike charge, as from a thing that hindereth the fruition of felicity. true felicity: how they maintained that the gods were immortall, neither moued with pity nor anger, and led an idle life full of al pleafures and delights, without taking any regard of mens doings. But as he ftill continued this difcourfe, Fabricius cryed out aloud, and fayd: The gods grant that Pyrrus and the SAMNITES were of fisch opinions, as long as they had warres against vs. Pyrrus maruelling much at the constancy and magnanimity of this man, was more and delinered him upon his faith onely, all the Romaine prisoners: to the end that if the Senate would not agree vnto peace, they might yet fee their friends, and keepe the feast of Saturne with them, and then to fend them backe againe vnto him. Which the Senate established by decree, ypon paine of death to all fuch as should not performe the same accordingly. Afterwards Fabricius was chosen Consul, and as he was in his campe, there came a man to him that brought hima letter from king Pyreus Physition, written with his owne hands: in which the Physition rully Pyreus offered to poyfon his mafter, so he would promise him agood reward, for ending the warres tion wri. without further danger. Fabricius detesting the wickednesse of the Physicion, and having made bricius, 9. Amylius his colleague and fellow Consull also to abhorre the same: wrote a letter vnto Pyr- and offereth rus, and bad him take heed, for there were that meant to poyfon him. The contents of his letter 10 poyfon were these: Caim Fabricius, and Quintus Amilius Confuls of Rome, vnto king Pyrrus greeting. You haue (ô king) made unfortunate choise, both of your friends and of your enemies, letter to as shall appeare vnto you by reading of this letter which one of yours hath written vnto vs: for advertifing you make wars with inft and honest men, and do your selfe trust altogether the wicked and vnfaithfull. Hercoftherfore we have thought good to advertise you, not in respect to pleasure you, but for feare left the misfortune of your death might make vs vniuftly to be accused: imagining that by treacherie or treason, we have sought to end this war, as though by valiant nesse we could not otherwise atchieue it. Pyrrus having read this letter, and proved the contents thereof true, executed the Physicion as he had deserved; and to require the advertisement of the Consuls, he fent Fabricius and the Romaines their prifoners, without paying of ranfome, and fent Cineasa- Pyrrus gainevnto them, to proue if he could obtaine peace. Howbeit the Romaines, because they Romaines would neither receive pleasure of their enemies, & least of alreward, for that they consented not their prisovnto so wicked a deed: did not onely refuse to take their prisoners of free gift, but they sent him againe fo many Samnites, and Tarentines. And furthermore, for peace and his friendship, they would give no eare to it, before the wars were ended, and that he had fent away his army againe by fea, into his kingdom of Erinvs. Wherfore Pyrrus feeing no remedy, but that he must Pyrrus needs fight another battel, after he had somewhat refreshed his army, drew towards the city of seems batter he fought the forced rimowish the P Ascvivm, where he fought the fecond time with the Romaines: and was brought into a the Remaruellous ill ground for horsemen, by a very swift running river, from whence came many brooks and deep marifhes, infomuch as his Elephants could have no space nor ground to joyne with the barrell of the forman have for the forman har of the fo with the battell of the footmen, by reason wherof there was a great nuber of men hurt & flaine on both fides. And in the end, the battell being fought out all day long, the darke night did seuer the but the next morning, Pyrrus to win the advantage to fight in the plain field, where he might premaile with the force of his Elephants, fent first certaine of his bands to seize vpon the naughty ground they had fought on the day before. And by this policy having brought the Romaine's into the plaine field, he thrust in amongst his Elephants, store of shot & slingmen, and then made his army march (being very well fer in order) with great fury against his enemies. They missing the other dayes turnings and places of retire, were now compelled to fight all on a front in the plaine field; and strining to breake into the battel of Pyrrus footmen before the Elephants came, they desperatly preased in upon their enemies pikes with their swords, not caring for their own persons what became of them, but only looked to kill & destroy their enemies. In the end notwithstanding, after the battell had holden out very long, the Romaines lost it, and they first began to breake and flie on that fide that Pyrrus was, by reason of the great force and fury of his the Rocharge, and much more through the violence of the Elephants: against which, the Romaines valianmesse nor courage could ought prenaile, but that they were driven to give the place (much like the rage of furging waves, or terrible trembling of the earth) rather then tary to be troden under feete, and ouerthrowne by them, whom they were not able to hurtagaine, but bee by them most gricuously martyred, & their troubles therby yet nothing eased. The chase was not long, because they fled but into their campe: and Hieronymus the historiographer writeth, that there died fix thousand men of the Romains, and of Pyrrus part about three thousand fine hundred and fine, as the kings owne Chronicles doe witnesse. Neuerthelesse, Dionysius makes no mention of two battels given neare vnto the city of Ascvivm, northat the Romaines were terragree certainely ouerthrowne: howbeit he affirmeth that there was one battell onely that continued not about vnto Sunne ser, and that they scarcely seuered also when night was come on, Pyrrus being battell. hurt on the arme with a speare, and his cariage robbed and spoyled by the Samnites besides.

whose words Pyrrus took not in ill part, neither was offended with them at al. as a tyrant would haue bene: but did himselfe report to his friends and familiars the noble mind he found in him, defirous a great deale to have peace with the Romain Es, then before. And privatly prayed Fabricius very earnestly, that he would treate for peace, whereby he might afterwards come & re-maine with him, faying that he would give him the chiefe place of honor about him, amongst all his friends. Whereumo Fabricius answered him softly: That were not good (oh king) for your felfe, quoth he: for your men that prefently do honour and esteeme you, by experience if they once knew me, would rather chuse me for their king, then your selfe. Such was Fabricius talke, doment into

And further that there died in this battell, aboue fifteene thousand men, as well of Pyrone side. as of the Romaines part: and that at the last, both the one and the other did retire. And some fay, that it was at that time Pyrrus answered one, who reioyced with him for the victory they had worne: If we win another of the price, quoth he, we are vtterly vndone. For indeed then had he lost the most part of his army he brought with him out of his realme, and all his friends and captaines in manner enery one, or at the least there lacked litle of it: and besides that, he had no meanes to supply them with other from thence, and perceived also that the confederates he had in ITAY, began to waxe cold. Where the ROMAINES to the contrary, did easily renew their army with fresh souldiers, which they caused to come from Rome as need required (much like vnto a linely ipring, the head whereof they had at home in their countrey) and they fainted not at all for any losses they received, but rather were they so much the more hotly bent, stoutly determining to abide out the warres, what ever betide. And thus whilest Pyrrus was troubled in this fort, new hopes and new enterprifes were offered vnto him, that made him doubtfull what to do. For even at a clap came Ambassadors to him out of Sicilia, offering to put into his hands, the cities of Syracvea, of Agricentum, and of the Leontines, befeeching him Provided to aide them to drive the CARTHAGINIANS out of the He, thereby to deliver them from all the tyrants. And on the other fide also, newes was brought him from GRECE, how Ptelomie fornamed the Lightning, was flaine, and all his army overthrowne in battel against the GAVLES, and that now he should come in good houre for the MACEDONIANS, who lacked but a king. Then he carried his hard fortune, that prefented him all at once, such fundrie occasions to doe great things: and as if both enterprifes had bene already in his hand, he made his account that of a ceffiry he must lote one of them. So, long debating the matter with himselfe, which of the two wars he should conclude upon in the end he resolved, that by the warres of Stellia, there was good meane to attaine to the greater matters, confidering that Africk was not far from them. Wherefore, disposing himselfe that way, he sent Cineas thither immediatly to make his way, and to feet ke to the townes and cities of the countrey, as he was wont to do: and in the meane time left a strong garrison in the city of TARENTYM, to keepe it at his denotion, wherewith the TARESTINES were very angry. For they made request vnto him, either to remaine in their country to maintaine wars with them against the Romaines (which was their meaning why they fent for him) or elfe if he would needs go, at the least wife to leave their city in as good flate as he found it. But he answered them againevery roughly that they should speake no more to him in it, and that they should not chuse but rary his occasion. And with this answer he tooke ship, and failed towards Stellin; where to foone as he was arrived, he found all that he hoped for, for the cities did willingly put themselues into his hands. And where necessity of battell was offered him to employ his army, nothing at the beginning could fraud before him. For, with thirtie thouland footmen, two thouland nue hundred horsemen, and two hundred sale which he brought with him, he draue the CARTHAGINIANS before him, and conquered all the country under their obedience. Now at that time, the city of Earx was the strongest place they had: and there were a great number of good fouldiers within to defend it. Pyrrus determined to proue the affault of it, and when his army was ready to give the charge, he armed himself avall peeces from top to toe, & approching the wals, vowed vnto Hercules to give him a folemne facrifice, with a feast of common playes, so that he would grant him graceto shew himselfevnto the Gordina inhabiting in Sicilia, worthy of the noble ancestours from whencehe came, and of the great good fortune he had in his hands. This vow ended, he straight made the trumpers found to the affault, and caused the barbarous people that were on the walles, to retire with force of his shot. Then when the scaling ladders were set vp, himselfe was the first that mounted on the wall, where he found diverse of the barbarous people that refisted him. But fome he threw ouer the walls on either fide of him, & with his fword flue many dead about him, himselfe not once hurt: for the barbarous people had not the heart to looke him in the face, his countenace was foterrible. And this doth proue that Homer spake wifely, and like a man of experience, when he faid: that valiantnesse onely amongst all other morall vertues, is that which hath sometimes certaine furious motions, and divine provocations, which makes a man besides, himselfe. So the city being taken, he honourably performed his vowed sacrifice to Hercules, and kepta feast of all kinds and forts of games & weapons. There dwelt a barbarous people at that time about Messina, called the Mamertines, who did much hurt to the Grecians thereabouts making many of them pay taxe and tribute: for they were a great number of them, and all men of warre and good fouldiers, and had their name also of Mars, because they were martiall meritians men, and given to armes. Pyrras led his army against them, and overthrew them in battell: and who lessly out their collectors to death, that did leavy and exact the taxe, & razed many of their fortresses. ud. And when the CARTHAGINIANS required peace and his friendship, offering him ships and money, pretending greater matters, he made them a short answer: That there was but one way to make peace and loue betweene them, to forfake Sieilia altogether, and to be contented to make Mare Libycum the border betwixt GRECE and them. For this good fortune, and the force he had in his hands, did fet him aloft, and further allured him to follow the hope that brought him into Sicilia, aspiring first of all vnto the conquest of Lybia. Now, to passe him over this ther he had ships inough, but he lacked owers and mariners : wherefore when he would presse them, then he began to deale roughly with the cities of Siellia, and in anger compelled, and sindia. feuerely punished them, that would not obey his commandement. This he did not at his first coming, but contrarily had won all their good wils, speaking more courteously to them then anv other did, and shewing that he trusted them altogether, and troubled them in nothing. But fodainely being altred from a popular prince, vnto a violet tyrant, he was not only thought cruelland rigorous, but that worst of all is, vnfaithfull and vngratefull: neuerthelesse, though they received great hurt by him, yet they suffered it, and granted him any needfull thing he did demand. But when they faw he began to mistrust Thenon and Sostratus, the two chiefe captaines of Syracysa, and they who first caused him to come into Sicilia, who also at his first ariuall delivered the city of Syracvsa into his hands, and had bene his chiefe aiders in helping him to compasse that he had done in Sicilia: when, I say, they saw he would no more carriethem with him, nor leave them behind him for the mistrust he had of them, and that Sostratus fled from him, and absented himselfe, fearing lest Pyrrus would doe him some mischiefe: and that Pyrrus moreover, had put Thenon to death, mistrusting that he would also have done him some harme, then all things fell out against Pyrrus: not one after another, nor by little and little, but altogether at one instant, and all the cities generally hated him to the death, and did againe some of them confederate with the CARTHAGINIANS, and others with the MAMERTINES, to fetyponhim. Butwhen all Sicilia was thus bent against him, he received letters from the Sam- The Sam NITES and TARENTINES, by which they advertised him, how they had much ado to defend nite and themselves within their civies and thouse halds, and then they had much ado to defend Tarentines themselues within their cities and strong holds, and that they were wholly driven out of the for for field: wherefore they earneftly befought him speedily to come to their aide. This newes came Pyrim to happily to him, to cloake this flying, that he might fay it was not for despaire of good successe in to Italie. Sicilia that he went his way: buttrue it was indeed, that when he faw he could no longer keepe it, then a ship could stand still among the waves, he sought some honest shadow to colour his departing. And that furely was the cause why he returned againe into ITALY. Neuerthelesse, Portu at his departure out of Sicile, they say that looking backe vponthe Ile, he said to those that resurre in to say the same being where said to find four a harrelly my friends do we leave to he P. were about him: O what a goodly field for a battell (my friends) do we leave to the Romaines of Siele. and CARTHAGINIANS, to fight the one with the other: And verily so it fell out shortly after, as he had spoken. But the barbarous people conspiring together against Pyrrus, the CARTHAGI-NIANS on the one fide watching his paffage, gaue him battell on the sea, in the very straight it felfe of MESSINA, where he lost many of his ships, and sled with the rest, and tooke the coast of ITALIE. And therethe MAMERTINES on the other fide, being gone thither before to the number of eighteene thousand fighting men, durst not present him battell in open field, but tarried for him in certaine straights of the mountaines, and in very hard places, and so set vpon his rereward, and disordered all his armie. They slue two of his Elephants, and cut off a great number of his rereward, so as he was compelled himselfe in person to come from his vanigard, to helpe them against the barbarous people, which were lustie valiant men, and old trained souldiers. And there Pyrrus caught a blow on his head with a fword, and was in great danger: infomuch as he was forced to retire out of the prease and fight; which did so much the more encourage his enemies: amongst which there was one more aduenturous then the rest, a goodly man assured. of personage, faire armed in white armour, who advancing himselfe farre before his company, cried out to the king with a bold fierce voice, and challenged him to fight with him if he were aline. Pyrrus being mad as it were with this brauerie, turned againe with his guard, in spite of his men, hurt as he was. And befides that, he was all on a fire with choler, and his face all bloudic

and terrible to behold, he went through his men, & came at the length to this barbarous villaine that had challenged him: and gaue him such a blow on his head with all his force & power, that freed close what by the strength of his arme, and through the goodnesse of the temper and mettall of the fword, the blow claue his head right in the middeft, downe to the shoulders: so that his head bebead in the middle, es ing thus deuided, the one part fel on the one shoulder, and the other part on the other. This marter suddenly staied the barbarous people, and kept them from going any further, they were so afraid and amazed, to fee fo great ablow with ones hand, and it made them thinke indeede that Pyrrus was more then a man. After that, they let him go, and troubled him no more. Pyrrus holding on his journey, arrived at the length in the city of TARENTYM; with twentie thousand footmen, and three thousand horse. And with these (ioyning thereto the choisest men of the TARENTINES) he went incontinently into the field to feeke out the ROMAINES, who had their campe within their territories of the Samnites, which were then in very hard state: for their hearts were killed, because that in many bastels and encounters with the ROMAINES, they were ener onerthrowne. They were very angry besides with Pyrrus, for that he had forsaken them, to go his voyage into Sicilia, by reason whereof there came no great number of souldiers into his campe. But not with standing, he deuided all his strength into two parts, wheroshe fent the one part into Lycania, to occupie one of the Romaine Confuls that was there. to the end he should not come to aide his companion : and with the other part he went himfelfe against Manius Carius, who lay in a very strange place of advantage, neare to the city of Carias Con. BENEVENTO, attending the aide that should come to him out of LVCANIA, besides also that the Soothfayers (by the fignes and tokens of the birds and facrifices) did counsell him nor to firre from thence. Pyrrus to the contrary, defiring to fight with Manius before his aide came vnto him, which he looked for out of Ly CANTA, tooke with him the best fouldiers he had in all his army and the warlikest Elephants, and marched away in the night, supposing to steale vpon Manius on the fudden, and give an affault vnto his campe. Now Pyrrus having a long way togo. and through a wooddy countrey, his lights and torches failed him, by reason whereof many of his fouldiers lost their way, and they lost a great deale of time also, before they could again be gathered together: fo as in this space the night was spent, and the day once broken, the enemies perceived plainely how he came downe the hils. This at the first fight made them muse awhile. and put them in a litle feare; neuerthelesse Manus having had the fignes of the sacrifices fauourable, and feeing that occasion did presse him to it, went out into the field, and set vponthe voward of his enemics, and made them turne their backes. The which feared all the rest in such wife, that there were flaine a great number of them in the field, and certaine Elephants also taken. This victory made Manius Carius leave his strength and come into the plaine field, where he set his men in battell ray, and ouerthrew his enemies by plaine force on the one side: but on the other he was repulfed by violence of the Elephants, and compelled to draw backe into his owne campe, wherein he had left a great number of men to guard it. So whenhe faw them you the rampiers of his campe all armed, ready to fight, he called them out, and they coming fresh out of the places of advantage, to charge vpon the Elephants, compelled them in a very short time to turne their backes, and flie through their own men, whom they put to great trouble and diforder: so as in the end, the whole victory fell vpon the Romaines side, and confequently by meanes of that victory, followed the greatnesse and power of their Empire. For the ROMAINE's being growne more couragious by this battell, and having increased their force and wonne the reputation of men vnconquerable, immediatly after conqueredall I-TALIE besides, and soone after that, all Sicilia. To this end (as you see) came king Pyrrus vaine hope he had to conquer ITALIE and SICILIA, after he had spent fixe yeares continually in warres, during which time his good fortune decayed, and his army confumed. Notwithstanding, his noble courage remained alwaies inuincible, what loffes focuer he had fuftained: and moreouer whilest he lined, he was cuer esteemed the chiefest of all the kings and princes in his time, as well for his experience and fufficiency in warres, as also for his valiantnesse and hardinesse of his person. But what he wanne by famous deeds, he lost by vaine hopes: desiring so carneftly that which he had not, as he forgot to keepe that which he had. Wherefore Antigonus compared him vnto a dice-player, that cafteth well, and cannot vse his lucke. Now having war to entertainethole fouldiers, and keepe them together. Wherefore vpon a new aide of certaine GAVLES being come vnto him, he entred into the realme of MACEDON (Which Antigonus. Demetrius fonne held at that time) with intent onely to make a forrey, and to get fome spoile in the country. But when he faw that he had taken diverse holds, and moreover, that two thoufand men of warre of the country came and yeelded themselves vnto him, he began to hope of better successe, then at the first he looked for. For vpon that hope he marched against king Antioenns selfe, whom he met in a very straight valley, and at his first comming, gaue such a lustic tigenus felte, whom he met in a very itraight valley, and at his first comming, gaucioch a fuste charge vpon his rereward, that he put all Antigonus army in great diforder. For Antigonus had placed the GAVIEs in the rereward of his army to close it in, which were a conuenient number, and did valuantly defend the first charge: and the skirmish was so hot, that the most of them were flaine. After them the leaders of the Elephants perceiuing they were enuironed on energy fide, yeelded them felues and their beafts. Pyrrus feeing his power to be now increased, with fuch asupply, trusting more to his good fortune, then any good reason might moue him; thrust further into the battel of the Macebonians, who were all afraid, and troubled for the ouerthrow of their rereward, to as they could not once base their pikes, nor fight against him. He for his part holding vp his hand, and calling the captaines of the bands by their names, straightwaies made all the footmen of Antigonus turne wholly to his fide: who flying faued himfelf with a few horsemen, & kept certaine of the cities in his realme vpon the fea coaft. But Pyrrus in all his prosperity king Pyrindging nothing more to redound to his honor and glory, then the ouerthrow of the GAVLES, THE layed afide their good lieft and richeft spoiles, and offered up the same in the temple of Minerua Itonida, with this inscription:

PYRRVS.

When Pyrrus had subdu'd, the puissant Gaules in fields, He caused of their spoiles to make, these targets, armes and shields: The which he hanged up, in temple all on high. Before Minerua (goddeffe bere) in figne of victorie: When he had ouercome, the whole and hugie houft, Thewhich Antigonus did bring, into his countries coaft. Ne maruell should it seeme, though victorie he wonne, Since valiantnesse brings victorie, and euermore hath done: And valiantnesse alwaies, bath constantly kept place,

From age to age, and time to time, in A was his race. Immediatly after this battell, all the cities of the realme of MACEDON yeelded vnto him: but when he had the city of AGEs in his power, he vsed the inhabitants thereof very hardly, & specially because he left a great garrison of the GAVLEs there, which he had in pay. This nation is extreme couetous, as then they shewed themselues: for they spared not to breake up the tombes wherein the kings of Macedon lay buried, and tooke away all the gold and filuer they could Treesure. find: and afterwards with great infolency cast out their bones into the open wind. Pyrrus was tournesse of toldir but he lightly possed in ordinary and modern real prince of in with the local transfer of the Gaulein toldit, but he lightly paffed it ouer, and made no reckoning of it: either because he deferred it till another time, by reason of the wars he had then in hand; or else for that he durst not meddle with punishing of these barbarous people at that time. But whatsoever the matter was the Ma-CEDONIANS were very angry with Pyrrus, and blamed him greatly for it. Furthermore, hauing not yet made all things fure in MACEDON, not being fully possest of the same: new toyes and hopes came in his head, and (mocking Antigonus) faid he was a mad man to go apparelled in purple like a king, when a poore cloake might become him like a private man. Now, Cleary mus king of Sparta being come to procure him to bring his army into the countrie of LACED #-MON, Pyrrus was very willing to it. This Clienymus was of the bloud royall of Sparta, but because he was a cruell man, and would do all things by authority, they loued him not at Sparta, nor trufted him at all:and therefore did they put him out, & made Arens king, a very quiet man. Aren made And this was the oldest quarrell Cleonymus had against the commonwealth of Sparta, but be- king of fides that, he had another private quarrell, which grew vpon this cause. In his old yeares, Cleanymus had maried a faire yong lady called chelidonida, which was also of the bloud royall, and the daughter of Leotychides. This lady being fallen extremely in loue with Acrotatus, king Areus dans. fonne, a goodly young gentleman, and in his luftic youth, flie greatly vexed and diffionoured her husband Cleonymus, who was ouer head and eares in loue and iealousie with her: for there was not one in all Sparta, but plainely knew that his wife made none account of him.

And thus his home forewes, being loyned with his outward common griefes, even for spite, defiring a reuenge, in choler he went to procure Pyrrus to come vnto Sparta, to restore him a. gaine to his kingdome. Hereupon he brought him into LACED EMONIA forthwith, with fine and twenty thousand footmen, two thousand horse, and foure and twenty Elephants: by which preparation, though by nothing else, the world might plainely see, that Pyrrus came with a mind not to restore Cleanymus againe vnto SPARTA, but of intent to conquer for himselfe (ifhe could) all the country of PELOPONNESVS. For in words he denyed it to the LACED EMONI-ANS themselves, who sent Ambassadors vnto him, when he was in the city of MEGALIPOLIS. where he told them that he was come into Peloponnesus, to fet the townes and cities at liberty which Antigonus kept in bondage: & that his true intent and meaning was to fend his vono fonnes into Sparta (so they would be contented) to the end they might be trained after the LACONIAN manner, and from their youth have this advantage above all other kings, to have bene well brought vp. But faining these things, and abusing those that came to meete him on his way, they tooke no heed of him, till he came within the coast of LACONIA, into the which he was no fooner entred, but he began to wast and spoile the whole country, And when the Ambas. fadors of Sparta reproued and found fault with him, for that he made warres vpon them in fuch fort, before he had openly proclaimed it: he made them answer, No more haue you your selues vsed to proclaime that, which you purposed to do to others. Then one of the Ambassa. dors called Mandricidas, replied againe vnto him in y LACONIAN tongue: If thou be a god, thou wilt do vs no hurt, because we have not offended thee : and if thou be a man, thou shalt meete with another that shall be better then thy selfe. Then he marched directly to Sparta, where Cleonymus gaue him counfell euen at the first, to affault it. But he would not so do, fearing (as they faid) that if he did it by night, his fouldiers would facke the city; and faid it should be time inough to affault it the next day at broad day light, because there were but few men within the towne, and beside they were very ill prouided. And furthermore, king Areus himselfe was not there, but gone into CRBTA to aide the GORTINIANS, who had warres in his owne countrev. And doubtleffe, that only was the fauing of Sparta from taking, that they made no reckoning to affault it hotly: because they thought it was notable to make resistance. For Pyrrus camped before the town, throughly perswaded with himself, that he should find none to fight with him: & Cleanymus friends & feruants also did prepare his lodging there, as if Pyrrus should have come to supper to him, & lodged with him. When night was come the LACED EMONIANS coulelled together, and fecretly determined to fend away their wives, and little children into CRETA. But the women themselves were against it, and there was one among them called Archidamia, who went into the Senate house with a sword in her hand, to speake vnto them in the name of all the rest, and said: That they did their wives great wrong, if they thought them so faint-hearted as to liue after Sparta were destroyed. Afterwards it was agreed in counsel, that they should cast a trench beforethe enemies campe, and that at both ends of the same they should burie carts in the ground vnto the middest of the wheeles, to the end that being fast set in the ground, they should stay the Elephants, and keepe them from passing further. And when they began to go in hand withall, there came wives and maides vnto them, some of them their clothes girt vp round about them, and others all in their smockes, to worke at his trench with the old men, aduling the young men that should fight the next morning, to rest themselues in the meane while. So the women tooke the third part of the trench to taske, which was fixe cubits broad, fourecubits deepe, and eight hundred foot long, as Philarchus faith, or litle lesse as Hieronymus writeth. Then when the breake of day appeared, and enemies removed to come to the affault: the women themselues setched the weapons which they put into the young mens hands, and deliuered them the taske of the trench ready made, which they before had vndertaken, praying them valiantly to keepe and defend it, telling them withall, how great a pleasure it is to ouercome the enemics, fighting in view and fight of their native country, and what great felicity and honourit is to die in the armes of his mother and wife, after he hath fought valiantly like an honest man, and worthy of the magnanimity of Sparta. But Chelidenida being gone aside, had tied a halter with a riding knot about her necke, ready to strangle and hang her selfe, rather then to fall into the hands of Cleonymus, if by chance the city should come to be taken. Now Pyrrus marched in person with his battell of footmen, against the front of the Spartans, who being a great number also, did tarie his comming on the other side of the trench : the which, besides that it was very ill to passe ouer, did let the souldiers to fight steadily in order of battell, because the earth being newly cast vp, did yeeld under their feete. Wherefore, Ptolomy king Pyrrus fon, paffing all along the trench fide with two thousand GAVLES, and all the choise men of the CHAONIANS, affaied if he could get ouer to y other fide at one of the ends of the trench where the carts were: which being fet very deepe into the ground, and one joyned vnto another, they did not only hinder the affailants, but the defendants also. How beit in the end, the GAVLES began to pluck off the wheeles of these carts, & to draw them into § river. But Acrotatus king Areus fonne, a young man, feeing the danger, ranthrough the city with a troupe of three hundred lusty youths besides, and went to inclose Ptolomy behind, before he espied him, for that he pasfed a fecret hollow way till he came euen to give the charge vpon them; whereby they were enforced to turne their faces towards him, one running in anothers necke, and fo in great diforder were thrust into the trenches, and under the carts; insomuch as at the last, with much ado, and great bloudshed, Acrotatus and his company draue them backe, and repulsed them. Now the women & old men, that were on the other fide of the trench, faw plainly before their face, how valiantly Acrotatus had repulsed the GAVLES. Wherfore after Acrotatus had done this exploite, Acrotatus he returned against hrough the city vnto the place from whence he came, all on a goare-bloud: rationing. couragious and lively, for the victory he came newly from. The women of Sparta thought Acrotatus farremore nobleand fairer to behold, then cuer he was: so that they all thought Chelidonida happy to haue such a friend and louer. And there were certaine old men, that followed him crying after him, Go thy way, Acrotatus & enioy thy loue Chelidonida, beget noble children ofher vnto Sparta. The fight was cruel on that fide where Pyrrus was, and many of the Spar-TAN'S foughtvery valiantly. Howbeit, among st other, there was one named Phillius, who after he had fought long, and flaine many of his enemies with his owne hands, that forced to paffe ouer the trench, perceining that his heart fainted for the great number of wounds he had vpon him, called one of them that were in the ranke next behind him, and giving him his place, fell downe dead in the armes of his friends, because his enemies should not have his body. In the end, the battell having continued all the day long, the night did separate them : and Pyrrus, being laid in his bed, had this vision in his sleepe: He thought he stroke the city of LACED EMON with lightning, that he vtterly confumed it: whereat he was so passing glad, that even with the very joy he awaked: and therupon forthwith comanded his captains to make their men ready to the affault. and told his dreame vnto his familiars, supposing that out of doubt it did betoken he should in that approach take the city. All that heard it, beleeved it was fo, faving one Lysimachus: who to the contrary faid, that this vision liked him not, because the places smitten with lightning are holy, and it is not lawful to enter into them: by reason whereof he was also a fraid, that the gods did fignific vnto him, that he should not enter into the city of Sparta. Pyrrus answered him: That faidhe, is a matter disputable to and fro in an open affembly of people, for there is no manner of certaintie in it. But furthermore, euery man must take his weapon in his hand, and set this fentence before his eyes:

A right good thing it is, that he would hazard life, In iust defence of masters cause, with speare and bloudy knife.

Alluding vnto Homers verses, which he wrote for the defence of his countrey. And saying thus, herose, and at the breake of day led his army vnto the assault. On the other side also, the LACE-DEMONIANS with a maruellous courage and magnanimity, far greater then their force bestirred themselues woderfully to make resistance, having their wives by them, that gave them their weapons wherewith they fought, and were ready at hand to give meate and drink to them that needed, & did also withdraw those that were hurt to cure them. The MACEDONIANS likewise for their part, indenored themselves with al their might to fill vp the trench with wood & other things, which they cast vpon the dead bodies & armours lying in the bottome of the ditch; and Y LACED EMONIANS againe, laboured al they could possible to let the. But in this great broile, one perceived Pyrrus on horsebacke to have leapt the trench, past over the strength of the carts, and made force to enter into the city. Wherefore those that were appointed to defend that part of the trench, cried out straight, and the women fell a shreeking, and running as if all had bene lost. And as Pyrrus passed further, striking downe with his owne hands all that stood before him, a CRETAN shot at him, and stroke his horsethrough both sides: who leaping out of the prease for paine of his wound, dying, carried Pyrrus away, and threw him vponthe hanging of a steepe hill, where he was in great danger to fall from the top. This put all his servants and friends about him in a maruellous feare, and therewithall the LACED AMONIANS feeing them in this feare and trouble, ranne immediatly vnto that place, and with force of shot draue themall out of the trench. After this retire, Pyrrus caused all assault to ceasse, hoping the LACED EMONI-ANS in the end would yeeld, confidering there were many of them flaine in the two daies paff and all the reft in a mainer hurt. Howbeit, the good fortune of the city (whether it were to proue the valiantnesse of the inhabitants themselves, or at the least to shew what power they were of, euen in their greatest need and distresse, when the LACED EMONIANS had small hope left, brought one Aminias Phocian from Coninth, one of king Antigonus captaines. with a great band of men, and put them into the city to aide them: and straight after him, as soone as he was entred, king Areus arrived also on the other side from CRETA, and two thousand souldiers with him. So the women went home to their houses, making their reckoning that they should not need any more to trouble themselves with wars. They gave the old men liberty also to go and rest themsclues, who being past all age to fight, for necessities sake yet were driven to armethemselves, & take weapon in hand; and in order of battell placed the new-come souldiers in their roomes. Pyrrus vnderstanding that newe supplies were come, grew to greater stomacke then before, and enforced all that he could to win the towne by affault. But in the end, whento his coff he found that he wanne nothing but blowes, he gaue ouer the fiege, and went to spoile all the countrey about, determining to lie there in garrison all the Winter. He could not for all this agoide his destinie: for there rose a sedition in the citie of AR gos betweene two of the chiesedition in fest citizens, Ariftees and Aristoppus: and because Aristees thought that king Antigones did fauour his enemy Arifippus, he made haft to fend first vnco Pyrrus, whose nature and disposition was fuch, that he did continually heape hope vpon hope, euer taking the prefent prosperity. for an occasion to hope after greater to come. And if it fel out he was a loser, then he sought to recour himselse, and to restore his losse by some other new attempts. So that neither for being conquerour, nor ouercome, he would cuer be quier, but alwaies troubled fome, and himfelfe alfo: by reason whereof, he suddenly departed towards Ar gos. But king Areus having layd ambuffles for him in diverfe places, and occupied also the straightest and hardest passages, by the which he was to passe, gaue a charge vpon the GAVLES and MOLOSSIANS, which were in the taile of his army. Now, the felfe same day Pyrrus was warned by a soo: heaver, who sacrififing had found the liver of the facrifiled beaft infected; that it betokened the loffe of fome most neare vnto him. But when he heard the noise of the charge given, he thought not on the warning of the foothfayer, but commanded his fon to take his household feruants with him, and to go thither: and he himselse in the meane time with as great hast as he could, made the rest of his army to march, to get them quickly out of this dangerous way. The fray was very hote about Piolomic Pyrrus fon, for they were all the chiefe men of the LACEDEMONIANS with whom he had to do, led by a valiant captaine, called Enalcus. But as he fought valiantly against those that flood before him, there was a fouldier of CRETA called Orefies, borne in the city of APTERA, a man very ready of his hand, and light of foote, who running along by him, ftroke him fuch a blow on his fide, that he fell downe dead in the place. This prince Prolomie being flaine, his company began straight to flie: and the LACED EMONIANS followed the chase so hotly that they took no heed of themselues, until they saw they were in the plaine field far from their footmen. Wherefore, Pyrrus vnto whom the death of his fonne was newly reported, being on fire with forrow and paffion, turned fuddenly vpon them with the men of armes of the Molossians, and being the first that came vnto them, made a maruellous slaughter among them. For, notwithflanding that enery where before that time he was terrible and inuincible, having his fword in his hand: yet then he did flow more proofe of his valiantnesse, strength, and courage, then he had ever done before. And when he had fet fours to his horse against Evalcus to close with him: Eualcus turned on the one fide, and gave Pyrrus fuch a blow with his fword, that he miffed little the cutting of his bridle hand: for he cut indeed all the raines of the bridle afunder. But Pyrrus Pyrrustin fraight ranne him through the body with his speare, and lighting off from his horse, he put all the troupe of the Laced Amonians to the fword that were about the body of Eualeus, being all chosen men. Thus the ambition of the Captaines was cause of that losse vnto their countrey for nothing, confidering that the warres against them were ended. But Pyrrus having now as it were made facrifice of these poore bodies of the LACEDEMONIANS, for the soule of his dead fonne, and fought thus wonderfully also, to honour his funerals, converting a great part of his forrow for his death, into anger & wrath against the enemies; he afterwards held on his way directly towards Ar Gos. And notwithstanding that king Antigonus had already seazed the hils that were ouer the valley, he lodged neare vnto the city of NAVPLIA and the next morning following fent an Herald vnro Antigonus, and gaue him defiance, calling him wicked man, and challenged him to come downe into the valley to fight with him, to try which of them two should beking. Antigonus made him answer, that he made warres as much with time as with weapon: Antigonus and furthermore, that if Pyrrus were weary of his life, he had waies inough open to put himselfe todeath. The citizens of Ar gos also sent Ambassadours vnto them both to pray them to de-thallenge. part, fith they knew that there was nothing for them to fee in the city of AR gos, and that they would let it be a neuter, and friend vnto them both. King Antigonus agreed vnto it, & gaue them his son for hostage. Pyrrus also made the faire promise to do so too, but because he gaue no caution nor fufficiet pledge to performe it, they mistrusted him the more. Then there fell out many ereat and wonderfull tokens, as well vnto Pyrrus, as vnto the ARGIVES. For Pyrrus having facri- Tokens of fised oxen, their heads being striken off from their bodies, they thrust out their tongues, and lieked up their owne blond. And within the city of Ar Gos, a fifter of the temple of Apollo Dycias, called Apollonide, ranthrough the streetes, crying out that she saw the city full of murther, and bloud running all about, and an Eagle that came vnto the fray, howbeit she vanished away fuddenly, and no body knew what became of her. Pyrrus then coming hard to the wals of Ar-60s in the night, and finding one of the gates called Diamperes, opened by Arifleas, he put in his GAVLES: who possessed the market place before the citizens knew any thing of it. But because the gate was too low to passe the Elephants through with their towers vpon their backes, they Fyrai were driven to take them off, & afterwards when they were within, to put them on in the darke, fight the and intumultiby reason whereof they lost much time, so that the citizens in the end perceived it, gos, and ran incontinently vnto the castell of Aspides, & into other strong places of the city. And there eastell in withall, they fent with present speed vnto Antigonus, to pray him to come and helpe them, and so Argos. he did: and after he was come hard to the wals, he remained without with the scouts, and in the meanetime sent his son with his chiefest Captaines into the towne, who brought a great number of good fouldiers, and men of war with him. At the fame time also arrived Areus king of Sparta, with a thousand of the CRETANS, and most lusty Spartans: all which joyning together, came to give a charge vpon the GAVLEs that were in the market place, who put them in a maruellous feare & hazard. Pyrrus entring on that fidealfo of the city called Cylabaris with terrible noise and cries, when he understood that the GAVIEs answered him not lustily and couragioufly, he doubted straightthat it was the voice of men distressed, & that had their hands full. Wherefore, he came on with speed to relieue them, thrusting the horsemen forwards that marched before him with great danger and paine, by reason of the holes and sinkes, and water conduicts, whereof the city was full. By this meane there was a wonderfull confusion amongst them, as may be thought fighting by night, where no man faw what he had to doe, nor could heare what was commanded, by reason of the great noise they made, straying here and there vp and downethe streetes, the one scattered from the other: neither could the captaines set their menin order, as well for the darknes of the night, as also for the confused tumult that was all the city ouer, and for that the streetes also were very narrow. And therfore they remained on both sides without doing any thing, looking for day light: at the dawning whereof, Pyrrus perceined the castell of Aspides, full of his armed enemies. And furthermore, suddenly as he was come into themarket place, amongst many other goodly common workes set out to beautisie the same, he spied the images of a Bull and a Wolfe in copper, the which fought one with another. This fight A Dall and madehim afraid, because at that present he remembred a prophecy that had bene told him, that sopper, see his end and death should be when he sawa Wolfe and Bull fight together. The Argives re-points port, that the seimages were set vp in the market place, for the remembrance of a certaine chance with the that had happened in their country. For when Danaus came thither first, by the way called Pyramia (as one would fay, land fowne with corne) in the countrey of THYREATIDE, he faw as he Danage went, a Wolfe fight with a Bull: whereupon he staied to see what the end of their fight would come to supposing the case in himself that the Wolfe was a ship file he couled by the figure come to, supposing the case in himself, that the Wolfe was of his side, because that being a stranger as he was, he came to fet vponthe naturall inhabitants of the country. The Wolfe in the Goldwor. end obtained the victory: wherefore Danaus making his prayer vnto Apollo Lycias, followed on his enterprise, and had so good successe, that he draue Gelanor out of AR GOS, who at that time was king of the ARGIVES. And thus you heare the cause why they say these images of the wolfe & bull were set vp in the market place of AR GOS. Pyrrus being halfe discouraged with the sight of them, & also because nothing fell out well according to his expectatio, thought best to retire. but fearing the straightnesse of the gates of the city, he sent vnto his son Helenus, whom he had left without the city with the greatest part of his force and army, commanding him to ouerthis wa pecce of the wall, that his men might the more readily get out, and that he might receive them, if their enemies by chance did hinder their coming out. But the messenger whom he sent. was so hastie and fearefull, with the tumult that troubled him in going out, that he did not well vnderstand what Pyrrus said vnto him, but reported his message quite contrary. Whereupon the yong prince Helenus taking the best souldiers he had with him, and the rest of his Elephants. entred into the city to helpe his father, who was now giving backe; and folong as he had roome to fight at ease, retiring still, he valiantly repulsed those that set vpon him, turning his face of vinto them. But when he was driven vinto the streete that went from the market place to the gate of the citie, he was kept in with his own men that entred at the same gate to helpe him. But they could not heare when Pyrrus cried out, and bad them go backe, the noise was so great; and though the first had heard him, and would have gone backe, yet they that were behind, and did fill thrust forward into the prease, did not permit them. Besides this moreouer, the biggest of all the Elephants by misfortune fell downe overthwart the gate, where he grinding his teeth did hinder those also, that would have come out and given backe. Furthermore, another of the Elephants that were entred before into the city, called Nicon (as much to fay, as conquering) feeking his gouernour that was striken downe to the ground from his backe with terrible blowes, ranne vpon them that came backe vpon him, ouerthrowing friends and foes one in anothers necke, till atthe length having found the body of his mafter flaine, he lift him vp from the ground with his troncke, and carying him vpon his two tufnes, returned backe with great furic, treading all vnder feetche found in his way. Thus every man being thronged and crowded vp together in this fort, there was not one that could help himselfe: for it seemed to be a masse and heape of a multitude. and one wholebody shut together, which sometime thrust forward, and sometime gaue backe. as the fway went. They fought not fo much against their enemies, who set vpon them behind: but they did the selues more hurt then their enemies did. For if any drew out his sword, or based his pike, he could neither scabard the one againe, nor lift vp the other, but thrust it full vpon his own fellowes that came in to helpe them, and so killed themselues one thrusting vpon another. Wherefore Pyrrus feeing his people thus troubled and harried to and fro tooke his crowne fro his head which he wore vpon his helmet, that made him knowne of his men a farre off, and gaue it to one of his familiars that was next vnto him: and trusting then to the goodnesse of his horse, flew vpon his enemies that followed him. It fortuned that one hurt him with a pike, but the wound was neither dangerous nor great: wherefore Pyrrus fet vpon him that had hurthim, who was an ARGIAN borne, a man of meane condition, and a poore old womans son, whose mother at that present time was gotten vp to the top of the tiles of a house, as al other women of the city were to see the fight. And she perceiuing that it was her sonne whom Pyrrus came vpon, was so afrighted to feehim in that danger, that she took a tile, and with both her hands cast it vpon Pyrrns. The tile falling off from his head by reason of his head-peece, lighted full in the nape of his necke, and brake his neck-bone afunder: wherewith he was fuddenly fo benummed, that he lost his fight with the blow, the raines of his bridle fell out of his hand, & himfelf fell from his horse, to the ground, by Licymmias tombe, before any man knew what he was, at the least the commo people. Untill at the last there came one Zopyrus that was in pay with Antigonus, and two or three other fouldiers also that ran straight to the place, and knowing him, dragged his body into a gate, euen as he was coming againe to himselfe out of this trance. This Zopyrus drew out a SLAVON fword he woreby his fide, to strike off his head. But Pyrrus cast such a grim countenance on him betweene his eyes, that made him fo afraid, & his hand fo to shake therewith, that being thus amazed, he did not strike him right in y place where he should have cut off his head, but killed him under his mouth about his chinne, so that he was a great while ere he could strike off his head. The matter was straight blowne abroad amongst diverse: whereupon Alcyoneus running thither, asked for the head that he might know it againe. But when he had it, he ranne presently vnto his father withall, and found him talking with his familiar friends, and cast pyrrus head before him. Antigonus looking vponit, when he knew it, layd vpon his fonne with his staffe, and called him cruell murderer and vnnaturall barbarous beast; and so hiding his eyes with his cloake, wept for pity (remembring the fortune of his grandfather Antigorius, and of his father Demetrius) and then caused Pyrrus head and body to be honourably burnt & buried. Afrepropries Alegonus meeting Helenus (king Pyrrus sonne) in very poore estate, musted vp with a towards poore fhort cloake, yied him very courteoufly with gentle words, & brought him to his father.

THE LIFE OF Caius Marius.

T is not knowne what was the third name of Cains Marius, no more then of Quintus Sectorius, who had all Spaine in his hands at one time: nor of Lucius Mummius, he that destroyed the city of Corinth. For this name of Achaicus that was given vnto Mummius, of Africanus Thomas vnto Scipio, and of Numidicus vnto Metellus: were all furnames gi- of the Rouen them, by reason of the conquests they wan. By this reason Posidowins thinketh to ouercome them that fay, that the third name the Ro-MAINES haue, is their proper name: as Camillus, Marcellus, Cato. For if it fell out so, said he, then it must needs follow that they which have two names, should have no proper name. But on the other side also, he doth not consider that by the like reason he should say, that women have no names: for there is not a woman in Rom E that is called by her first name, which Posidonius indgeth to bee the proper name of the Ro-MAINES. And that of the other two, the one is the common name of all the house or family, as of the Pompeians, of the Manlians, and of the Cornelians, like as the Heraclides and the Phlopides are amongst the Grecians: and the other is a surname taken of the deeds, or of the nature, forme, or shape of the body, or of some other like accident, as are these furnames, Macrinus. Torquatus, and sylla. Euen as amongst the GRECIAN'S likewise, Muemon. which fignifieth having good memorie: Grypos, having a crooked nose: Callinicos, conquerino. But as for that, the diversity of custome would deliver objection sufficient to the contrary, to him that lifted. And furthermore, as touching the fauour of Marins face, we have feene an image of his in marble at RAVENNA, a city of the GAVLES, which doth lively represent that rough feuerity of nature and maners, which they fay was in him. For being borne a rough man by nature, and given to the warres, and having followed the same altogether from his youth, more then the civill life: when he came to authority, he could not bridle his anger and cholerickenature. And they fay furthermore, that he neuer learned the Greeke tongue, nor vsed it in any mat. ters of weight: as though it had benea mockerie to study to learne the tongue, the masters wherof lined in bondage under others. After his second triumph, in the dedication of a certainetem. ple, he made Greeke playes to shew the Romaine's pastime: and came into the Theater, howbeithe did but fit downe only, and went his way straight. Wherfore me thinks, that as Plato was wont to say oft vnto Xenocrates the Philosopher, who was of a currish nature, had his headener occupied, and too seucre: Xenocrates, my friend, I pray thee do sacrifice to the Graces, Soifany man could have perswaded Marius to have facrificed to the Muses, and to the GRECIAN Graces: (that is to fay, that he had knowne the Greek tongue) to fo many famous and glorious deeds as he did, both in peace and warres, he had not joyned fo vnfortunate and miferable an end ashe made, through his choler and extreme ambition, at fuch yeares, and through an vnfatiable conetousnes, which like boisterous winds made him to make shipwrack of al, in a most cruel, bloudie. and vnnaturall age. The which is eafily knowne in reading the discourse of his doings. First of all he was of a meane house, borne of poore parents by father and mother, that got their linings by fweat of their browes. His father as himfelfe, was called caius: Fulcinia was his mother. And this was the cause why he began so late to haunt the city, and to learne the civility and maners of Rome, having bene brought up alwaies before in a litle poore village called CIRROEATON, within the territorie of the city of Arpos: where heled a hard country life, in respect of those that lived pleasantly and finely in the cities, but otherwise well reformed, and nearest vnto the maners of the ancient Romaines. The first journy he made vnto the wars, was against y CEL-TILERIANS IN SPAINE, under Scipio African, when he went to befiege yeity of Numantia: where his captaines in short time found that he was a better soldier then any other of his companions. For he did maruellous eafily receive the reformation of manners, and the discipline of warres which Scipio advanced amongst his souldiers, that were ill trained before, and given over to all pleafure. And they fay, that in the fight of his Generall he rought hand to hand with one of his enemics, and flue him: vpon which occasion, Scipio to make him loue him, did offer him many courtefies and pleafures. But specially one day about the rest, having made him sup with him at his table, some one after supper falling in talke of Captaines that were in Rome at that time: one that flood by Scipio, asked him (either because indeed he stood in doubt, or else for that he would curry fauour with Scipio) what other Captaine the Romaine s should have after his death, like vnto him. Scipio having Marius by him, gently clapped him vpon the shoulders, and faid: Peraduenture this shall be he. Thus happily were they both borne, the one to shew from his youth that one day he should come to be a great man, & the other also for wisely coniccturing the end, by feeing of the beginning. Well, it fortuned to that these words of Scipio (by report) aboue al things elle put Marius in a good hope, as if they had bene spoken by the Oracle of some god, and made him bold to deale in matters of state and common-wealth: whereby meanes of the fauor and countenance Cacilius Metellus gaue him (whose house his father and he had alwaies followed and honored) he obtained the office of Tribuneship. In this office he preferred a law touching the maner how to give y voices in election of the Magistrates, which did feemeto take from the Nobility the authority they had in judgement. And therefore the Confull Cotta stepped vp against it, and perswaded the Senate to refist that law, and not suffer it to be authorized, & therewithall prefently to call Marius before them to yeeld a reason of his doing. So was it agreed upon in Senate. Now Marius comming into the Senate, was not abashed at any thing, as fome other young man would have bene, that had but newly begun to enter into the world as he did, and having no other notable calling or quality in him, faving his vertue onely to commend him: but taking boldnesse of himselfe (as the notable acts he afterwards did, gaue shew of his valour) he openly threatned the Confull Cotta to send him to prison, if he did not presently withdraw the conclusion he had caused to be resoluted vpon. The Consul then turning himselfe vnto Gacilius Metellus, asked how he liked it? Metellus standing vp, spake in the behalfe of the Confull: and then Marius calling a fergeant out, commanded him to take Metellus felse, and to carie him to prison. Metellus appealed to the other Tribunes, but neuer a one would take his matter in hand: so that the Senate when all was done, were compelled to call backe the conclusion that before was taken. Then Marius returning with great honour into the market place among the affembly of the people, caused this law to passe and be authorized: and euery man held opinion of him that he would proue a ftout man, and fuch a one, as would not floupe for any feare, nor flirinke for bashfulnesse, but would beard the Senate in fauour of the people. Notwithstanding he shortly after changed opinion, and altered the first, by another act he made: for when another went about to have a law made, to distribute corne vnto enery citizen without payment of any pennie, he was vehemently against it, and ouerthrewit: so that thereby he came to be alike honoured and efteemed of either partie, as he that would neither pleasure the one, nor the other, to the prejudice of the common-wealth. After he had bene Tribune, he fued for the chiefest office of Ædilis. Of the Ædiles there are two sorts: the first is called Adilitas Curulis, fo named, because of certaine chaires that have crooked feete, vpon Adilitas which they sit when they give audience. The other is of lesse dignity, and that is called Adilithe popularis And when they have chosen the first and greater Ædilis at Rome, they presently proceed the same day also in the market place vnto election of the lesser. Marius seeing plainely that he was put by the chiefest of the Ædiles, turned againe straight yet to demand the second: med to be Adiles. but this was misliked in him, and they tooke him for too bold, too shunclesse, and too presumtuous a man. So that in one felf day he had two denials and repulfes, which neuer man but himfelfebefore had. And neuertheleffe, all this could not cut his combe, but shortly after he sued alfo for the Pretorship, & he lacked but a litle of the deniall of that; yet in the end, being last of all chosen, he was accused to have bribed the people, & bought their voices for mony. And furely amongst many other, this presumption was very great: that they saw a man of Cassus Sabacon chain within the bars where the election is made, running too & fro among them that gaue their voices, because this Sabacon was Marius very great friend. The matter came before the Indges, and Sabacon was examined vponit: whereunto he answered, that for the great extreme heate he felt, he was very dry, and asked for cold water to drinke, and that his man had brought him some in a pot where he was, howbeit that he went his way as foone as euer he had drunke. This Sabacon Sabaton was afterwards put out of the Senate by the next Cenfors, and inany judge that he was worthy the of this infamy for that he was perjured in judgement or because he was to solvied & solvi of this infamy, for that he was periured in judgemet, or because he was so subject & giuento his pleasure. Caius Herennius was also called for a witnesse against Marius: but he did alledge for his cause Heexcuse, that the law and custome did dispence with the Patron, to be a witnesse against his follower and client; and he was quit by the Judges. For the ROMAINE's alwaies call those Patrons, Marine who take the protection of meaner then themselves into their hands: saying, that Marius prede-bhalfe cessors, and Marius himselfe, had euer bene followers of the house of the HERENNIANS. The Indges received his answer, and allowed thereof. But Marins spake against it, alledging that since and client. he had received this honor to beare office in the commonwealth, he was now growne from this base condition, to be any more a follower of any manithe which is not true in all. For energy office of a Magistrate doth not exempt him that hath the office nor yet his posterity to be under the patronage of another, nor doth discharge him from the duty of honouring them; but of necessity he must be a magistrate, which the law doth permit to sit in the crooked chaire called Curulis, that is to fay, caried upon a charriot through the city. But not with standing that at the first hearing of this cause, Marius had but ill successe, and that the Judges were against him all they could yet in the end for all that, at the last hearing of this matter, Marius, contrary to all mens opinions, was discharged, because the Iudges opinions with and against him fell to be of like number. He vsed himselse very orderly in his office of Prætorship, and after his yeare was out, when it came to denide the provinces by lot, Spaine fell vnto him, which is beyond the riuser of Bætis: where it is reported, that he feowred all the country therabouts of theeues and robspaine. bers, which not with standing was yet very cruell and sauage, for the rude, barbarous, and vnciuil The opinion maner and fashion of life of the inhabitants there. Elequence of SPAINE, defiring to deale in matters of the comonwealth, he faw that he had neither eloquece nor riches, which were the two meanes, by the which the fethat were at that time in credit and authority, did carie the people euen as they would. Notwithstanding, they made great account of his constancie and noble mind they found in him, of his great paines and trauell he tooke continually, and of the simplicity of his life: which were causes to bring him to honour and preferment, infomuch as he maried very highly. For he maried Iulia, that was of the noblest house of the Cafars, and aunt vnto Iulius Cafar: who afterwards came to be the chiefest man of all the ROMAINES, and who by reason of that alliance betweene the, seemed in some things to follow Marius, as we have written in his life. Marius was a man of great temperance and patience, as may be judged by an act he did, putting himselfe into the hands of Surgeons. For his shankes and legges were full of great swollen veines, and being angrie because it was no pleasant thing to behold, he determined to put himselfe into the hands of Surgeons to be cured. And first, laying out one of his legges to the Surgeon to worke vpon, he would not be bound as others are in like case: but patiently abode all the extreme paines a man must of necessity feele being cut, without stirring, groning, or fighing, still keeping his countenance, and faidneuer a word. But when the Surgeon had done with his first legge, and would have gone to the other, he would not give it him: Nay, faid he, I fee the cure is not worth the paine I must abide. Afterwards Cacilius Metellus the Conful, being appointed to go into Africk e to make warre with king Ingurth, tooke Marius with him for one of his Lieutenants. Marius being there, seeing notable good seruice to be done, and occasion to shew his manhood, was not of mind in this voyage to increase Metellus honour and reputation, as other Lieuetenants did: and thought that it was not Metellus that called him foorth for his Lieutenant, but fortune her selfe that presented him a fit occasio to raise him to greatnes, & (as it were) did leade him by the hand into a goodly field, to put him to the proofe of that he could do. And for this cause therefore, he endeuoured himself to shew all the possible proofes of valiantnesse and honour he could. For the wars being great continually there, he neuer for feare refused any attempt or service, how dangerous or painefull soeuer it were, neither disdained to take any service in hand, were it neuer so little: but exceeding all other his fellowes and companions in wisedome and foresight in that which was to be done, and striuing with the meanest fouldiers in liuing hardly and painefully, he wan the goodwil & fauor of euery man. For to fay truly, it is a great comfort & refreshing to soldiers that labour, to have companions that labour willingly with them. For they think, that their company labouring with them, doth in maner take away the compulsion and necessity. Furthermore, it pleaseth the Romain E souldier maruellously to see & Generall cate openly of the same bread he eateth, or that he lyeth on a hard bed as he doth, or that himself is the first man to set his hand to any work when a trench is to be cast, or their campe to be fortified. For they do not somuch esteeme the Captaines that honour and reward them, as they doe those that in dangerous attempts, labour and venture their liues with them. And further, they do farre better loue them that take pains with them, then those that suffer them to live idlely by them. Marins performing all this, and winning thereby the loue and goodwils of his fouldiers he straight filled all Lybia and the city of Rome with his glory, fo that he was in every mans mouth. For they that were in the camp in Africk b, wrote vnto them that were at Romb, that they should neuer see the end of those wars against this barbarous king, if they gaue not the charge vnto Marius, and chose him Conful. These things misliked Metellus very much, but specially the missfortune that came vpon Turpilius did maruellously trouble him: which fell out in this fort: Turpilius was Metellus friend, yea he and al his parents had followed Metellus in this warre, being master of the works in his campe. Metellus made him gouernour ouer the city of VACCA, a goodly great city: and he ving the inhabitants of the same very gently and courteously, mistrusted nothing; till he was fallen into the hands of his enemies through their treason. For they had brought king Ingurth into their city vnknowne to him, howbeit they did him no hurt, but only begged him of the king, and let him go his way fafe. Andthis was the cause why they accused Turpilins of treason. Marius being one of his Iudges in the councel, was not cotented to be bitter to him himself, but moued many of the councel besides to be against him: so that Metellus by the voices of the people, was driven against his will to condemne him to suffer as a traitor; and shortly after it was found & proued, that Turpilius was wrongfully condemned and put to death. To fay truly, there was not one of preto death the councell but were very fory with Metellus, who maruellous impatiently tooke the death of the poore innocent. But Marius contrarily rejoyced, and tooke it voon him that he purfued his death, and was not ashamed to make open vants, that he had hanged a furie about Merellus neck. to reuenge his friends bloud, whom he guiltlesse had caused to be put to death. After that time they became mortall enemies. And they fay, that one day Metellus to mock him withall faid vnto him: O good man, thou wilt leave vs then, and returne to Rome to fue for the Confulfhip: and canst thou not be contented to tarie to be Consuli with my son? Now his son at that time was but aboy. But howfoeuer the matter went, Marius left him not fo, but laboured for leaue Miella all he could possible. And Metellas after he had vied many delayes & excuses, at the length gaue and hear him leave, twelve daies only before the day of election of the Confuls. Wherfore Marius made haft, and in two daies and a night came from the campeto VTICA vpon the sea side, which is a maruellous way from it: and there before he took ship, did sacrifices vnto the gods, & the Soothfayer told him, that the gods by the fignes of his facrifices, did promife him vncredible profperity. & fogreat, as he himself durst not hope after. These words made Marins heart greater: wherupon he hoifed faile, and having a paffing good gale of wind in the poope of the fhip, paffed the feas in fouredaies, & being landed, rode pointo Rome. When he was arrived, he went to show himselfe vnto the people; who were maruellous desirous to see him. And being brought by one of the Tribunes of the people vnto the pulpit for orations, after many accusations which he obiected against Metellus, in the end he befought the people to chuse him Confull, promising that within few daies he would either kill, or take king Ingurth prisoner. Whereupon he was chosen Marins Confull without any contradiction. And fo foone as he was proclaimed, he began immediatly for tasket to leauie men of war, caufing many poore men that had nothing, and many flaues alfo, to be enrolled against the order of ancient custome: where other Captaines before him did receius no fuch manner of men, and did no more fuffer vnworthy mento be fouldiers, then they did allow of vnworthy officers in the common-wealth: in doing the which enery one of them that were enrolled, left their goods behind them, as a pledge of their good fernice abroad in the wars. Yet this was not the matter that made Marius to be most hated, but they were his stout proud words full of contempt of others, that did chiefly offend the noble men in the city. For he proclaimed it enery where abroad as it were, that his Confulfhip was a spoile he had gotte of the effeminate the Reb. rich noble men through his valiantnesse, and that the wounds which he had vpon his body for line. the service of the comonweale, were those that recommended him to the people, and were his firength, and not the monuments of the dead, nor the images & statues of others. And of times naming Albinus, and otherwhile Beslia, both noble men, and of great houses, who having bene Generals of the ROMAINE army, had very ill fortune in the countrey of LYBIA: he called them cowards and simple fouldiers, asking them that were about him, if they did not think that their ancestors would rather have wished to have left their children that came of them like vnto himself, then such as they had bene; considering that they themselves had won honour and glory, not for that they were descended of noble bloud, but through their described vertue and valiant deeds. Now Marius spake not these words in a foolish brauery, and for vaine glory onely, to purchase the ill will of the Nobility for nothing : but the common people being very glad to feehim shame and dispite the Senate, and measuring alwaies the greatnesse of his courage with his haughty fierce words, they egged him forward still not to sparethe Nobility, and to reprone the greatmen; so that he cuer held with the communaltie. And furthermore, when he was pasfed ouer againe into Africks, it spited Metellus to the heart, because that he having ended all the warre, that there remained almost no more to take or win, Marins should come in that fort Marins detotake away the glory and triumph out of his hands, having fought to rife and increase by vn. Friend Methankfulneffetowards him. He would not come to him therefore, but went another way, and boncard boncard left the army with Rutilius one of his Lieutenants, to deliuer the same vnto him. Howbeit, the Conquering reuenge of this ingratitude, lighted in the end vpon Marius owne necke: for Sylla tooke out of effing in-Marius hands the honor of ending this war, cuen as Marius had taken it from Metellus. But how, & after what fort, I will repeat it in few words, because we have written the particularities more at large in the life of Sylla. Bocchus king of high NVMIDIA, was father in law vnto king Ingurth, Postbook with whom he gaue no great aid, whileft he made wars with the Romains, because he hated his Rumidia, vnfaithfullnesse, and feared lest he would make himself greater then he was: but in the end, after delinered Ingurth had fled, and wandred vp and downe in enery place, he was constrained of very necessity to cast his last hope and anker vpon him, as his final refuge, and so repaire vnto him. King Boc-chus received him rather for shame, because he durst not punish him, then for any love or good will he bare him: and hauing him in his hands, feemed openly to intreate Marins for him, and fecretly to write the contrary vnto him. But in the meane time, he practifed treason vnder hand, Lucius Syl. and fent privily for Lucius Sylla, who then was Quæftor (to fay, high Treasurer) vnder Marius, Lacius 31. and of whom he had received certaine pleasures in those warres. Sylla trusting to this barbarous Puder Mar king, went at his fending for to him. But when he was come, king Bocchus repented him of his promife, and altered his mind, standing many daies in doubt with himselfe how to resolue, whether he should deliuer king Ingurth, or keepe sylla himselfe: yet at the last he went on with his purpose and intended treason, and delivered king Iugurth alive into Syllaes hands. And this was the first original cause of the pestilent and mortal enmity that grew afterwards betwixt Marius and sylla, and was like to have vtterly overthrowne the city of Rome, and to have razed the foundation of the Empire vnto the ground. For many enuying the glory of Marius, gaue it out euery where, that this act of the taking of king lugarth, appertained onely vnto Sylla: and Sylla himselfe caused a ring to be made, which he wore commonly, and had grauen vpon the stone of the fame, how Bocobus deliuered Ingurth into his hands. And afterwards he made it alwaieshis feale to despite Marius withall, who was an ambitious and proud man, and could abide no companion to be partaker of the glory of his doings; and Sylla did it especially at the procurement of encinies and ill willers, who gaue the glory of the beginning and chiefe exploits of this war, vnto Metellus; and the last and finall conclusion vnto Sylla, to the end that the people should not haue Marius in fo great estimation and good opinion, as they had before. But all this enuie, detraction and hatred against Marius, was soone after extinguished and troden vnder foot, by reafon of the great danger that fell vpon all ITALY out of the West: and they neuer spake of italterwards, knowing that the commonwealth stood in need of a good Captaine, & that they began to look about, and consider who should be that great wise Pilot, that might saue and preferue it from so great and dangerous a storme of war. For there was not a noble man of all the ancient houses of Rome, that durst vndertake to offer himselfe to demand the Consulship; but Marius being absent, was chosen Confull the second time. For Ingurth was no sooner taken, but newes came to Rome of the coming downe of the Tevrons, and of the Cimbres, the which would not be beleeued at the first, by reason of the infinite number of the fighting men which was faid to be in their company, and for the vncredible force and power of the armies which was instified to come: but afterwards they knew plainely, that the rumour that ran abroad was leffe then the truth fell out indeed. For they were three hundred thousand fighting menallarmed, who brought with them also another multitude as great (or more) of women and children which wandred vp and downe feeking countries and townes to dwell and line in, as they heard fay the GAVLEs had done in old time, who leauing their owne countrey, came, and had posses fed the best part of ITALY, which they had taken away from the THYSCANS. Now to say truly, no manknew of what nation they were, nor from whence they came: as well for that they had no friendship with any other people, as also because they came out of a farre country, as a cloud of people that was spread all ouer GAVLE and ITALY. It was doubted much they were a people of GERMANY, dwelling about the North fide; and this they coniectured by view of the greatnes of their bodies, and also for that they had dark blue eyes & red, besides that the GRECIANS in their tongue do cal thecues & robbers, Cimbres. Other fay, that Celtica, for the great length & largenes of the country, firetching it felf from the coast of the great Ocean sea, & from the north parts, drawing towards the marifles Mootides, & the East, runneth into Scythia, or Tarta-RIA PONTICA: and that for neighborhood these two nations ionned together, and went out of their country, northat they made this great voyage all at one time, but armany fundry times, marching yerely in the spring further and further into the country. And thus by continuance of time, they passed by force of armes through al the firme land of Evrope: & that for this cause, although they had many particular names according to the diversity of their nations, yet althis maffe and multitude of people gathered together, were called not with standing, the army of the CELTOS CYTHES, as who would fay, y CELTOTARTARES. Other hold opinio that y nation of the CIMMERIANS, who were known in old time for ancient GRECIANS, the one part of them were not very great in respect of the whole, the which being fled (or driven out of their countrey for some civill diffention) were compelled by the TARTARES to passe beyond the marithe Moeotides, into the countries of As 1A, under the conduction of a captain called Ligdamis.

But the relidue of them, which were a far greater number, and more warlike men, they dwelt in the furthest parts of the earth, adioyning to the great Ocean sea, in a darke shadowed countrey conered with wonderfull forrests, of such length, and so great and thicke, and the trees so high, that the Sun can have no power vpon the ground, and they joyne hard vpon the great forrest of Hercynia. And furthermore, they are vnder fuch a climate, where the pole is of fuch a height by the inclination of the circles equidiftant, which they call Paralleles, that it is not farre from the point that answereth directly to the plummet vpon the head of the inhabitants: and where the daies are equinoctiall. They do deuide all their time in two parts, the which giueth Homer occafion to faine, that when Vlyffes would call vpon the dead, he went into the country of the CIM-MERIANS, as into the country of hell. And this is the cause why they say these barbarous people left their owne countries to come into ITALY, which from the beginning were called CIMME-RIANS, and afterwards they fay (and not without great likelihood) that they were furnamed CIMERES: howbeit that is spoken rather by a likely conjecture, then by any assured troth of historie. And as for the multitude of men, the most part of historiographers doe write, that they were rather mothen leffe, then we have fpoken of and that they were fo hardy and valiant, that nothing could stand before them, they did so great things by the strength of their hands, where they fought with any, so violently and so sodainly that they seemed to be like a lightning fire all about where they came. By meanes whereof, they met with no man that durst resist them, but fcraped together and caried away all that they found, hand ouer head and there were many Ro-MAINE Captaines appointed gouernors to keepe that which the ROMAINES held in GAYLE beyond the mountaines, who with great armics were shamefully ouerthrowne by the. The cowardlines of those whom they had ouercome, was the chiefest cause that moved them to direct their iourney to Rome. For when they had vanquished the first they had fought with all, & gotten great riches also: they were so fleshed by this, that they determined to stay no where, before they had destroyed Rome, & sacked al ITALY. The ROMAINE's hearing of this out of all parts. fent for Marius to give him the conduction and leading of these wars, and chose him Colull the Marius fecond time: notwithstanding that it was directly against the law, that did expressly forbid any suit these man to be chosen being absent, and vntill also a certaine time appointed had past betweene the conditine vacation and election, before they could chuse him officer twife in one office. Some alledged against the this law, of intentto hinder the election: but the people repulsed them, objecting to the contraric, that this was not the first time the law had given place to the benefit of the commonwealth Law must and that the occasion offered to abrogate the law at that present, was no lesse then former occafions by the which they chose Scipio Confull, against the course and time appointed by the law, benefit. not for any feare they stood in to lose their owne country, but for the desire they had to destroy the country of the CARTHAGINIANS, by reason wherof the people proceeded to election. And Marius bringing home his army againe out of Lybia into Italy, tooke possession of his Confulfhip the first day of Ianuary (on which day the Romain es begin their yeare) & therewith all triumph made his triumph into the city of Rome, shewing that to the Romaines, which they thought into Rome neuer to have feene: and that was, king Ingurth prisoner, who was so subtill a man, and could Ingurth fo well frame himselfe vnto his fortune, and with his craft and subtiltie was of so great courage besides, that none of his enemies ever hoped to have had him alive. But it is said, that after he was led in this triumph, he fell mad straight vponit: and the pompe of triumph being ended, he was caried into prison, wherethe sergeants for hast to have the spoile of him, tore his apparel by force from off his backe: and because they would take away his rich gold care-rings that hung at his eares, they pulled away with them the tippe of his eare, and then cast him naked to the bottome of a deepe dungeon, his wits being altogether troubled. Yet when they did throw him downe, laughing he faid: O Hercules, how cold are your stoucs? He lived there yet fixe daies, fighting with hunger, and defiring alwaies to prolong his miserable life vnto the last houre; the which was a just deserved punishment for his wicked life. In this triumph were carried (as they fay) three thousand and scuen hundred pound weight in gold, and of filter niggors, fine thoufand seuen hundred and lxxv. pound weight: and more in gold and ready coine; eight and twenty thousand and seuen hundred crownes. After this triumph Marius caused the Senate to assemble within the Capitoll, where he entred into the company with his triumphing robe, either because he forgot it, or else of too grosse & vnciuill arrogancie but perceiving that al the assembly misliked of it, he rose suddenly, and tooke his long Consuls gowne, and then returned quickly againe into his place. Furthermore, Marius departing to go to the wars, thought to traine his air. my by the way, and to harden his fouldiers vnto labour, caufing them to run euery way, making great long journeys, compelling each fouldier to cary his own furniture, and to prepare himneceffary victuals to find himfelf withal: so that euer after they made a prouerbe of it, & called such as were paineful and willing to do that which they were commanded without grudging, Marius moiles. Other notwithstanding do shew another cause and beginning of this Proucrbe for they fay, that Scipio lying at the fiege of the city of NVMANTIA, would not onely take view of the armour and horses of scruice that were in his army, but also of the moiles and other beasts of burden, because he would see how they were kept and furnished. So Marius brought his horse and moile to the muster which he kept himselfe, fat, faire, and very well drest; and his moiles haire so flike and smooth, and there with all so lustic and trim, as none of the rest were like vnto them. Sci. piotook great pleasure to see these beasts so wel kept, and in so good plight: insomuch as he spake of it afterwards many a time and oft. And vpon his words, this maner of talke was taken vpeuer after, and became a common prouerbe: when they meane to mocke any man that is painefull, and giuento fore labour, making as though they would praise him, they call him Marius moile, Furthermore, it was a happy turne for Marius (in mine opinion) that these barbarous people(like in force to the beating back of the raging feas) turned their first furie towards Spaine. and that he in the meane space had time and leisure to traine and exercise his fouldiers, to make them bold, and withall, himfelfe to be throughly knowne amongst them. For when by litle and litle they hadlearned not to offend, nor disobey, then they found his rough commanding; and flarpe feuerity in punishing such as flacked their duty, both profitable & very necessary, besides that it was also inft and reasonable. Againe his great fury, his sharpe words, and his fierce looks. after they had a while bene yied to them, by litle & litle they feemed nothing fo fearefull to the. as to their enemies. But the thing that pleafed the fouldiers more then all the rest, was his inslice and vpright dealing; whereof they report such an example: Marius had a nephew of his in his campe, called Caius Lucius, who had charge of men in the army. This Lucius was taken for a maruellous honest man, fauing that he had this foule vice in him, that he would be suddenly in loue with faire young boyes:and as at that time he fell in loue with a trim young stripling, called Trebonius, that ferued vinder him, and having many times lewdly enticed him, and neuer could obtaine his purpose, at the last sent for him one night by his servant. The yong man might not disobey his captaine being fent for, but prefently wet vnto him. When he was come into his tent. and that his Captaine did strine with all his force to do him villanie: he drew out his sword, and killed him in the place. And this was done when Marius was out of his campe: who fo foone as he returned, caused the Marshall to bring the yong man before him. Many stepped forth straight to accuse him, but no man to defend him. Wherefore he boldly began to tell his tale himselfe. and to name many witnesses, who had both seene and knowne how his dead Captaine had oftentimes offered him dishonour, and how that he had continually resisted his abhominable motion, and would never yeeld himself vnto him, for any gift or present he could offer him. Wherfore Marius commending him greatly, and being very glad of it, caused presently one of those crownes to be brought vnto him, which are vsed to be given to them that in a day of battel have done some valiant deed, and he himselse did crowne Trebenius withall, as one that had done a noble act, and at fuch a time, as good and honest examples were requisite. This iudgement of Marius being caried to Rome, stood him to great good purpose towards the obtaining of his third Confulfhip: beside also that they looked for the comming backe of these barbarous people about the Spring, with whom the KOMAINE fouldiers would not fight under any other captaine then Marius. Howbeit they came not so soone againe as they looked for them, but Marius passed oueralso the yeare of his third Consulship. So time comming about againe for the election of the new Confuls & his companion also being dead, he was driven to go himself vnto Rome, leaving the charge of his campe in his absence vnto Manius Acilius. At that time there were many noble men that fued for the Confulship: but Lucius Saturninus one of the Tribunes, who had the communaltie vnder his girdle as he would himselfe, more then any of the other Tribunes, and being wonne vnder hand by Marius, made many orations, in the which he perswaded the people to chuse Marius Consult the fourth time. Marius to the contrary, seemed to refuse it, saying, that he would none of it, though the people chose him. Whereupon Saturni. muscalled him traitor, crying out, That his refufall in fuch a danger and time of necessity, was an apparant part to be tray the commonwealth. It was found ftraight that this was a groffe packe betwixt Saturninus and Marius, by fuch as could fee day at a little hole. Neuertheleffe, the people confidering that their present troubles required Marius skil and good fortune in the wars, they made him Confull the fourth time, and joyned Catulus Luctatius Confull with him, a man that Marius was greatly honoured of the Nobility, and not misliked also of the common people. Marius ha- fourth com uing newes of the approching of the barbarous people, passed ouer the Alpes with great speed, Capulas & fortifying his camp by the river of RHONE, he brought great provision of all kinds of victural Luctuins. als thither with him, left being straighted by lacke thereof, he should be forced to come to battel at any other time but even as he would himfelf, & as it should seeme good vnto him. And where before that time the transporting of victuals vnto his camp by sea was very long, & dangerous, and a maruellous great charge besides: he made it very short & easie by this meanes. The mouth of the riner of RHONE had gathered together fo much mud, and fuch ftore of fand, which the wanes of the sea had cast on heapes together, that the same was become very high & deep: so as the banks made § entry into it very narrow, hard, & dagerous for great ships of burde that came from the sea, Marius confidering this matter, set his men on worke while they had nothing to do, and made them digge a large trench and deepe channel, into the which he turned a great part of the river, and caried it to a convenient place of the coast, where the water fell into the sea by an opengulfe, whereby he made it able to carie the greatest ships that were and besides that, it was in a very still quiet place, not being troubled with winds nor waves. The chanel carrieth yet his name, and is called Marius channell or trench. These barbarous people deuided themselues into Marius two armies to passe into ITALY, so that it fell out to the one part which were the CIMERES, to The cimgothrough high GERMANIE, & to force that passage which Catulus kept: & vnto the other part, bies wone which were the Tevrons and Amerons, to paffe through the country of the Genovesi-ANS by the fea fide against Marius. Now the CIMBRES having the greater compasse to fetch into Italy. about, flayed longer, and remained behind: but the TEVTONS and the AMERONS going their The Ten way first, had in few dayes dispatched their iourney they had to go, to bring them to the campe sombrons where the Romaines lay, vnto whom they prefeted themselves by infinite numbers, with ter- fall room rible faces to behold, and their cries and voices farre contrary vnto other mens. They took in a Mainto maruellous deale of ground in length to camp vpon, and so came forth to desie Marins, and pro- rain, noke him to battell in open field. Marins made no reckoning of all their bragging desiances, but through the when the batters in open neid. Marins made no reckoning of antificin dragging demances, but kept his men together within his camp, taking on terribly with them that would rafily take vpo of Genna. them to moue ought to the contrary, and which through impatience of choler would needs go forth to fight, calling the traitors to their country. For faid he, we are not come to fight for our private glory, neither to winne triumphs nor victories for our selucs: but we must seeke by all meanes to diuert and put by this great shower of wars from vs, and this lightning and tempest, that it ouercome not al ITALY. These words he spake vnto the private captaines which were vnder him, as vnto men of hauiour and quality: but as for the common fouldiers, he made them stand upon the trenches of his campe, one after another to behold the enemies, and to acquaint themselues with sight of their faces, their countenance, and marching, and not to be afraid of their voices, & the maner of their speech, which was wonderfull strange & beastly; and also that they might know the fashion of their weapons, and how they handled them. And by this order and ordinarie viewing of them, in time he made the things that feemed fearefull vnto his men at the first fight, to be afterwards very familiar: so that they made no more wondring at them. For he judged the thing which indeed is true, that a rare and new matter neuer scene before, for lack of judgement & vinderstanding maketh things vinknowne to vs, more horrible and fearefull then they are:and to the contrary, that custome taketh away a great deale of feare and terror of those things, which by nature are indeed fearefull. The which was seene then by experience. For they being daily acquainted to look vponthese barbarous people, it did not only diminish some part of y former feare of the Romain E fouldiers: but furthermore, they whetting their choler with the fierce vntollerable threats & bragges of these barbarous brutish people, did set their hearts afire to fight with them, because they did not only wast and destroy all the country about them, but besides that, came to give assault even vnto their campe, with such a boldnesse, that the Ro-MAINE fouldiers could no longer fuffer them, and they letted not to speake words that came to Marius cares himself: What coward linesse hath Marius cuer knowne invs, that he keepes vs thus from fighting, and vnder locke and key as it were, in the guard of porters, as if we were women; fixedaics continually together. And as they came raking by the Romaine's campe, they asked them in mockery, If they would write to fend home any thing to their wives, for they would be

Letvs therfore shew our selues likemen, and go aske him if he looke for any other souldiers, befides our selues to defend ITAL y and if he have determined to employ vs as pioners only, when he would cast a trenchto rid away the mud, or to turne a river contrary. For therin hath he only hitherto employed vs in great labour, and they are the notable workes he hath done in his two Consulships, wherof he maketh his boast vnto them at Rome. Is he afraid they should take him as they did Carbo & Capio, whom the enemies have overthrowne? He must not be afraid of that for he is a captaine of another maner of valour and reputation then they were, & his army much betterthen theirs was. But how soeuer it be, yet were it much better (in prouing) to lose some. thing, then to be idle, & to suffer our friends & confederates to be destroyed and sacked before our eyes. Marius was maruellous glad to heare his men complaine thus, and did comfort them. and told them that he did nothing miftrust their courage and valiantnesse: how beit that through the counsell of certaine prophecies and oracles of the gods, he did expect time and place fit for victory. For he euer caried a Syrian woma in a litter about with him, called Martha, with great reverence, whom they said had the spirit of prophecy in her: and that he did ever sacrifice vnto the gods by her order, and at such time as she willed him to do it. This Syrian woman wet first to speake with the Senate about these matters, and did foretell and prognosticate what should follow: but the Senate would not heare her, and made her to be driven away. Whereupon she went vnto the women, and made them see proofe of some things she vaunted of, and specially Marius wife, at whose feete she was set one day in assembly of the comon playes, to see y sword players fight for life & death: for she told her certainly which of them should ouercome. Wherupon this Lady fent her vnto her husband Marins, who made great reckoning of her, & carried her euer in a litter with him wherfoeuer he went. She was alwaies at Marius facrifices, apparelled in a gowne of purple in graine, clasped to her with claspes, & held a speare in her hand would all about with no legayes & garlands of flowers tied on with laces. This maner of gest made many doubt whether Marius shewed this woman openly, beleeuing indeed that she had the gift of prophecy : or else that knowing the contrary, he made as though he did beleeue it, to helpe her faining. But that which Alexander the MINDIAN wrote touching Vultures, is a thing greatly to be wondred at. For he faid, there were two of them followed Marius in his warres, and that they euer shewed themselues and missed not, when he should win any great battell, and that they did know them by lattin collars they ware about their neckes, which the fouldiers had tied about them, & afterwards let them go where they would: by reason whereof, they did know the souldiers againe, and it seemed also that they saluted them, and were very glad when they saw them, and perswaded themselues, that it was a signe and token of good luck to follow. Many signes & tokens were seene before the bartel: howbeit all the rest were ordinary sights, sauing that which was reported to be seene at TVDERTVM, and AMERIA, two cities of ITALY. For they say, there were seene speares & targets in the night, burning like fire in the clemet, which first were cared vp & downe here & there, and then met together euen as men moue and stir that fight one with another, vntill at the length, the one giving back, and the other following after, they all vanished away, & confumed towards the West. About the selfsametime also, there came from the city of PESSINVNTA, Barabaces, the chiefe priest of the great mother of the gods, who brought newes, that the goddesse had spoken to him within her sanctuary, and told him that the victory of this war should fall out on the ROMAINE's side. The Senate beleeved it, & ordained that they should build a temple vnto the goddesse, to give her thanks for the victory which she did promise the. Barabaces also would have presented himselfe vnto the people in open assembly, to tell them as much. But there was one Aulus Pompeius a Tribune, that wold not suffer him to do it, calling him tumbler or iugler, & violently thrust him behind the pulpit for orations: but the mischance that fell vpon Pompeius afterwards, made them the more to beleeue Barabaces words. For Pompeius y Tribune no sooner came home to his house, but a great vehement ague tooke him, whereoshe died the seuenth day after, as all the world could witnesse. Now the TEVTONS perceiuing that Marius stirred notatall out of his campe, they proued to assault him: how beit they were so well received with shotand slings, that after they had lost certaine of their men, they gave it over, and determined to go further, perfwading themselues that they might easily passe the Alpes without danger. Wherefore truffing vp all their baggage, they passed by Marius campe: at which time it appeared more certainly then before, that they were a maruellous great multitude of people, by y length of time which they took to passetheir way. For it is said, they were passing by his camp fill, Maries alforaifed his campe, and followed them faire and foftly foot by foot, and ever kept hard at their taile as neare as he could, alwaies fortifying his campe very well, and euer chufing firong places of fituation & advantage to lodge in that they might be fafe in the night time. So they marched on in this fort, vntill they came vnto the city of A1x, fro whence they had not far togo, but they entred straight into the mountaines of the Alpes: wherfore Marius prepared now to fight with them, and chose out a place that was very strong of situation to lodge his campe in, howbeit there lacked water. And they fay he did it of purpose, to the end to quicken his mens Marine courage the more thereby. Many repined at it, and told him that they should stand in great danger to abide maruellous thirst if they lodged there. Whereunto he made answer: shewing them dier, and the riner that ran hard by the enemies campe, faying withall, That they must go thither and buy drinke with their bloud. The fouldiers replied againe: And why then do ye not leade vs thither, whilest our bloud is yet moist? He gently answered them againe: Because the first thing we do, we must fortifie our campe. The fouldiers thought hey were angry with him, yet they obeyed him: but the flaucs having neither drinke for themselues, nor for their cattell, gathered together agreat troupe of them, and went towards the river: fome of them carying axes, other hatchets, other fwords & speares, with their pots to carry water, determining to fight with the barbarous people, if other wife they could not come by it. A few of the barbarous people at the first fought with them, because the most part of their company were at dinner, after they had bathed, and others were still in the bathe washing themselves, finding in that place many springs of hot natural bathes. Thus the ROMAINES found many of the barbarous people making merrie, and taking their pleasure about these bathes, for the great delight they took to consider the pleasantnesse of the place: but when they heard the noise of them that fought, they began to runne one after another unto the place from whence the noise came. Wherefore it was a hard thing for Marius any longer to keepe the ROMAINE fouldiers in from going to their helpe, for that they feared their flaues should have bene slaine of the barbarous people; and moreover, because the valiantest soldiers of their enemies, called the Ambrons (who before had ouercome Manlius and Catio, two ROMAINE Captaines with their armies, and that made of themselves thirty thousand fighting men)ran to armes, being very heavy of their bodies, as having filled their bellies well, but other wife valiant & couragious fellowes, and more lively then they had wont to be, by reason of the wine they had drunk. They ran not furioufly to fight out of order, neither did they cry out confuledly, but marching all together in good array, making a noife with their harnefle all after one fort, they oft rehearsed their owne name, Amerons, Amerons, Amerons: which was, either to call one another of the or else to feare the Romain Eswith their name only. The Italians also on the other fide, being the first that came downeto fight with them, were the LIGVRIANS, dwelling upon the coaft of Genva, who hearing this noise & cric of theirs, plainely understanding them:answered them againe with y like noise & cry, LIGVRIANS, LIGVRIANS, LIGVRIA Ans, laying, that it was the true furname of all their nation. And so before they joyned together. this cry was redoubled many a time on either fide: and the Captaines of both parts made their fouldiers crie out all together, conteding for enuy one against another, who shold cry it loudest. This contention of crying, inflamed the fouldiers courages the more. Now the AMBRONS hauing the river to passe, were by this meanes put out of order, & before they could put themselves in battell ray againe, after they had passed the river, the Liornians ran with great fury to set upvpon these barbarous people, and compelled them by this meanes to turne their backes, & flie.

pon the foremost and after them, (to aide the LIGVRIANS that had begun the charge) the Ro- Ambrons MAINES themselves fel also vpon the Amerons, coming downe from the places of advantage & Marius.

So the greatest slaughter they made, fortuned vponthe banke of the river, whereinto they thrust one another in such fort, that althe river ran bloud, being filled with dead bodies. And they that the Ambies

Furthermore, they thrust themselves amongst them that fought, & strone by force to plucke the Romaines targets out of their hands, & took hold of their naked fwords bare handed, abiding with an inuincible courage to be hacked and mangled with their fwords. And thus was the first battell given (as they fay) by the rivers fide, rather by chance vnlooked for, then by any fet purpose or through the Generals counsel. Now the Romains after they had ouercome themos part of the Ambrons, retiring backe by reason the night had ouertaken them, did not (as they were wont after they had given fuch an overthrow) fing fongs of victory & triumph, nor make good cheare in their tents one with another, and least of all sleepe: (which is the best & sweetest refreshing for men that have fought happily) but contrarily, they watched all that night with great feare and trouble, because their camp was not trenched & fortified, and because they knew also that there remained almost innumerable thousands of barbarous people, that had not yet fought: befides also, that the AMERONS that had fled & scaped from the overthrow, did howle out all night with loud cries, which were nothing like mens lamentations and fighes, but rather like wild beafts bellowing & roaring. So that the bellowing of fuch a great multitude of beaftly people, mingled together with threats and wailings, made the mountaines thereabouts and the running river to rebound againe of the found and eccho of their cries maruelloufly: by reason whereof, all the valley that lay betweene both, thundred to heare the horrible & fearefull trembling. This made the ROMAINE fouldiers afeard, & Marius himfelf in fome doubt because they looked to have bene fought withall the fame night, being altogether troubled and out of order, Notwithstanding, the barbarous people did not affault them that night, nor the next day following, but onely prepared themselves vnto battell. And in the meane time Marius knowing that there were about the place where they were camped certaine caues & little valleys couered with wood: he fecretly fent Glandius Marcellus thither with three thousand footmen well armed, and commanded him to keep close in ambush, vntil he saw that the barbarous people were fighting with him, and that then he should come and set vpon their rereward. The residue of his army, they supped when time came, and after supper reposed themselves. The next morning at the breake of day, Marius brought his men into the field out of his fort: where he put them in order of battell, sending his horsemen before to draw the enemies out to skirmish. The TEVTON'S seeing them come, had not the patience to tarie till the ROMAINES were come down into the plaine to fight without aduantage, but arming themselues in haste, and in a rage, ran vp the hilto the ROMAINES, where they stood in battel ray. Marius taking good regard to that they did, sent here and there vnto the private captaines, charging them they should not stir, and only to temporize & forbeare, vntil the enemies came within a ftones cast of them: and that they should then throw their darts at them, and afterwards draw their fwords, and repulse the barbarous people with their flields. For he did foresee, that when they should climbe vp against the hill (vponthe hanging whereof the ROMAINE'S had fet their battell) that their blowes would not be of ereat force, northeir order and ranks could stand close together to any effect or purpose: because they could not have fure footing, nor march affuredly, but would eafily be throwne backward if they were neuer fo litle repulfed by reason of the hanging of the hill. Marius gaue this order vntohis folke, and therewithal was himfelf the first man that put it in execution: for he was as trim a warrier, and as valiant a fouldier, as any man in all his army befides, not one among it them all would venture further, and be more bold then himselfe. So when the Romaine s had refisted them, & flaid them fodainly, going with fury to have won the hill, perceiving themfelues to be repulfed, they gave back by litle and litle, vntill they came into the field, and then began the foremost of them to gather together, & to put themselues in battel ray vpon the plaine, when sodainely they heard the noise and charging of them that were in the taile of their army. For Claudius Marcellus failed not to take the occasion when it was offered him because that the noise of the first charge coming vp against the hils thereabouts, under the which he lay in ambush, gaue him aductisement thereof: whereupon he caused his men presently to shew, & running with great cries, came to give a charge vpothose which were in the taile of the barbarous people, putting the hindmost to y fword. They made their fellowes whose backs were next vnto them, to turne their faces,& fo from man to man, till at the length in shorttime all their battell began to wauer in disorder.& they made no great refiftance, when they faw they were fo charged before & behind, but began straight to flie for life. The Romaine's following the hardat v heeles, killed & took prisoners & ambre. aboute a hundred thousand of them, & took moreouer their carts, their tents, & al their cartage. Which

Which the whole army by confent agreed to prefent vnto Marius, excepting nothing, faning that which was imbezelled and connecied away under hand. Now, though this was a maruellous honorable & right noble prefent, yet they thought it not a recompence fufficient for that he had deferued, for the valour he had shewed of a famous Captaine, in leading of his army, and for the good order he kept in this war: so happy thought they themselues to haue escaped so great a dager. Notwithstanding, some writers do not agree, that the spoile of the barbarous people was ginenvnto Marius: nor that there were also so great a number of men flaine as we have spoken of. Butthey fay, that after this battell, the MARSILIANS did inclose their vines, with hedges made of dead mens bones: and that the bodies being rotten and confumed upon the fields through thegreat raine that fell vpon them the winter following, the ground waxed fo fat, and did foake the greafe fo deepe in the fame, that the former following, they did beare an incredible quatity of all forts of fruits. And by this meanes were Archilocus words proued true, that the arable land doth wax fat with fuch rottennes or putrifaction. And it is faid alfo, that of ordinary after great Muchralus battels, there falleth great store of raine. Either it is by meane of some god, that powring downe nureraine water, doth purifie, wash, & cleanse the ground, defiled & polluted with mans bloud: bands, or else it happeneth by naturall cause; for that the overthrow of so many dead bodies, and of the bloud spilt, ingendreth a moist, grosse, and heavy vapor, which doth thicken the aire (that by narure is changeable, & easie to alter) from a very small or litle beginning, vnto an exceeding great change. After this battell, Marius caused the harnesse and spoiles of the barbarous people to be laid afide, that were left whole & faire to fight, to beautifie & enrich the pompe of his triumph. Then he caused the rest to be gathered together on a great heape, and laid vpon a stack of wood, tomake a noble facrifice vnto the gods, all his army being armed about him, crowned with garlands of triumph, & himfelfe apparelled in a long gowne of purple, according to the cuftome of the ROMAINES in fuch a case, & holding a torch burning in both his hands, which he first lifted vp vnto heaven. And as he was turning down y torch to put fireto the flacke of wood, they fave fome of his friends a good way off on horsebacke, coming post vnto him: then sodainely there wasa great filence made of al the affembly, enery man defirous to heare what good newes they had brought. When they were come and lighted off their horses, they ran straightto embrace Marius, and brought him newes that he was chosen Confull the fift time; and presented him the the fift time letters fent him from Rom a confirming the fame. And thus, this new ioy falling out befides the confirming victory, the private fouldiers did flew the great ioy and pleafure they tooke in both, with great shouts and beating upon their harnesse: and the Captaines also crowned Marius againe with new garlands of lawrel which they put about his head: & that done, he put fire under the flack of wood, and ended his facrifice. Burthat which neuer fuffereth men quietly to enjoy the good hap of any victory clearely, but in this mortal life doth euer mingle the ill with the good, be it either Fortune or spite of fatall destiny, or else the necessity of the naturall causes of earthly things: did shortly after this great toy bring news vnto Merius, of his companion Catulus Luctatius the other Coful, who was like a cloud in a faire bright day, & brought the city of Rome againe into a new feare & trouble. For Catulus that went against the CIMERES, thoughtit was not for him to keep the straights of the mountaines, in hope to let the barbarous people for passing : because that in so doing he had bene compelled to denide his army into many parts, & had weakened himselfe very much if he had taken that courfe. Wherefore coming a little on this fide the Alpestowards ITALY, he planted himselfe vpon the river of ATHESTS, and built a bridge vpon it, to passe and Athesis s. repasse ouer his men when he would; and set up at either end of the bridge two strong forts well fortified, that he might more commodiously helpe the places on the other side of the river, if the barbarous people by chance would offer to force them, after they had gotten out of the fraights of the mountaines. Now, these barbarous people had such a glory in themselues, and dildained their enemics fo much, that more to shew their force and boldnesse, then of any necesfity that compelled them, or for any benefit they got by it: they fuffered it to flow vponthem being starke naked, and did climbe up to the top of the mountaines, through great heapes of yec and fnow. And when they were at the very top of all, they laid their long broade targets vnder their bodies, and lay along vpon them, fliding downethe steepe high rockes, that had certaine hangings ouer of an infinite height. In the end, they came to the camp neare vnto the Romaines by the riners fide, and confidered how they might paffe it ouer: and began to fill it vp, tearing downe(like giants) great hils of earth which they found thereabouts brought thither great trees which they pulled vp whole by the rootes; threw in great peeces of rockes which they brake. & whole towers of earth after them, to ftop and breake the course of the river. But besides all this. they threw great timber into the river, which being carried downethe streame, came with such a force, & hit against the posts of the bridge so violently, that they shaked the Romaines bridge maruelloufly. Whereupon many of the fouldiers of the great campe were afraid, and for faking ir, began to retire. But then did Catulus, like a perfect good Captaine shew, that he made lesse count of his owne private honour and estimation, then he did of the generall honour of all his fouldiers. For feeing that he could not perfivade his men by any reason to tarrie, and that in this feare they diflodged in diforder against his will; he himself commanded the standard bearer of the Eagle to march on, and ran to the foremost that went their way, & marched himself before them all, to the intent that the shame of this retire should altogether light upon him, and nor vpon his countrey: and that it might appeare the Romaine's did follow their captaine, & not flie away. The barbarous people therfore affaulting the fort at y end of the bridge of the river of A. THESIS, took it, and all the men that were in it. And because the ROMAINES defended it like vall. ant men, and had luftily ventured their lines to the death for defence of their country: the barbarous people let them go vpon composition, which they sware to keepe faithfully, by their Bul of copper. This Bull afterwards was taken when they loft the battell, and carried (as they fay jinto Catulus Luctatins house, as the chiefest thing of the victory. Furthermore, the barbarous people finding the country open without any defence, scattered here and there, and destroyed all where they came. Wherupon the ROMAINES fent for Marius to ROME to go against them: & after he was arrived, every man thought he should have entred in triumph, because also the Senatedia grant it him very willingly. But he would not doe it, either because he would not depriuchis fouldiers and the captaines that had fought under him, of any part of the honour that was due vnto them, they being abfent for because that he would warrant the people from the presentager they were in, by laying afide the glory of his former victories, into the hands of the good fortune of Rome, in certaine hope to take it againe afterwards, by a more honorable and perfect confirmation of the second. Wherefore after he had made an oration to the people and Senate. Elaring according to the time, he went his way immediatly towards Catalus Luctatius, whose comming eth towards did comfort him much: and fent also for his army that was yet in GAVLE beyond the moun-Luilating to taines. And after his army was come, he paffed the river of Po, to keepe the barbarous people from hurring ITALY on this fide the Po. Now the CIMERES ftill deterred to give battell, because they looked for the Tevross, & said: that they maruelled much what they meant to tarry fo long either because they knew not indeed of their ouerthrow, or else for that they would not feeme to know it, because they handled them cruelly that brought the newes of their deaths. At the length, they fent vnto Marius to aske him lands and towne sufficient to keepe them and their brethren. Marius asked their Ambassadors what brethren they meant. They answeredthat they were the Tavrons. Whereat the flanders by began to laugh: and Marius finely mocked the timbres them, faying: Care not for those brethren, said he, for we have given the ground enough, which they will keepe for euer. These Ambassadors found his mocke straight, and began to reuileand threaten him, that the CIMERES flould prefently make him repent it, & the TEVTONS fo foone as they arrived. Why faid Marius vnto them againe, they are come already; and there wereno honefty in you, if you should go your way & not falute them, fince they are your brethren. And as he spake these words, he commanded his mento bring him the kings of the Tevrons boud and chained, that had bene taken within the mountaines of the Alpes by the Sequant. The CIMER ES vnderstanding this by report of their Ambassadors, presently marched towards Marius, who stirred not at all, but onely fortified and kept his campe. They say, that it was forthis battel that Marius first inveted the new device he brought in for the dart which the ROMAINES were wont alwaies to throw against the enemies at the first charge. For before the staffe of the dart was fastened vnto the yron, and the yron vnto the staffe, with two litle yron pins that passed through the wood: and then Marius left one of the yron pins as it was before, and taking away the other, put a litle thin pin of wood eafle to be broken, in place of the fame; making it craftily, to the end that when the dart was throwne, and stucke in the enemies target, it should not thand right forward, but bow downewards towards the yron, that the woodden pin being broken, the staffe of the dart should hang downewards, holding yet by the yron pin running quite through at the point. fmall number of horsemen, sent him defiance, and willed him to appoint a day & place for battell, that they might trie it out, who should be owners of the country. Whereunto Marin, made answer, that it was not the manner of the Romaines to counsel with their enemies, of the time and place when they should give battell: but neuerthelesse, he would not sticke to pleasure the CIMERES so much. And thus they agreed betweene them, that it should be the third day sollowing, in the plaine of Verselles, which was very commodious for the horsemen of the Ro-MAINES: and also for the barbarous people to put out at will their great number of fighting men. So both armies failed not to meete according to appointment, but appeared ranged in battell, the one before the other. Catulus Luctatius the other Conful, had in his campetwenty thoufand, and three hundred fouldiers: and Marius had in his campe two and thirty thousand fighting men, which he placed in the two wings of the battell, shutting in Catules with his men in fand and threebun. the midst; as Sylla writeth it, who was present at the same: saying, that Marius didit of malice, dred men for the hope he had to ouerthrow his enemies with the two wings of the battell, to the end that the whole victory should light vpon his two wings, and that Catulus and his men in the midst Catulus. should have no part thereof. For he could not so much as front the enemic, because that commonly when the front of a battell is of such a breadth, the two wings are euer stretched out before, and are made like the creffant of a moone, where the middeft is thickeft & farthest in. And it is writtenalfo in other stories, that Catulus himselfeaccusing the malice of Marius, because he did fo, spake it to excuse his owne dishonour. As for the CIMBRES, the troupes of their footmen 7 be bastell coming out of their fortes leifurely, did put themselves into a squadron, as broade as long, for of the circumstance of the ci in enery fide they occupied almost thirty furlong:but their horsemen, which were fifteene thoufand, marched before in fumptuous furniture. For they had helmets on their heads fashioned like wild beaftsnecks, and strange beuers or buffes to the same, and ware on their helmets great high plumes of feathers, as they had bene wings: which to fight made them appeare taller and bigger men then they were. Furthermore, they had good curaces on their backs, & carried great white targets before them: and for weapons offenflue, euery man had two darts in his hand to bestow afar off, and when they came to hand strokes, they had great heavy swords, which they fought withall neare hand. But at that time they did not march directly in ranke against thearmy of the ROMAINES, but turned a litle on the right hand, meaning to inclose the ROMAINES betweene them and their footmenthat were on the left hand. The ROMAINE Captaines found their policy straight, but they could not keepe their fouldiers back; for there was one that cried, The enemies fled, and immediatly all the rest began to run after. In the meane time, the sootmen of the barbarous people that were like to a sea before them, came forwards still: and then Marius hauing washed his hands, and lifting them to heaven, promised and vowed a solemne facrifice vito the gods of an hundred oxen. Catulus also made a vow, lifting vp his hands to heaven in like manner, that he would build a temple vnto Fortune for that day; and it is reported, that M_{4*} rius having facrifised, when they shewed him the intrails of the beasts sacrificed, he cried out aloud, The victory is mine, But when they came to give the charge, Marius had a great misfortune happened him, powred vpon him by Gods instice, who turned his crast against himselfe, as Sylla writerh: for there rose very credibly so great a dust, that both armies lost the sight one of A dost rain fed that another. And hereupon Marins being the first that ranto begin the charge, and having placed seither are his men about him, missed to meete with his enemies: and being passed beyond their battell, mr could wandred a great while vp and downe the field, whileft the barbarous people fought against Ca- fis one ano. tulus. So that the greatest fury of the battel was against Catulus and his army: in the which Sylla writeth he was himself, and faith, that the heate and the Sun which was full in the CIMERBS faces, did the Romaines maruellous pleasure at that time. For the barbarous people being very full in the hard brought was to a supply the combines of the complete supply the combines of the c hard brought vp to away with cold (because they were borne and bred in a cold country, fli2- faces. dowed altogether with woods and trees, as we have faid) were to the contrary very tender against the heate, & did melt with sweating against the Sun, and gaped straight for breath, putting their targets before their faces; for it was also in the heart of Summer, about the seuen - The field tieth day of the moneth of July that his battell was given; & this dust also made the ROMAINES the bolder, and kept them that they could not see the innumerable multitude of their enemies. the bolder, and kept them that they could not fee the innumerable multitude of their enemies far from them. And every man running to fet vpon them that came against him, they were joyned together in fight, before that the fight of their enemies could make them afraid. And furthermore, they were fo good fouldiers, and fo able to take paines, that how extreme foeuer the heate was, no man was seene sweate nor blow, though they ran at the first to set vpon them; and this hath Catulus Luctatius himself left in writing vnto the praise of his soldiers. So were the most part of the barbarous people, and specially of the best fouldiers, slaine in the field. And because they should not open and breake their rankes, the formost ranks were al tied and bound together with girdles, leather thongs, and long chaines of iron; and they that fled, were chased and followed into their campe by the Romaines, where they met with horrible & feareful things to behold. For, their wives being vpon the top of their carts, apparelled all in black, flue all those that fled, without regard of perions: some their fathers, other their husbands or their brethren. and strangling the little young babes with their owne hands, they cast them vnder the care wheeles, and betweene the horse legs, and afterwards slue themselues. And they say, that there was a woman hanged at the end of a cart ladder, having hanged vp two of her children by the neckes at her heeles. And that the men also, for lacke of a tree to hang themselues on, tyed slipping halters about their neckes, vnto the hornes and feete of the oxen, and that they did pricke them afterwards with goadestomake them fling and leape folong, that dragging them all about and treading them vnder feete, at the length they killed them. Now though numbers were flaine by this meane, yet were there threefcore thousand of them taken prisoners, and the number of them that were flaine, came to twife as many mo. In this manner Marius fouldiers spoiled the campe of the CIMBRES : but the spoiles of dead men that were staine in the field, with their enfignes and trumpets, were all brought (as it is faid) vnto Catulus campe, which was a plainetestimonieto shew that Catulus and his souldiers had wonthe field. Strife rising thus betweenethe fouldiers of both campes about it: that the matter might be tried friendly betweene them, they made y ambassadors of Parma their arbitrators, who were by chance at that time in the army. Catulus Luctatius foldiers led the ambassadors to the place where y ouerthrow was given, shewing them the enemies bodies pierced through with their pikes, which were easie to be knowne, because Catulus had made them graue their name vpon their pikes. For al this, Marius wentaway with the honor of this great victory, as wel for the first battel he wan alone, when he ouerthrew Mighterer the Tevrons and the Ambrons, as for his great calling, having bene Conful fluctimes. And furthermore, the common people at Rome, called him the third founder of the city of Rome, thinking themselues now deliuered from as great a danger, as before time they had bene from the ancient GAVLES. And cuery man feasting at home with his wife &children, offered the best dishes of meat they had to supper, vnto the gods, and vnto Marius: and would needs have him alone to triumph for both victories. But he would not in any case, but triumphed into the city with Catulus Luctains, meaning to shew himself courteous and moderate in so great prosperity: and peraduenture also fearing Catulus souldiers, who were in readinesse and prepared (if Marins would have deprived their captaine of that honor) to let him also of his triumph. And thus you fee how he passed his fifth Consulship. After that, he made more earnest sute for the sixth Cofulfhip, then euer any other did for his first seeking the peoples good wils by al the faire meanes he could to please them, humbling himselfe vnto them, not only more then became his estate & calling, but directly also against his own nature, counterfeiting a curteous popular maner, being cleane contrary to his disposition. His ambition made him timorous to deale in matters of the state concerning the city. For that courage and boldnes which he had in battell against the enemy, he lost it quite when he was in an assembly of people in the city: & was casily put out of his bias, with the first blame or praise he heard given him. And though they report, that on a time whe he made a thousand CAMERINES free of the city of Rome, because they had done valiant feruice in the wars, that there were fome that did accuse him, saying, that it was a thing done against all law he answered them, that for the noise of the armor, he could not heare the law. Notwithstanding, it seemeth that indeed he was greatly afeard of the fury of the people in an assembly of the city. For in time of wars, he euer frood vpon his reputation & authority, knowing that they had need of him: but in peace and ciuill gouernment, because he would rather be the chiefest man then the honestest man, he would creepe into the peoples bosomes to get their fauor & goodwill. And thus through his euill behauior, he brought all the Nobility generally to be his enemics. But he feared nor mistrusted none so much, as he did Metellus, for the great vnthankful part he remembred he had plaid him: & the rather also, because he knew him to be a just & true dealing man, and one that was euer against these people-pleasers and flatterers. Marius thereple pleafers fore practifed all the waies he could, to get Metellus to be banished Rome. Wherfore, to compasse his intent, he fell in friendship with Glaucia and one Saturninus, two of the most bold. most desperate, and most hairebraind your menthat were in all Rome, who had all the rabblement of rogues and beggers, and fuch tumultuous people at their commandement: by whose meanes he made new popular lawes, & caused the fouldiers to be called home out of the wars, and mingled them with the people of the city in common assemblies, to trouble and vexe Metellus. Morcouer Rutilius, an honest and true writer, (howbeit an enemie vnto Marius) writerh, that he obtained his fixth Confulfhip by corruption of mony, which he caused to be distributed amongst the tribes of the people: and that he bought it for ready money to put by Metellus, and to haue Valerius Flaceus not for his fellow and companion in the Confulfhip, but rather for a Flaceus minister of his will. There was never Romaine to whom the people granted the Confossibility confossibility fixetimes, except it were vnto Valerius Corninus only. But for him, they fay that there was fine Marine and forty yeares betweene his first Consulship & the last. Where Marius since the first yeare of time, his Confulfhip, continued five yeares together by good fortune one after another. But in his Falcium last Consulfhip, he wanne himselse great hate and malice, because he did many soule faults to fixetimes please Saturninus withall: as amongst others, when he bare with Saturninus, who murdered No. conful. nius his competitor in the Tribuneship, Afterwards when Saturninus was chosen Tribune of the people, he preferred a law for distribution of the lands among the common people, and vnto that law he had specially added one article: that all the Lords of the Senate should come openly for the to sweare, that they should keepe and observe from point to point, that which the people by . ethosof the their voices should decree and should not deny it in any iote. But Marius in open Senate, made confirme as though he wold withstand this article, saying, that neither he nor any other wise man of judg- what the ment would take this oath: for faid he, if the law be cuill, then they should doe the Senate open food and the senate ope wrong to compell them by force to grant it, and not for their owne good wils. But he spake not by roice that, meaning to do as he faid: for it was but a bait he had laid for Metellus only, which he could doubte dea, hardly escape. For, imagining that to tell a fine lye, was a peece of vertue, and of a good wit: he ling. was throughly resoluted with himself, not to passe for any thing he had spoken in the Senate. And To liveur. to the corrary also, knowing wel inough that Metellus was a grave wise man, who esteemed that to be instructed and supplies the beginning and supplies the desired and supplies the desired and supplies the desired and supplies the beginning and supplies the supplies the desired and supplies the d to be instand true (as Pindarus said) is the beginning and foundation of great vertue: he thought to be instantion of great vertue: he would ouerreach him, making him affirm before the Senate that he would not five are, know- 4 vertue. ing also that the people would hate him deadly, if he would refuse afterwards to sweare. And so indeed it happened. For Metellus having affured them that he would not five are, the Senate brake vp vpon it. And shortly after, Saturninus the Tribune calling the Senators ynto the pulpit for orations, to compell them to sweare before the people: Marsus went thither to offer himselfe to sweare. Whereupon the people making silence, listened attentively to heare what he would say. But Marius not regarding his large promise and brags made before the Senate, said then, his necke was not fo long that he would prejudice the common-wealth in a matter of fo great importance: but that he would fweare, and obey the law, if it were a law. This shifting subtilty he added to it, to cloke and couer his shame; and when he had said so, he tooke his oth. The people fecing him sweare, were maruellous glad, and praised him with clapping of their hands: but the Nobility hanging downe their heads, were ashamed of him, and were maruellous angrie in their hearts with him, that he had so cowardly & shamefully gone from his word. Therupon all the Senatetooke their othes, one after another against their wils, because they were a- folicie caufraid of the people fauing Metellus, whom, neither parents, nor friends perswasion and intreaty could once moue to sweare, for any punishment that Saturnings had imposed upon them which Matelline refused to take the oath, but continued one man still according to his nature, and would never confiant in yeeld vnto it, offering to abide any paine, rather then to be brought to cofent to a dishonest matter vnbeseeming his estate. And therupon went out of the assembly, and talking with them that did accompany him, told them, that to do cuill it was too eafie a thing : and to do good without Moellas danger, it was also a common matter; but to do well with danger, that was the part of an honest and vertuous man. Saturninus then commanded the Confuls by edict of the people, that they should banish Metellus by found of trumpet, with special commandement, that no man should between the state of the state o let him hauefire nor water, nor lodge him prinarely nor openly. The common people, they were ready to haue fallen vpon him, and to haue killed him: but the noblemen being offended for the iniurie they had offered him, gathered together about him to faue him, if any would offer him violence. Metellus himfelf was fo good a man, that he wold not any civill diffentio should rise for his sake and therefore he absented himself from Rome, wherein he did like a wise man. For faid he, either things will amend, and the people then repenting themselues of the wtone they have done me, will call me home againe; or elie things standing as they do now, it shall be best for me to be furthest off. But for his trauell in his exile, how much he was beloued and honoured, and how sweetly he passed his time studying Philosophie in the citie of R HODES, shall be declared more at large in his life. Now on the other fide, Marius to recompence the pleasure Saturninus had done him, being driven to let him have his will in all things, did not foresee what an intollerable plague he brought vnto the commonwealth, given the bridle to a desperatman. who enery way, by force, by fword and murder, plainely fought to vsurpe tyrannicall power. with the vtter destruction and subuersion of the whole commonwealth. And so bearing reue. rence on the one fide vnto the Nobility, and defiring on the other fide to gratifie the common people: he played a shamefull part, and shewed himself a double dealing man. For one night the Nobility and chiefest citizens coming to his house, to perswade him to bridle Saturnians insolencie and boldnesse: at the selfe same time also Saturninus going thither to speake with him, he caused him to be let in at a backe doore, the noble men not being priny to his coming. And so Marius telling the Nobility, and then Saturninus, that he was troubled with a loofeneffe of his body, under his pretence whipped up and downe, now to the one, then to the other, and didnothing else but set them further out one against another, then they were before. Neuertheles, the Senat being maruellous angry with his naughty double dealing, and the order of knights taking part with the Senate, Marius in the end was compelled to arme the people in y market place, to suppresse them that were vp, and draue them into the Capitoll: where for lacke of water, they were compelled to yeeld themselues at the length, because had cut off the pipes & conduits. by the which the water ranvnto the Capitol. By reason whereof, they being vnable to continue any longer, called Marins vnto them, and yeelded themselues to him, vnder the assurance of the faith of the common people. But although Marius did what he could possible to his vetermost power to faue them, he could not preuaile, nor do them pleasure: for they were no sooner come downe into the market place, but they were all put to death. Wherupon he having now purchafed himself the ill will of the people & Nobility both, when time came about that new Censors should be chosen, every man looked that he would have bene one of the suters: howbeit he sued not for it, for feare of repulse, but suffered others to be chosen of far lesse dignity & calling then himselse. Wherein notwithstanding he gloried, saying, that he would not suc to be Censor, because he would not have the ill will of many, for examining too straightly their lives and manners. Againe, a decree being preferred to repeale Metellus banishment, Marius did what he could possible by word and deed to hinder it: howbeit, seeing in the end he could not have his will he let it alone. The people having thus willingly revoked Metellus banishment, Marius heart would not serue him to see Metellus returne againe, for the malice he bare him: wherefore he tookethe seas to go into Cappadocia & Galatia, vnder colour to pay certaine sacrifices to ý mother of the gods, which he had vowed vnto her. But this was not the very cause that made him to vndertake this journy, for he had another fecret meaning in it. For his nature not being framed to live in peace, and to governe civil matters, and having attained to his greatnes by armes, & supposing that his glory and authority confumed and decreased altogether living idlely in peace, he fought to deuise new occasion of wars; hoping if he could stir vp the kings of As 1A, & specially Mubridates, (who without his procurement was feared much, that one day he would make wars against the Romaines) that he should then vidoubtedly without let of any man be chofen Generall to make wars with him; and withall also, that by that meanes he should have occation to fill the city of Rome with new triumphs, & his house with the spoiles of the great kingdome of Pont, and with the riches of the king. Now Mithridates disposing himselfe to enterraine Marius, with all the honor and curtefies he could possible shew him: Marius in the end notwithstanding would not once give him a good looke, nor a courteous word againe, but churlishly faid vnto Mithridates at his departure from him: Thou must determine one of these two, king Mithridates: either to make thy felfe stronger then the Romaines, or else to looke to do what they command thee, without refistance. These words amazed Mithridates, who had heard fay before, that y ROMAINES would speake their minds freely: how beit he neuer saw nor proued it before, vntill that time. After Marius was returned vnto Rome, he built a house neare vnto the market place, because he would not (as he said himselfe) that such as came vnto him, should trouble theselues in going far to bring him home to his house; or else for that he thought this would be an occasion that diverse would come to salute him, as they did other Senatours. Howbeit, that was not the cause indeed but the only cause was, for that he had no natural grace nor civility to entertain me curreoufly that came vnto him, & that he lacked behaviour besides to rule a commonwealth: and therefore in time of peace they made no more reckoning of him then they did of an old rufty harnesse or implement, that was good for nothing but for the wars only. And for all other that professed armes as himselfe did, no man gricued him so much to be called forward to office and state before himselfe, as Sylladid. For he was ready to burst for fpite, to see that the noblemendid all what they could to prefer Sylla, for the malice and ill will they bare him: and that syllaes first rising and preferment grew, by the quarrels and contentions he had with him. And specially when Bocchus king of NVMIDIA was proclaimed by the Senate, a friend & confederate of the ROMAINE people, he offered up flatues of victories, carrying tokens of triumph into the temple of the Capitoll: and placed neare vnto them also, an image of gold of king Ingurth, which he delinered by his own hands vnto Sylla. And this made Ararius Thesans fark mad for spite & iclousie, who could not abide that another should take vpon him the glory of his doings infomuch as he determined to plucke those images downe, and to cary them a- town Maway by force. Sylla on the other fide from ached Marius, and would not fuffer him to take them sylla out of the place where they were for hearthing in 11 fedicing he dealers at 12 hours of the place where they were for hearthing in 11 fedicing he dealers at 12 hours of the place where they were for hearthing in 11 fedicing he dealers at 12 hours of the place where they were for hearthing in 11 fedicing he dealers at 12 hours of the place where they were for hearthing in 11 fedicing he dealers at 12 hours of the place where they were for hearthing in 11 fedicing he dealers at 12 hours of the place where they were for hearthing in 11 fedicing he dealers at 12 hours of the place where they were for hearthing in 11 fedicing he dealers at 12 hours of the place where they were for hearthing in 11 fedicing he dealers at 12 hours of the place where they were for hearthing in 11 fedicing he dealers at 12 hours of the place where they were for hearthing in 11 fedicing he dealers at 12 hours of the place where they were for hearthing in 11 fedicing he dealers at 12 hours of the place where they were for hearthing in 11 fedicing he dealers at 12 hours of the place where they were for hearthing in 11 fedicing he dealers at 12 hours of the place where the place where they were for the place where the pl out of the place where they were: fo that this civill fedition had taken prefent effect, had not the warres of their confederates fallen out betweene, and restrained them for a time. For the best fouldiers and most warlike people of all ITALY, and of greatest power, they all together rose against the Romaines, and had welneare ouerthrowne their whole Empire. For they were not The war of onely of great force and power, and well armedibut their Captaines alfo, for valiantnes & skill, the confede. did in manner equal the worthines of the Romaines. For this war fel out wonderfully, by reafon of the calamity and misfortune that happened in it: but it wanne Sylls as much fame and reputation, as it did Marius shame and dishonour. For he shewed himselfe very cold and slow in al his enterprifes, still delaying time, either because age had mortified his active heate, and killed that quicke leady disposition of body that was wont to be in him, being then about threescore and fine yeares old: or else as he said himself, because he was waxen gowty, and had ache in his veines and finewes, that he could not well stirre his body, and that for shame: because he would not tary befind in this war, he did more then his yeares could away withall. Not with standing, as he was, yet he wanne a great battell, wherein were flaine fixe thousand of their enemies: and folong as the wars endured, he neuer gaue them advantage of him, but patiently suffered them fometime to intrench him, and to mocke him, and give him vile words, challenging him out to fight, & yet all this would not proubke him. It is faid also, that Pompedius Silo, who was the chiefest Captaine of reputation and authority the enemies had, faid vnto Marius on a time: If thou silves flour be Marius, fogreat a Captaine as they fay thou art, leaue thy campe & come out to batell. Nay, and Marius, find, against bling against 15 should be a source Captains and Marius faid Marius to him againe: If thou be a great Captaine, plucke me out by the cares, and compell me to come to battell. Another time when the enemies gaue them occasion to give a great charge vpon them with aduantage: the Romains were faint hearted, and durst not set vpon them. Wherefore, after both the one and the other were retired, Marius caused his men to affemble, and spake vnto them in this fort: I cannot tell which of the two I should recken most cowards:you your felues, or your enemies: for they durft not once fee your backes, nor you them in the faces. In the end not with standing, he was compelled to refigne his charge, being able to ferue no longer for the weaknesse and debility of his body. Now all the rebels of ITALY being put downe, many at Rome (by the orators meanes) did fue to have the charge of the warres against Mithridates: and among them, a Tribune of the people called Sulpitius, (a very bold and rashman) beyond all mens hope and opinion preferred Marius, and perswaded them to gine him the charge of these wars, with title & authority of Vice-consul. The people therupon were deuided in two parts: for the one fide stood for Marius, and the other would have sylla take the charge, faying, that Marius was to thinke now vpo the hot baths at Baies, to look to cure his old body, brought low with rewme and age, as himfelfe faid. For Marins had a goodly stately house in those parts neare vnto the mount of Misene, which was far more fine and curiously furnished Mon Misthen became a Captaine that had bene in fo many foughten battels and dangers. They say Jenum. that Cornelia afterwards bought that fine house for the summe of seuenthousand fine hundred crownes; and shortly after alfo, Lucullus bought it agains for two hundred and sistie thousand crownes: to fo great excesse was vanity and curiosity growne in very short time at Rome. Notwithstanding all this, Marius too ambitiously striving like a passioned young man against the weaknesse and debility of his age, neuer missed day but he would be in the field of Mars to exercise himselfamong the young men, shewing his body disposed and ready to handle all kind of weapons, and to ride horses: albeit that in his later time, he had no great health of body because he was very heavy and sad. There were that liked that passing wek in him, and went of ourpose into the field to see what paines he tooke, striuing to excell the rest. How beit those of the better fort were very forry to fee his auarice and ambition, confidering specially, that being of a poore man become very rich, and of a right meane persona great estate, that he could not now containe his prosperity within reasonable bounds, nor yet content himselfe to be esteemed and honored, quietly enjoying all he had wonne, and which at that present he did possesse: but as if he had bene very poore and needy, after he had received fuch great honor and triumphs, would yet carry out his age so stoutly, even into CAPPADOCTA, and vnto the realme of Pont, to goe fight there against Archelaus, and Neoptolemus, Lieurenants of king Mithridates. Indeed he alledged some reasons to excuse himselfe, but they were altogether vaine: for he said that he defired in person to bring up his sonne in exercise of armes, and to teach him the discipline of warres. That discouered the secret hidden plague, which of long time had lurked in Rome, Man rius specially having now met with a fit instrument and minister to destroy the commonwealth. which was the infolent and rash Sulpitius: who altogether followed Saturninus doings, fauing that he was found too cowardly and faint-hearted in all his enterprises and for that did Marius iustly reproue him. Bur Sulpitius, because he would not dally nor delay time, had ener fixehun. Salvitius gard of fix dred young gentlemen of the order of knights, whom he vsed as his guard about him, and called them the guard against the Senate. And one day as the Consuls kept their common assembly in knights. Sulpitius boldnesse. the market place, Sulpitius coming in armed vpon them, made them both take their heeles, and get them packing; and as they fled, one of the Confuls fons being taken tardy, was flaine. Sylla being the other Confull, and perceiuing that he was followed hard at hand vnto Marius house, ranne into the same against the opinion of all the world: whereof they that ran after him not being aware, passed by the house. And it is reported that Marius himselfe conucyed Sylla safely out at a backe doore, and that he being scaped thus, went vnto his campe. Notwithstanding, Sills himselse in his commentaries doth not say, that he was faued in Marius house when he fled: but that he was brought thither to give his confent vnto a matter which Sulpitius would have forced him vnto against his will, presenting him naked swords on every side. And he writethalso, that being thus forcibly brought vnto Marins house, he was kept there in this feare, vntill such time as returning into the market place, he was compelled to reuoke againe the adiornment of iu. flice, which he and his companion by edict had commanded. This done, Sulpitius then being the stronger, caused the commissions and charge of this war against Mithridates to be affigued vinto Marius by the voice of the people. Therefore Marius giving order for his departure, fent two of his Colonels before to take the army of Sylla: who having won his fouldiers hearts before, and stirred them vp against Marius, brought them on with him directly towards Rome, being no lesse then five and thirty thousand fighting men: who setting vpon the Captaines Marins had fent vnto them, flue them in the field. In reuenge whereof Marius againe in Rome put many of Syllaes friends and followers to death, and proclaimed open liberty by found of trumpet, to all flaues and bondmen that would take armes for him: but there were neuer but three fedition. only that offered themselves. Wherupon, having made a little refusance vnto Sylla when he came into Rome, he was foone after compelled to run his way. Marius was no fooner out of the city, but they that were in his company forfaking him, differfed themselnes here and there being darke night: and Marius himfelfegotto a house of his in the country, called Salonium, and sent his sonne to one of his father in law Mutius farmes, not far from thence, to make some prouision for victuals. But Marius in the meane time, went before to Ostra, where one of his friends Numerius had prepared him a ship, in the which he imbarked immediatly, not tarrying for his son, and hoiffed faile, having only Granius his wives sonne with him. In the meane time the yonger Marius being at his father in law Mutius farme, staied so long in getting of provision, in trussing of it vp, & carying it away, that broad day light had like to have discovered him: for the enemies had aduertisement whither he was gone, wherupon certaine horsemen were sentthither suppofing to have found him. But the keeper of the house having an inckling of their comming, and preventing them also before they came, sodainly yoked his oxe to the cart, which he loded with beanes, & hid this yonger Marins under the same. And pricking the oxe forward with his goade. fer out, & met them as they went towards the city, & delivered Marins in this fort into his wives house; and there taking such things as he needed, when the night following came, went towards the fea, & took ship, finding one crosse-failed, bound towards Afrik E. Marius the father failing Marins on still, had avery good wind to point along the coast of ITALY: notwithstanding, being afraid the fonne of one Geminius, a chiefe man of TERRACINE, who hated him to the death, he gaue the mariners direction warning therof betimes, and willed them to take heed of landing at TERRACINE. The mariners were very willing to obey him, but the wind stood full against them comming from the maine, which raised a great storme, exthey feared much that their vessel which was but a boate, would not brooke the feas befides that he himfelfe was very ficke in his ftomacke, and fore feabeaten: notwithstanding at the length with the greatest difficulty that might be, they recovered the coast ouer against the city of CIRCES. In the meane time, the storme increased still, & their victuals failed them: whereupon they were compelled to land, and went wandring vp & downe not knowing what to do nor what way to take. But as it falleth out commonly in fuch like cafes of extremity, they thought it alwaies the best safety for them, to slie from the place where they were, and to hope of that which they faw not: for if the lea were their enemy, the land was fo likewife. To meete with men, they were afraid; and not to meete with them on the other fide lacking victuals, was indeede the greater danger. Neuertheleffe, in the end they met with heard-men that could give them nothing to cate, but knowing Marins, warned him to get him out of the way as foone as he could possible, because it was not long since that there passed by a great troupe of horsemen that sought him all about. And thus being brought vnto such perplexity, that he knew not where to bestow himselfe, and specially for that the poore men he had in his companie were almost starued for hunger; he got out of the high way notwithstanding, and fought out a very thicke wood, where he paffed all that night in great forrow, and the next morning being compelled of necessity, determined yet to employ his body before all his strength failed. Thus he wandred on along the sea coast, still comforting them that followed him the best he could, and praying them not to despaire, but to referre themselues to him, even vntill the lasthope, trusting in certaine prophesics which the Soothsayers had told him of long time before. For when he was but very young, and dwelling in the countrey, he gathered vp Marian inthe lap of his gowne, the ayric of an Eagle, in the which were scuen young Eagles; where at his arries of father and mother much wondering, asked the Soothfayers what that meant. They answered, Eagle. that their some should one day be one of the greatest men in the world, and that out of doubt he should obtain feuen times in his life the chiefest office of dignity in his countrey. And for that matter, it is faid, that fo indeed it came to passe. Other hold opinion, that such as were about Marius at that time, in that prefent place, and elfe where, during the time of his flying: they hearing him tell this tale, beleened it, & afterwards put it downe in writing, as a true thing, although written in these verses: The Eagle layes three egges, and two she hatcheth forth: But yet she bringeth up but one that any thing is worth.

Howfocuer it was, it is certaine that Marius many times during the time of his flying faid, that he was affured he should come vnto the seuenth Consulship. When they were come neare now to the city of MINTVRNES, about two miles and a halfe from it, they might perceive a troupe of horsemen coming by the sea side, and two ships on the sea that fell vpon the coast by good hap. Wherefore they all began to run (fo long as they had breath and strength) towards the scas into the which they threw themselues, and got by swimming vnto one of the ships where Grani-"s was: and they croffed ouer vnto the Ile that is right against it called Enaria. Now for Marius, who was heavy and ficke of body, two of his fervants holpe to hold him vp alwayes aboue water, with the greatest paine and difficulty in the world; and at the last they laboured to throughly, that they put him into the other thip at the felfefame prefent, when the horfemencame vnto the fea fide; who cried out aloud to the mariners to land againe, or elfe throw Marius ouer boord, and then to go where they would. Marius on the other fide humbly befought them with teares, not to doe fo: whereby the masters of the ship in a short space were in P p 4

Famuiae voto Ma many minds whether to do it, or notto do it. In the end notwithstanding, they answered the horsemen, they would not throw him ouerboord: so the horsemen went their way in a great rage. But affoone as they were gone, the mafter of the shippe changing mind, drew towards land, and cast anker about the mouth of the river of Liris, where it leaveth her bankes, and maketh great marishes; and there they told Marius he should do wel to go on land to cate somwhat. & refresh his sea-sick body till the wind served them to make faile, which doubtlesse faid they will be at a certaine howre when the fea wind fals and becomes calme, and that there rifeth alir. tle wind from the land, ingendred by the vapors of the marishes, which will ferue the turne years well to take feas againe. Marius following their counfel, & thinking they had meant good faith. was fet on land voon the rivers banke; and there laid him down voon the graffe, nothing fuspe. Cting that which happened after to him. For the mariners prefently taking their ship againe, and hoiffing vp theirankers failed ftraight away, and fled: indging it no honeftie for them to have deliuered Marius into the hands of his enemies nor fafety for themselues to have saued him. Ma. rius finding himselfe all alone, and for saken of every man, lay on the ground a great while, and faid neuer a word: yet at the length taking heart a little to him, got vp once againe on his feete, and painefully wandered up and downe, where was neither way nor pathar all, ouerthwar deepe marishes and great ditches full of water and mudde, till he came at the length to a poore old mans cottage, dwelling there in these marishes; and falling at his feet, befought him to helpe to faue and fuccour a poore affilicted man, with promife that one day he would give him a berter recompence then he looked for, if he might escape this present danger wherein he was. The old man whether for that he had knowne Marius aforetime, or that seeing him (by coniecture only) judged him to be some great personage, told him that if he meant but to lie downe and rest himselfe a litle, his poore cabine would serue that turne reasonably well-but if he meant to wander thus, to flie his enemies that followed him, he wold the bring him into a more secret place. and farther off from noise. Marius praied him that he would do so much for him: and the good man brought him into the marish, vnto a low place by the rivers side, where he made him lie downe, and then couered him with a great deale of reed and bent, and other fuch light things as could not hurt him. He had not long bin there, but he heard a great noise coming towards the cabin of the poore old man: for Geminius of Terracine had fent men al about to feek for him. whereof fome by chance came that way, and put the poofe man in a feare, and threatened him that he had received & hidden an enemy of the Romain Es. Marius hearing that, role out of the place where the old man had laid him, and ftripping himfelf flark naked, went into a part of the marish where the water was full of myre & mud, and there was found of those that searched for him: who taking him out of the flime all naked as he was, caried him into the city of Mintyr-NES, and deliuered him there into the gouernours hands. Open proclamation was made by the Senate through all ITALY, that they should apprehend Marius, and kill him wherefoeuer they found him. Notwithstanding, the gouernours and magistrates of MINTVRNES thought good first to confult thereupon among themselues, and in the meane time they delinered himing the fafe custodic of a woman called Fannia, whom they thought to have bene a bitter enemy of his, for an old grudge she had to him, which was this. Fannia sometime had a husband called Tinnius, whom she was willing to leave, for that they could not agree, and required her dower of him againe, which was very great. Her husband againe faid, she had plaid the whoore. The matter was brought before Marins in his fixth Confulship, who had given judgement vpon it. Both parties being heard, & the law profecuted on either fide, it was found that this Fannia was a naughty woman of her body, and that her husband knowing it wel enough before, yet he took her with her faults, and long timelined with her. Wherefore Marius being angry with them both, gaue sentence that the husband should repay backe her dower, and that for her naughty life, the should pay foure farthings. This not with standing, when Fannia saw Marius she grudged him not for that, and leaft of all hadany reuenging mind in her towards him, but contrarily did cofort & help him what she could with that she had. Marius thanked her maduellously forit, and bad her hope well; because he met with so good lucke as he was coming to her house, and in this rnaner. As they were leading of him, when he came neare vnto Fanniaes house, her doore being open, there came an afferunning out to goe drinke at a conduit not farre from thence: and meeting Marius by the way, looked vpon him with a linefull countenance, first of all stopping fodainely before him, and then beginning to bray out aloud, and to leape and skip by him. Whereupon

Whereupon Marius straight coniccturing with himself, said, that the gods did signific vnto him. that he should saue himselfe sooner by water then by land: because that the asse leaving him, ran to drink, and cared not to cate. So when he had told Fannia this tale, he defired to reft, & prayed them to let him alone, & to shut the chaber doore to him. But the Magistrates of the city having consulted together about him, in the end resolued they must defer no longer time, but dispatch him out of the way prefently. Now who they were agreed upon it, they could not find a man in one hired the city that durft take vpon him to kill him : but a man of armes of the GAVLES, or one of the CIMBRES (for we find both the one and the other in writing) that went thither with his fword drawne in his hand. Now, that place of the chamber wherein Marius lay was very dark, and as it is reported, the man of armesthought he faw two burning flames come out of Marins eyes, and heard a voice out of that darke corner, saying vnto him: O fellow, thou, darest thou come to kill Cains Marius? The barbardes GAVLE hearing these words, ranne out of the chamber presently. casting his sword in the middest of the sloore, and cryed out these words onely: I cannot kill Cains Marius. This made the MINTURNIAN's afraid in the city at the first, but afterwards it moued the to compassion. So they were angry with themselves, and did repent them that they conuerted their counfel to fo cruell and vnkind a deed, against one that had preserved all ITA i. y:and to denie him aide in so extreme necessity, it was too great a fin. Therefore let vs let him go, said they to themselues, where he will, & suffer him to take his fortune appointed him elsewhere: and let vs pray to the gods to pardon this offence of ours, to have thrust Marins naked and beggarly out of our city. For these considerations, the MINTVRNIANS went altogether to Marius where The Mind he was, and flood about him, determining to fee him fafely conducted vnto the fea fide. Now turnians though enery man was ready and willing to pleasure him, some with one thing, some with another, and that they did haften him althey could possible, yet they were a good while a going thither because there was a wood called Marica, that lay right in their way betweene their city and way with the sea coast, which they greatly reuerence, & think it a facriledge to carie any thing out of that Maries wood, that was once brought into it, On the other fide, to leave to gothrough this wood, and to splea compaffe it round about, it would aske a maruellous long time. So they it anding all indoubt whatthey should do, one of the ancientest men of the city spake aloud vnto them, and faid; that there was no way forbidden them, that went about to faue Marius life. Then Marius himselfe being the foremost man, taking vp some of the fardels which they carried with him, to pleasure him in the ship, went through the wood. All other things necessarie being thus readily prepared for him with like good will, and specially the shippe which one Belleus had ordained for him: hecaused all this story to be painted in a table at large, which he gaue vnto the temple, out of the which he departed when he took ship. After he was departed thence, the wind by good fortune carried him into the Ile of ENARIA, where he found Granius and some other of his friends, with whom he tooke fea againe, and pointed towards Africk E. But lacking water, they were com- Marius pelled to land in Sicilia, in the territorie of the city of Erix; where by chance there lay a Ro-MAINE Quæstor, who kept that coast. Marius being landed there, scaped very narrowly that he Africke. was not taken of him: for he flue fixteene of his men that came out with him to take water. So Marius getting him thence with all speed, crossed the seas, vntill he arrived in the Ile of ME-NYNGE, where he first vnderstood that his sonne was faued with Cethegus, and that they were both together gone to Hiempfall King of the NVMIDIANS to befeech him for aide. This gaue him a little courage, and made him bold to passe out of that Ile, into the coast of CARTHAGE. Now at that time, Sextilius a Romaine Prator was gouernour of Africke, vnto whom Marius had neuer done good nor hurt, and therefore he hoped, that for pitie onely he might perhaps haue helpe at his hand. Howbeit he was no sooner landed with a few of his men, but a fergeant came and faid vnto him: Sextilius, Prætor and gouernour of Lyria, doth forbidthee to landinall this prouince: otherwise he telleth thee, that he will obey the Senates commandement, and pursue thee as an enemy of the Romaines. Marius hearing this commandement, was so angry & fory both, that he could not readily tell what answer to make him, and pawfed agood while, and faid neuer a word, still eying the sergeant with a grim looke: vntill he asked him what answer he would make to the Prætors commandement. Marius then fetching a Marius deepe figh from his heart, gaue him this answer: Thou shalt tell Sextilius, that thou hast seene wife answer. Caius Marius banished out of his countrey, sitting amongst the ruines of the city of CAR- sweet of THAGE. By this answer, he wisely layed the example of the ruine and destruction of that great constant, city of CARTHAGE, before Sextilius eyes, and the change of his fortune, to warne Sextilius that the like might fall vpon him. In the meane time, Hiempfall king of y NVMIDIANS, not knowing how to refolue, did honourably intreate yong Marius & his company but when they were wil. ling to go their way, he alwaies found new occasion to stay them, and was very glad to see that he started not for any oportunity or good occasion that was offered: notwithstanding, therefortuneda happie meane vnto them, whereby they faued themselues. And this it was. This Marius the yonger being a faire complexioned yong man, it pitied one of the Kings concubines to fee him so hardly dealt withall. This pitie of hers was a shadow to cloke the loue she bare him, but Marius would not hearken at y first to her inticements, & refused her. Yet in the end, perceiuing that there was no other way for him to escape thence, and considering that she did all things for their auaile, more diligently and louingly then she would have done, if she had not meant further matter vnto him, then only to enjoy the pleasure of him:he then accepted her loue and kindnes. fo as at the length fhe taught him a way how to flie, and faue himselfe and his friends. Hereupon he went to his father, and after they had embraced and faluted ech other, going along the fea fide, they found two fcorpions fighting together. Marins tooke this for an ill figne : whereupon they quickly took a fisher boat, and went into the He of CERCINA, which is no great distance of from fisme land. They had no fooner hoifed vp anker, but they faw the horfmen which king Hi. empfall had fent vnto the place from whence they were departed; and that was one of the greatest dangers that Marius ener escaped. In the meane time there was newes at Rome, that Sylla made war against king Methridates Lieutenants: and furthermore, that the Consuls being vp inarmes the one against the other, O El anius wannethe battell, and being the stronger, had driuen out Cin. na who fought to have vsurped tyrannicall power, and had made Cornelius Merula Consulinhis place: and that Cinna on the other fide leavied men out of other parts of ITALY, and made wars vpon them that were in Rome. Marins hearing of this diffention, thought good to returne as foone as he could possible into ITALY. And affembling certaine horsemen of the nation of the MAVRYSIANS in AFRICKE, and certaine Italians that had faued themselues there, vinto the number of a thousand men in all:he took sea, & landed in a hauen of Thyscan E called TE-LAMON; and being landed, proclaimed by found of trumpet, liberty to all flaues and bondmen that would come to him. So the laborers, heardmen & neat-heards of al that marsh, for the only name and reputation of Marius, ran to the sea side from all parts : of the which he having chosen out the stoutest and lustiest of them, wanne them so by faire words, that having gathered agreat company together in few daies, he made forty faile of them. Furthermore, knowing that oda. uius was a maruellous honest man, that would have no authority otherwise then law and reason would: and that cinna to the contrary was suspected of Sylla, & that he sought to bring inchange and innovation to the commonwealth: he determined to joyne his force with Cinna. So Marius fent first vnto Cinna, to let him vnderstand that he would obey him as Consull, and be ready to do all that he should command him. Cinna received him, and gave him the title and authority of Viceconfull, and fent him fergeants to carrie axes and rods before him, with all other fignes of publike authority. But Marius refused them, and said, that pompe became not his miserable fortune: for he euer went in a poore threed bare gowne, and had let his haire grow still afterhe was banished, being about threescore and ten yeares old, and had a sober gate with him, to make men pitiehim the more that faw him. But vnder all this counterfeite pitie of his heneuer changed his naturall looke, which was euer more fearefull and terrible then otherwise. And where he spake but litle, and went very demurely and soberly, that shewed rather a cankered courage within him, then a mind humbled by his banishment. Thus when he had saluted Cinna, and spoken to the fouldiers, hethen began to fet things abroach, and made a wonderfull change in few daies. For first of all, with his ships he cut off all the victuals by sea, & robbed the merchants that carried corne and other victuals to Rome: fothat in short space he was master purueyer for all necessary prouision and victuals. After this he went along the coast, and tooke all the cities vpon the sea side, and at the length wan OsTLA also by treason, put the most part of them in the towneto the sword, and spoiled all their goods: and afterwards making a bridge vpon the river of Tiber, tooke from his enemies all hope to have any manner of provision by fca. That done, he went directly towards Rome with his army, where first he wannethe hill called Ianiculum through Octavius fault: who ouerthrew himselfe in his doings, not so much for lacke of reasonable skill of warres, as through his vnprofitable curiositie and strictnesse in observing the law. For when divers did perswade him to set the bondmen at liberty to take armes for defence of the common-wealth he answered, that he would never give bondmenthe law & priviledge of a Romain E citize, having driven Caises Marius out of Rome, to maintaine the authority of the law. But when Cacilius Metellus was come to Rome, the sonne of that Acullus Numidicus, that having begun the wars in Lybia against King Ingurth, was put out by Marius: the fouldiers for fooke Ottavius immediatly, and came vnto him, because they tooke him to be a better captaine, and defired also to have a leader that could tell how to command them to faue the city, and the common-wealth. For they promifed to fight valianly, and perfinaded themselves that they should overcome their enemies, so that they had a skilfull and valiant captaine that could order them. Metellus misliking their offer, commanded them in anger to return e again evnto the Confull: but they for spite went vnto the enemies. Metellus on the other fide, seeing no good order take in the city to resist the enemies, got him out of Rome. But official being persuaded by certaine Soothsayers and Chalden facrificers, who promised from much him all should go well with him, taried still in Rome: for that man being otherwise, as wife given to as any ROMAINE of his time, and one that dealt as vprightly in his Conful flip, not carried a- Southay. way with flattering tales, and one also that followed the ancient orders and customes as infalliblernles and examples, neither breaking nor omitting any part thereofime thinkes yet had this returned imperfection, that he frequented the Soothfayers, wife men, and Astronomers, more then men imperfective. skilfull in armes and government. Wherefore, before that Marins himselfe came into the city, Offanius was by force pluckt out of the pulpit for oratios, & flaine prefently by Marius fouldiers flame by whom he had fent before into the city. And it is faid also, that when he was slaine, they found a Marius figure of a Chaldean prophecy in his bosome: & here is to be noted a great cotrariety in these souldiers. two notable men, Ostanius and Marius. The first lost his life by trusting to Soothsaying, and the travely in freed prospered, and rose againc, because he did not despise the art of Divination. The state of Assembly, Rome standing then in this maner, the Senate confulting together, sent ambassadors vnto Cinna and Marius, to pray them to come peaceably into Rome, & not to embrue their hands with the bloud of their citizens. Cinna fitting in his chaire as Confull, gaue them audience, & made them avery reasonable and curteous answer. Marius standing by him spake neuer a word; but shewed by his fowre looke that he would straight fill Rome with murder and bloud. So when the Amballadors were gone, Cinna came into Rome enuironed with a great number of fouldiers: but Cinna and Marius staid sodainly at the gate, speaking partly in anger, and partly in mockerie, that he was a entite into banished man, and driven out of his country by law: and therefore if they would have him come Reme. into Rome againe, they should first by a contrary decree abolish and revoke that of his banishment, as if he had bene a religious observer of the lawes, & as though Rome had at that present mioyed their freedome and liberty. Thus he made the people affemble in the market place to proceed to the cofirmatio of his calling home againe. But before three or four tribes had time to give their voices, disguising the matter no longer, & shewing plainly that he meant not to be lawfully called home againe fro exile:he came into Rome with a guard about him, of the veriest rafeals and most shame lesse slaues, called the BARDIÆIANS, who came to him from all parts: Bardials and they for the least word he spake, or at the twinckling of his eye, or at a nod of his head made dayled whem, slue many menthrough his commandement, and at the length slue Ancherius a Senator great mar, (that had bene Prætor) at Marius feet with their swords, because only that Marius did not salute ther in him whe he came one day to speak with him. After this murther, they cotinued killing althe that Marius did not falute, and speake vnto: for that was the very figne he had given them to kil them openly in the streets before every man; so that his very friends were afeard of being murthered, when they came to falute him. Thus a great number of men being flaine, Cinna in the end began to be fatisfied and to appeafe his anger. But Marius anger & vnsatiable desire of revenge increa- Marius led more & more, so that he spared not one if he suspected him neuer so litle: and there was neither towne nor high way, that was not full of skouts and spies to hunt them out that hid them- small straff felues and fled. Then experience taught them, that no friend is faithfull, and to be trufted, if fortune from neuer so litle: for there were very few that did not betray their friends that fled fig. to them for succour. And therefore doe Cornutus servants so much the more deserve praise, substantial who have who having secretly hidden their master in his house, did hang the dead body of some common communities person by the neck, and having put a gold ring on his finger, they shewed him to the BARDIÆI- formante Ans, Marius guard, and buried him in stead of their owne master, without suspicion of any master, manthatit was a fained thing: and so Cornutus being hidden by his feruants, was fafely conney. ed into the country of Gavle. Marke Anthony the Orator had also found out a faithfull friend tor, betray yet was he vn fortunate. This faithful fried of his, was a poore simple man, who having received one of the chiefest men of Rom E into his house to keepe him close there: he being desirous to make him the best cheare he could with that litle he had, sent one of his men to the next tauerne to fetch wine, who talting the wine more curioully then he was wont to do, called for better, The drawer asked him why the new ordinary wine would not ferue him, but he must needes haue of the best and dearest: the foolish fellow simply answered him (telling him as his familiar friend) that his master did feast Marke Anthonie, who was hidden very secretly in his house, He was no fooner gone with his wine, and his backeturned, but the vile traiterous drawer ran vnto Marius, who was fet at supper when he came. The drawer being brought vnto him, promifed him to deliuer Marke Anthonie into his hands. Marius hearing of that, was fo iocond, thathe cried out and clapt his hands together for ioy: and would have rifen from the boord, and gone thither himselfe in person, had not his friends kept him backe. But he sent Annius one of his cap. taines thither with a certaine number of fouldiers, and commanded them to bring him his head quickly. So they went thither, and when they were come to the house which the drawer had brought them to, Annius taried beneath at the doore, and the fouldiers went vp the staires into the chamber, and finding Anthonie there, they began to encourage one another to kill him, not The fores of one of them having the heart to lay hands upon him. For Anthonies tongue was as fweet as a Sy. rene, and had fuch an excellent grace in speaking, that when he began to speake vnto the souldiers, and to pray them to sauehis life: there was not one of them so hard hearted, as once to rouch him, no not onely to looke him in the face, but looking downewards, fell a weeping. An. mius perceiuing they tarried long, and came not downe, went himselfe vp into the chamber, and found Inthonie talking to his fouldiers, and them weeping, his sweete eloquent tongue had so melted their hearts; but he rating them, ran furioufly vpon him, and strake off his head withhis owne hands. And Catulus Luclatius also, that had bene Confull with Marius, and had triumphed over the CIMERES with him, feeing himselfe in this perill, set men to intreate Marins for him; but his answer was euer, He must needs die. So Catulus locked himselfe into a litle chamber, and made a great fire of charcole to be kindled, and with the smoake thereof choaked himself. Now after their heads were cut off, they threw out the naked bodies into the streetes, and trod them vnder their feete: the which was not onely a pitifull, but a fearefull fight to all that faw them. But after al this yet, there was nothing that grieued the people fo much, as the horrible letchery and abominable cruelty of his guard of the BARDIÆIANS, who comming into mens houses by force, after they had flaine the masters, defiled their young children, and rauished their wives and maides, and no man would once reprove their cruchty, letcherie, and vnfatiable anarice: vntill Cinna and Sertorius in the end set vpon them as they slept in their campe, and slue them enery one. But in this extremity, as if all things had bene restored vnto their first estate, newes came againe from all parts to Rome, that Sylla having ended his warre against king Withridates, and recouered the provinces which he had vfurped, returned into ITALY with a great power. This caused these euils and vnspeakable miseries to cease a litle, because the wicked doers of the same, looked they should have warres on their backes ere it were long. Whereupon Marius was chosen Consull the seuenth time. He going out of his house openly the first day of Ianuarie, being the beginning of the yeare, to take possession of his Consulship, caused one Sextus Lucinus to be thrownedowne headlong from the rocke TARPEIAN, which seemed to be a great figne and certaine token of the euils and miseries, that fell out afterwards the selfesame yeare vpon them for their faction, vnto all the city beside. But Marius being fore broken with his former troubles, and his mind oppressed with extreme for row and griefe, could not now at this last time of neede plucke vp his heart to him againe, when he came to think of this new war toward that threatened him, and of the dangers, griefes, and troubles he should enter into, more great and perillous then any he had passed before. For through the great experience he had in wars, he trembled for feare when he began to thinke of it, confidering that he had to fight, not with Octanius, nor with Merula, Captaines of a company of rebels gathered together: but with a noble sylla, that had driven him out of Rom E before, and that came now from driving the puissant king Mitbridates, vnto the furthest part of the Realme of Pont, and of the sea Euxinum. Thus, deeply weighing and confidering the same, and specially when he looked backe vpon his long time of banishment, how vagabondlike he wandred vp and downe in other countries, and remembred the great misfortunes he had paffed, and the fundry dangers he fell so often into, being purfued still by sea and by land : it gricued him to the heart, and made him so vnquier, that he could not fleepe in the night, or if he slept, had fearefull dreames that troubled him, and still he thought he heard a voice buzzing in his eares:

being now extremely troubled, partly for feare of the thing to come, and partly also for the ouer heauie burden of his present ill, there needed but little more aggrauation; to fall into the discase whereof he died, which was a plurisie: as Posidonius the Philosopher writeth; who saith plainely that he went into his chamber when he was ficke, and spake vnto him about matters of his ambassade, for the which he came to Rome. Yet another historiographer Cains Piso writeth, that Marius walking one day after supper with his friends, fell in talke of his fortune from the beginning of his life, telling them at large how often fortune had turned with and against him:

concluding, that it is no wife mans part to trust her any more. So when he had done, he tooke his leave of them, and laid him downe vpon his bed, where he lay ficke feuen daies together, and thridates, and shewed in his bed all the gestures and mouings of his body, as if he had bene in a for that he was borne in Socrates time. It is reported also, that one Antipater of THARSIS, calling to mind a litle before his death the good fortune he had in his lifetime, did not forget among other things, to tell of the happy nauigation he made, coming from his country vnto ATHENS:

which did witnesse that he put vpon the file of his good accounts for a singular great grace, al fawour fortune had shewed him, and that he kept it in perpetuall memory, being the onely and most assured treasure a man can haue, to keepe those gifts that nature or fortune do bestow vpponhim. But contrari wife vnthankfull fooles vnto God and nature both, do forget with time the memory of their former benefits, and laying vp nothing, nor keeping it in perpetuall memory, are alwaics voide of goods and full of hope, gaping still for things to come, and leaving in the meane time the thing present, though reason perswades them the contrary. For fortune may cassly let them of the thing to come, but she cannot take that from them which is already past:

and yet they vtterly forget the certaine benefit of fortune, as a thing nothing belonging vnto them, and dreame alwaies of that which is vncertaine. And fure it chanceth to them by great reason: for, having gathered outward goods together, and locking them vp before they have built and laid a sure grounded foundation of reason through good learning, they cannot after-wardsfill nor quench their vnfatiable greedie couetous mind. Thus ended Marius his life, the seuenteenth day of his seuenth Consulship, whereofall the city of Rome was not a little glad, and tooke heart againe vnto them, supposing they had then bene delinered from a bloudy cruell tyrannie. But within few daies after they knew it to their cost, that they had changed an old master taken out of the world, for a younger that came but newly to them: such extreme vnnaturall cruelties and murthers did Marius the yonger commit, after the death of his father Ma-

But at the length there came one from the sea, that gave him certaine intelligence of all: and that was an increase of a new feare vnto him. And thus he on the seuenth day died. Some write that his ambition appeared plainely, by a strangerauing Marles that tooke him in his head during his ficknesse: for he thought that he made warres with Mi. the fathers and showed in his head all the gestures and movings of his head, as if he had benefit a death.

THE LIFE OF

Lyfander.

N the treasurie of the Acanthians, which is in the temple of Apollo at DELPHES, there is this inscription: Brasidas, and the Acanthi-ANS, with the spoyle of the ATHENIANS. That inscription makethmany men thinke, that the image of stone that standeth within the chamber by the doore thereof, is the image of Brasidas: howbeit intruthitis the lively image of Lylander himselfe, made with a great bush of haire, and thicke long beard after the old ancient fashion. And wheresome fay that the Argives, after they were ouercome and had loft agreat battell, did all of them shaue themselues in token and signe of common forow: and that the LACED EMONIANS on the other fide to flew the ioy of their victory, did let all their haires grow, that is not true, no more then this is true which other do report of the BACCHIADES: Who being fled fro Corinth unto Laced Emon, & Laced Emonians foud them so ill fauouredly difguised & deformed, because their heads were all shauen, that therupon they had a defire to let their haire and beards grow. For that was one of the ordinances of Lycurgus, who faid that the long bush of haire maketh the that are naturally faire, the pleasanter to looke vpon: and those that are ill fauoured, more vgly and fearefull to see to. And furthermore, Thecomme it is faid that Ariffoclitus, the father of Lyfander, was not of the royall bloud of the kings of Spar-TA, though he came of the race of the Heraclides: and that his son Lysander was very meanely & poorely brought vp, being as obedient to the lawes & statutes of his country, as any other man was, shewing himself alwaies very strong & constant against al vanity & pleasure, saving only in matters of honor and curtefie, which they offer vnto those that deserve well. For they think it no shame nor dishonesty in Sparta, that the yong men do suffer themselves to be overcome with that delight and pleasure: but doe bring vp their children, that from their youth they would but take him to be of a base cowardly nature, that hath no maner of mind to do good. And therfore it is to be thought, that the ambition and stoutnesse that was bred in Lysander, proceeded of the LACONICAL discipline and education he had, and not so much of his owne nature. But creat states and nobility, farre better then the common maner of the naturall Spartans; and moreouer for his private benefit, he could eafily beare with the stoutnesse of greater men of authority then himself, which some judge to be a great point of wisedome, to know how to deale uercome nor corrupted with gold nor filuer; and yet he filled his country with riches and couetousnesses, which lost him the reputation he had won, because himselfe made none account of riches nor getting. For , bringing store of gold and filuer into his countrey after he had ouercome the Athenians, he referued not vnto himselfe one Drachma onely. And furthermore, when Diony susther tyrant of Syracus a had on a time sent goodly rich gowns out of Sicilia to his daughters:he refused them saying, that he was afraid such gowns would make them fowler. Neuerthelesse, shortly after being sent Ambassadour out of his countrey to the same tyrant, Dio-cilia, when cuery man thought they had vtterly loft all their force by sea, and that by all coniecture they should soone after lose all by land also: Alcibiades returning from his exile to deale againe in matters of the state, made an exceeding great change & alteratio. For he set the Athe-NIANS affore againe, and made them as strong by sea as the LACED EMONIANS: who therupon began to quake for feare, & to look eftfoones for a fresh war, perceiving that they stood in need of a great power, and of a better Captaine then euer they had before. Whereupon they made to trade thither, he quickned their hauens, and fet vp their staple againe for the traffick of merchandife, and filled every private artificers house with an honest trade to make them rich by, so that ever after it grew in continuall hope to come vnto that flourishing state and greatnesse, in the which we fee it at this present. Furthermore, Ly sander being advertised that Cyrus, one of the great king of Persiaes fons, was come vnto the city of Sardis, he went thither to speake from the sea, seemed to deale but coldly and faintly against them, for the fauour he bare to Alcibiades. For, in furnishing the LACED EMONIANS very scantly with money, he was the cause that all their army by sea went to wracke. Cyrus for his owne part was very glad that he heard complaints of Tifaphernes, and that they spake against him: because he was an ill man, and the rather for that he had himselfe a little odde grudge to him. Wherefore he loued Lysander mar-uellous well, as well for the complaints he made of Tisaphernes, as also for the pleasure he tooke in his company, because he was a man that could wonderfully please and delight noble men: by which meanes having wonne the favour of this young Prince, he did perswade, and also incon-rage him to follow this warre. And when Lyfander was vpon his departure to take his leaue of him, Cyrus feasted him, and afterwards prayed him not to refuse the offer of his liberalitie, and indeed of his owne nature he was a right courtier, and could tell how to entertaine and flatter Lyanders thing. Whereunto Ly fander answered him. Sithence I see (Cyrus) you are so willing to pleasure vs, I beseech you, & do also counsell you then to increase the ordinary pay of our mariners, one halfe penny a day: to the end that where now they have but three halfe pence, they may henceforth receiue two pence a day. Cyrus was glad to heare Lyfanders bounty, and the increase that he would make, and caused ten thousand Darickes to be deliuered him : by meane whereof he added to the ordinary pay of the mariners, the increase of a halfe penny a day. This liberality, within few days after, emptied all their enemies gallies of their men. For the most part of their mariners and gallie men went where they might have the best pay: and such as remained behind, became very dull, lazie, and feditious, daily troubling their Captaines and gouernours. Now though Lyfander had drawn his enemies men from them by this policie, & had done them this great hurt, yet he durst not fight it out by sea, fearing the worthings of Alcibiades: who was a valiant man, and had greater store of ships then he had; and besides that, was never ouercome by land nor by fea, in any battell where he was Generall. So it chanced that Alcibiades went our of the Ileof Samos vnto the city of Phocha, which standeth vpon firme land directly oueragainst Samos, and leaving the whole charge of his fleete in his absence, with Antiochus his pilot:he being more hardie then wife, in scorne and derision of Lyfander, went with two gallies only into the hauen of Ephasys, and went by the arfenall (where all their ships lay in docker with great noise and laughing. This put Lysander in such a heate and chase, that first of all hepor a few gallies to the sea, & had him in chase with them. But afterwards, perceiuing that the other captaines of the Athenians came out one after another to the rescue, he armed other gallies also: so that supplying still with a few on either side, at length they came to maine battell, which Lyfander wan, and having taken fifteene of their gallies, he fet vp a token of triumph and victory. When the people of ATHENS heard the newes of this ouerthrow, they were so angry with Al. cibiades, that they deposed him presently of his charge: and the souldiers also that lay in campe in the Ile of Samos, began to mislike him, and to speake ill of him. Whereupon he presently left his campe, and went into the country of CHERRONESUS in THRACIA. This battell was more spoken of then there was cause, by reason of Alcibiades reputation. Furthermore, Lylander causing the stoutest and boldest men of enery city, about the common fort, to come to Ephssvs vnto him: laid their fecret foundations of great change and alteration, which he stablished afterwards in the gouernements of cities. For he perswaded his private friends to make tribes amongst themselues, to winnethem friends, & to practise to get the rule of their cities into their hands: promifing them, that so sooneas the ATHENIANS were cuerthrowne, they themselves also should be delivered from subjection of their people, and every one of them should beare chiefe rule in their countrey. And this he performed to them all, and made every one of them proue his words true: for he preferred all them that had bene his old friends, vnto the bestoffces and charges, not sparing to do against all right and reason: so that they were aduanced by it. And for this cause every man came to take his part, and they all sought and desired to gratise and please him: hoping, that what great matter soeuer fell out, they might assure themselues that they should obtaine it of him, when he came to have the government in his owne hands. And therfore they nothing reioyced at callicratidas coming, who came to fucceed him in the office of the Admirall: neither afterwards also, when they saw by experience that he was as honest and iust a man as could be. Neither did they like his manner of gouerning, which was plaine and without any art or cunning. But they commended the perfection of his vertue, as they would haue done the image of some demi-god made after the old fashion, which had bene of singular beauty. But in the meanetime, they wished for Lysander, as well for the tender loue and goodwill he bare to his friends and them, as also for the profit and commodity they got by him. So when Lyfander took the feas to returne home againe, all they that were in the campe, were as fory as could be possible, in somuch as the teares stood in their eyes: & he on the other side studied to make them worse affected vnto Callicratidas. For amongst many other things, he sent the rest of the mony backe againe to SARDIS, which Cyrus had given him to pay the mariners: faying, that Callicratidas should goe himselfe to aske it, if he would have it, and finde the meanes to entertaine his men. And lastly, when he was ready to imbarke, he protested before all them that were present, that he did deliuer, leaue, and assigne ouer the armie into his hands, commanding all the fea. But Callieratidas, to ouercome his false ambition, and foule boasting lye, answer red him againe and faid: If that be true thou fayeft, come then and deliuer me the gallies in the city of MILETVM, asthou goeft by, before the Ile of SAMOs for fith thou commandest all the fea, we shall not neede to feare our enemies that are in Samos. Lysander thereto replyed, that the army was no more at his commandement; and that he had the charge ouer them: and so departed thence, taking his course directly vnto PELOPONNESVS, and left Callicratidas in great perplexity: for he had brought no money out of his countrey with him, neither could he compell the cities to furnish him with any seeing that they were at that time too much troubled already. Then had he no other way but to go to the Lieutenants of the King of Persia, to askethem mony, as Lysander had done. But he was the vnmeetest man for it that could be possible: for he was of a noble and liberall nature, and thought it leffe dishonour and reprochynto the Greet-ANS, to be ouercome by other GRECIANS, then to go flatter the barbarous people, & feek to the with the that had gold and filuer enough, but otherwise no goodnesse nor honesty. In the end not withstanding, making vertue of necessity, he tooke his journey towards Lydia, and went directly to Cyrus court: whereathis first comming he willed them to lethim understand, that Callicratidas the Admirall-of the LACED EMONIANS wold speake with him. One of § souldiers that warded at the gate, told him: My friend, sir stranger, Cyrus is not at leisure now, for he is set at dinner. Callicratidas answered plainly againe: No force, I will tarrie here till he haue dined. The barbarous callierati-Persians hearing this, took him for some plaine lout, and so he went his way at the first time das passes. with a mocke at their hands. But the second time, when they would not let him come in at the gare, he fell in a rage, and returned backe (as he came) to the city of EPHESVS, curfing and banning them that at the first had so much imbased themselves, as to go sue to the barbarous people, teaching them to be proude and stately for their goods and riches: swearing before them all that were present, that so some as he came to Sparta againe, he would do all that he could possible to pacific the GRECIANS, and let them at peace one with another, to the end they might be fearefull to the barbarous people, & also that they should meddle with them no more, nor need theiraide to destroy one another. But Callicratidas having the noble hart of a Spartan, and being to be compared in inflice, valiancie, and greatnesse of courage, with the most excellentest

of Calliera-NYSES. Wherfore, the confederates of the LACED EMONIANS seeing that their state was in declining, they all together sentan ambassade vnto Sparta, by which they made request to the councell, that they would fend Lysander againe for their Admirall: promising that they would doall things with better courage and good will vnder his conduction, then they would vnder any other Captainethey could fend them. So much did Cyrus also write vnto them. But because there was an expresse law forbidding that one man should be twise Admirall, & besides, they being willing to grant the request of their confederates, made one Aracus their Admirall, but in effeet gaue Lyfander the whole authority of all things: who was maruellous welcome vinto them, &specially vnto the heads and rulers of cities, which long before had wished for his comming: because that by his meanes they hoped to make their authority greater, and altogether to take away the authority from the people. But they that loued plaine dealing, and open magnanimity in the maners of a Gouernor and Generall, when they came to compare Lyfander with Callicratides, they found that Lyfander had a fine subtill head, and did more in wars with his policie and Tyfander fibrilty, then by any other meanes. And moreouer, that he esteemed instice, whe it fell out profirable: & tooke profit, for instice & honesty, not thinking that plaine dealing was of better force then craft, but measuring the value of the one and the other, by the profit that came out of them, and mocking of them that faid, that the race of Hercules should not make wars with craft & subtilty. For, said he, when the lions skin wil not serue, we must helpe it with the case of a foxe. And A wife sayhereunto agreeth that which they write he did in the city of Miletvm. low him, as though he would have done fome great punishment. And againe, meeting with the of the contrary part, he willed them also that they should not be afraid, nor doubt that any man should do them hurt where he was. This was a wicked and malicious practife of him, to stay the chiefest of them that were most affected to the popular faction, to the end that afterwards hee might put them all to death, as he did: for they that trufting to his words remained quiet in the city, were all put to death. Moreover, Androclidas touching this matter, hath left in writing that which Lylander was wont to fay by which it appeareth, that he made very litle reckoning to be periured. For he faid, that children should be deceived with the play of kayles, and men with oathes ofmen, following therein Polycrates the tyrant of Samos, but without reason for he was a lawfull Captaine, and the other a violent viurper of tyrannicall power. Furthermore, ir was not done like a true LACONIAN, to behaue himselfe towards the gods none otherwise, then towards men, but rather worfe, & more injuriously. For hethat deceiveth his enemie, and breaketh his oath to him, sheweth plainely that he feareth him, but that he careth not for God. Cyrus therefore having fent for Lyfander to come to Sanders to him, gaue him money largely, and promised him more : and because he would more honourably shew the goodwill he had to gratise him, told him, that if the king his father would give him nothing, yethe would give him of his owne. And furthermore, when all other meanes failed to helpe him with mony, that rather then he should lacke he would melt his own chaire to make mony of (which he sate in when he gaue audience in matters of inflice) being altogether of gold and filter. And to be fhort, when he was going into Me o 1 A to the king his father, he gave Lyfander power to receive the taxes and ordinarie tributes of the cities vnder his gouernement, and made him Lieutenant of all his country. And laftly, bidding him farewll, prayed him that he would not give battell by fea vntothe A. THENIANS, Vntill he returned from the Court: & that before his coming againe, he would have authority to leavie a great number of ships, aswell out of Phoenicia, as out of Cilicia. Wherefore whilest Cyrus was in his journey, Lylander not being able to fight with his enemies with like number of ships, nor also to lie still and do nothing with so good a number of gallies, went and scoured the seas, where he tooke certaine Hands, and robbed also ÆGINA and SALA-MINA. From thence he went and landed on the firme land in the countrey of ATTICA, and did his duty there vnto Agi king of Laced Emonia, who came purposely from the fort of Decelea to the fea fide to fee him because their army by land also should see what power they hadby fee, and how it ruled more by feather they would. Neuertheleffe, being aduertifed that the flecte of the Athenians followed hard after him he took another course to flic backe againe into Asia by the Iles: and returning againe, found all the country of Hellespont without men of war. So he laid fiege before the city of Lamps acvs and did affault it with his gallies by fea:and Thorax being come thither also at the selfe same time in great hast, with his army by land gaue the affault on his fide. Thus was the city taken by force, which Lyfander left to the spoyle of the fouldiers. Now in the meane time the Acte of the ATHENIANS (which was an hundred and fourefcore faile) came to an anker before the city of ELEVNTE, in the country of CHERRO-RESVS: and newes being brought them that the citie of LAMPSACVS was taken, they came with all speed possible vnto the city of SESTOS, where getting fresh cates and victuals, they coafted al along the coast vnto a certaine place called the goates river, directly over against the fleet of their enemies, which lay yet at anker before the city of LAMPSACVS. Now there was a captaine of the Athenians amongst other, called Philocles, he that perswaded the Athenians to cut off the prisoners thombes of their right hands that were taken in the warres, to the end they should no more handle the pike, but only serue to pull the ower. Both the one and the otherrefted that day, hoping to have battell without faile the next morning. But Lyfander having another meaning with him, commanded the mafters and mariners notwithflanding, that they should haue their galleys ready to give battel the next morning by breake of day, because every man should get aboord betimes, and should keepe themselues in order of battell, making no noiseat all, attending what he would command them: and further, made the armie by landalfo to be ranged in battell ray, by the sea side. The next morning at Sunne rising, the ATHENI-Ans began to row with all their gallies fet in order of battell in afront. But Lyfander, though he had his ships in order to fight, the prores lying towards the enemies before day, rowednot for all that against them, but sending out pinnaces vnto the first galleys, commanded them straightly that they should not stirre at all, but keepe themselves in order, making no noise, nor rowing against the enemie. Though the ATHENIANS also were retired in the night, he would not give the fouldiers leave to come to land out of the gallies, before he had fent first two or three gallies to deferie the flecte of his enemics: who brought him word that they had feene the Athenians takeland. The next morning they did the like, the third day, and the fourth alfo all in one fort: to that the ATHENTAN'S began to be bold of themselves, and to despite their enemies, imagining they lay thus close for feare of them, and durft not come forward. In the meane time, Alcibiades (who lay at that time in the countrey of Cherronesys, incertaine places which he had conquered) came riding to the campe of the ATHENIANS, to tell the Captaines and Generals of the care thearmie, the great faults they committed. First, for that they had cast anker, and kept their salemans. thins in an open place, where there was no maner of fuccour, nor harbor to retire vnto vpon any forme; and worst of all, because that they were to fetch their victuals farre off, at the city of Si-$70 $2 vnto which hauen they should rather draw themselves, considering that they had but a little way to go, and alfo they should have the city to backe them, which would furnish them with all things accessarie and beside that, they should be surther off from their enemics, which were gonerned by one Generall only that did command them all, and were fo well trained, that ara whiftle they were ready straight to execute his commandement. Alcibiades perswasions to these Captaines of the ATHENIANS were not onely misliked, but furthermore there was one called Tydeus, that answered him very lendly: That he had nothing to do to command the armie, but other that had the charge of them. Alcibiades mistrusting thereby some treason, quialy went his way. The fifth day, the ATHENIANS having made the fame countenance to prefent battell vnto their enemies, and retiring the fame night as of cuftome, very negligently, & in illorder, as men that made no reckoning of their enemies: Lyfander fent againe certaine galliots to descrie them, commanding the Captaines of the same, that when they perecised the ATHE-KIANS had left their galleys and taken land, they should then returne back with al possible speed they could, & being mid way over the straights, that they should lift up a copper target into the A copper aire, youn the top of a pike in the fore-deck, for a figne to make althe whole fleete to row in battel. Now Lyfander himselfe in the meane time went in person from galley to galley, persiwading fine of and exhorting every captaine, that they should purtheir galliots, mariners, and souldiers in good larelly readinesse, to the end that when the figue should be litted up, they should row with all their feet might in battell against the enemies. Wherefore, so soone as the copper target was set up in the ayre, and that Lyfander had made his trumper found out of the Admirall, for a token to hale out into the sea: the galleys immediatly began to row for life in enuy one of another, and the footmen that were vpon the land, ranne with speed also to the top of a high cliffe neare vnto the sea, to see what would be the end of the fight, because the distance from one side to the other in that place was not fully two miles; which they had foone cut ouer, and in a little space, through the great diligence and force of rowing with their owers. So Conon the chiefe Captaine of the A- conon set-THENIANS perceiving from the shore this great fleete coming with a full force to assault them: mirallof the hethen cryed out to the fouldiers that they should runne to their ship, and being in a rage to see things in this danger, called some by their names, others he intreated, and the rest he compelled totaketheir galleys. But all his diligence was to no purpose, because the souldiers were wholly feattered here and there. For fo foone as they were fet aland out of their galleys at their returne, fome went to buy prouision, other went a walking in the fields, some were fet at supper in their cabins, and other were laid downe to fleepe, nothing mistrusting that which happened to them, through their Captaines ignorance and lacke of experience, But when the enemies were rea- Lyfanders dyto ioyne and fall vponthem with great cries and noise of owers, Conon having eight gallies, the dikentfole secretly out of the secte, and slying vnto Engoras, saued himselfe in the He of Creavs. In ans. the meane time, the Peloponnesians falling vponthe other gallies, tooke some of them emptic; and brake the others as the fouldiers began to come aboord vpon them. And as for the men, some were slaine by their ships as they ranvnto them like naked men without weapon, and out of order, thinking to have faued themselves: other were killed in flying, because the enemies landed and had them in chase. And there were taken aline of them, three thousand prisoners with the Captaines. Lyfander moreouer tooke all the whole fleet of their ships, the holy galley Paralog the excepted, called Paralos, and the eight that fled with Conon: and after he had destroyed all the holy galley campe of the ATHENIANS, he fastned the galleys that were taken, vnto the keele of his galleys, of A. hens. and returned with fongs of triumph, with the found of flutes and hoboyes, towards the city of Another the flone that fell.

LAMPSACVS, having wonne a great victorie with litle labour, and had cut off in a small time; the long continuing and most diverse warre that ever was, and had brought forth so many sondrie strange euents of fortune, as are vncredible. For there had bene infinite battels fought both by sea and land, and had altered many fundrie times, and there was slaine at that time moe Captaines, then in all the other wars of GRECE together: all which were at length brought to end and determined, by the good wisdome and conduction of one onely man. And therefore some thought, that this great overthrow was given by the gods, and faid: That at the departure of Lie. fanders fleete out of the hauen of LAMPSACVS, to go fet vpon the fleete of the enemies, they per-The flares ceiued over Lylanders galley the two fires, which they call the starres of Castor and Pollux: the one on the one fide of the galley, and the other on the other fide. They fay also, that the fall of the stone was a token, that did signifie this great ouerthrow. For about that time, (as many hold opinion) there fell out of the aire a maruellous great stone, in the place they call the goates river, which stone is seene yet vnto this day, holden in great reverence by § inhabitante of the city of CHERRONE SVS. It is said also, that Anaxagoras did prognosticate, that one of the bedies tied vnto the vault of the heauen, should be plucked away, and should fall to the ground by a fliding and shaking that should happen. For he said, that the starres were notin their proper place where they were first created, considering that they were heavy bodies, & of the nature of itone: howbeit that they did fhine by reflexion of the fire elementarie, and had bene drawne up thither by force, where they were kept by the great violence of the circular motion of the element, even at the beginning of the world they had bin staid and let from falling downe beneath at that time when the separation was made of the cold and heavie bodies, from the other substance of the vniuerfall world. There is another opinion of certaine Philosophers. where there is more likelihood then in that. For they fay, that those which we call falling stars, be no fluxions nor derivations of the fire elementary, which are put out in the ayre, in a maner fo foone as they be lighted:nor alfo an inflammation or combuftio of any part of the aire, which by ouermuch quantity thereof doth ipread vpwards: but they are celestiall bodies, which by fome flacknesse of strength, or falling from the ordinarie course of heaven, are throwns and cast downe here beneath, not alwaies in any part of the earth inhabited, but more ofter abroad in the great Ocean sea, which is the cause that we do not see them. Notwithstanding, Anaxagoras words are confirmed by Damachus, who writeth in his booke of religion, that the space of threefcore and fifteene yeares together, before that this stone did fal, they faw a great lump of fire cotinually in the aire like a cloud inflamed, the which taried not in any one place, but went & came with divers broken removings, by the driving whereof there came out lightnings of fire that fell in many places, and gaue light in falling, as the starres do that fall. In the end, when this greatbo. dy of file fell in that part of the earth, the inhabitants of the country, after that they were a little boldned from their feare and wonder, came to the place to fee what it was: and they found no maner of flew or apparance of fire: but onely a very great stone lying vpon the ground, but nothing in comparison of the least part of that which the compasse of this body of fire did shew, if we may foname it. Sure herein, Damachus words had need of fauourable hearers. But egaine if they be true, then he vtterly confuteth their arguments, that maintaine that it was a peece of a rocke, which the force of a boisterous wind did teare from the top of a mountaine, and caried in the aire, fo long as this whirlewind continued: but fo foone as that was downe, & calme againe, the stone fell immediatly. Neither do we say, that this lightning body, which appeared so many daies in the element, was very fire indeed, which comming to diffolue and to be put out, did beget this violent storme and boisterous wind in the element, that had the force to teare the stone in funder, and to cast it downe. Neuerthelesse, this matter requireth better discourse in some other booke then this. But now to our storie. When the three thousand Athenians that were taken prisoners at that ouerthrow, were condemned by the councell to be put to death: Lysander calling Philocles, one of the captaines of the ATHENIANS, asked him what paine he would judge him worthy of that gaue the citizens fo cruell and wicked counfell. Philoclis being nothing abaof the aibe fled to fee himselfe in that mifery, answered him: Accuse not them that have no judge to heare their cause: but fince the gods have given thee grace to be conquerour, do with vs. as we would have done with thee, if we had overcome thee. When he had faid fo, he went to wash himselfe, and then put on a faire cloake vpon him, as if he should have gone to some feast and wentlustily the foremost man to execution, leading his countriementhe way, as Theophrastus writeth, After this done, Ly fander with all his fleete went by all the cities of the fea coast, where he commanded fomany ATHENIANS as he found, that they should get them to ATHENS, letting them underfland that he would not pardon a man of them, but put them all to death as many as he found out of their citie. And this he did of policie to bring them all within the precinct of the wals of ATHENS, because he might so much the sooner famish them for lacke of victuals: for otherwise they would have toubled him fore, if they had had wher withal to have maintained a long fiege. But in all the cities as he paffed by, if they were gouerned by the authority of the people, or if that there were any other kind of gouernment, he left in enery one of them a LACED EMONIAN Captaine or Gouernor, with a councell often officers, of them that had bene before in league & amity with him: the which he did as well in the cities that had ever bene confederates and friends unto the Laced Amonians, as in them that not long before had benetheir enemies, So he went failing al along the coasts, faire and softly making no hast, stablishing in maner a generall princimality oueral GR E CE. For he did not make the officers that were the richest, the noblest, or honestell men, but such as were his frieds, out of those tribes which he had placed in enery city;& to the he gaue authority to punish, and reward such as they liked of, & would be present himself inperson to helpe them to put those to death whom they would execute, or otherwise expulse or banish their country. But this gaue the GRECIANS small hope of good or gracious gouernment vnder the rule of the LACED & MONIANS. Wherefore me thinkes that Theopompus the Theorem. comicall Poet doted, when hee compared the LACED EMONTANS VIIto tauerners, faying, micall Pothat they had given the GRECIAN's ataste of the sweet drink of liberty, and that afterwards they essaying of had mingled it with vineger. For, the tafte they gaue the GRECIANS of their gouernment from ministric the beginning, was very sharpe vnto them : because Lyfander tooke the rule and authority of government out of the peoples hands, and gaue it vnto a few of the boldest, and most seditious men in enery city. Thus having spent a great time in this voyage, to make these alterations, he fent newes before to Laced Amon, that he was comming with 200 faile. He spake also with the kings, Agis and Paulanias, in the countrey of Arrica, perswading himselfe that he should winthe city of ATHENS at the first affault. But when he saw that his expectatio failed, & that the ATHENIANS did valiantly refift him, he returned once againe with his fleete into Asia, where he made an end of changing and altering the maner of gouernment through enery city in equall maner, stablishing a councell of ten officers only in every one of them, and putting every where many citizens to death, and banishing many also. Among others, he draue all the Samians out of their countrey, and restored againe all them that had bene banished before: and the city of SESTOS also, being yet in the ATHENIANS hands, he took it from them. And furthermore, he would not fuffer the natural SESTIANS to dwell there, but draue them away, & gaue their city, their houses & lands, vnto ship-masters, officers of galleys, and galley-slaues, that had bin in the wars with him. But therein the LACED EMONIANS were against him, & this was the first thing that they did forbid him: for they restored the Sastians, against his will, vnto their lands and goods againe. But as the GRECIANS were very much offended, to fee the parts Lyfander playeds fo were they all very glad againe, to see these others which he afterwards did. For he restored the ÆGINETES againe to their lands and houses, who had bene put from them a long time. He restoredasso the Melians, & the Scion Eians to their lands againe, which the Athenians had gotten from them, and draue out the ATHENIANS. Furthermore, Lyfander being aduertised, that the citizens & inhabitants of Athens were pinched fore for lacke of victuals, he returned againe, and came into the hauen of PIR #A: by meanes whereof he kept the city fo fraight, that he made them yeeld vpon such conditions as he himselfe would. Howbeit there The Atlanta are certaine LACED &MONIANS that Tay, Lyfander wrotevnto the Epheres: The citie of A- mianty reld THEN'S istaken : and that the Ephori wrote againe vnto him : It is well that it is taken. But this is " albem but at ale denifed to make the matter feeme better: for indeed the capitulations which the Ephori fent vnto him, were these: The Lords of the councell of Laced Amon haue thus decreed: That ye do raze the fortification of the hauerr of PIREA: That ye doe ouerthrow also the long wall of peace of that ioyneth the hauen to the city: That ye yeeld vp and redeliuer all the cities which ye doe fered by the hold, and content your selues with your liues and country only. This doing ye shall have peace, niamto the so that ye performe our demands. That ye shall receive those which are banished: and for the Athenians. number of ships, ye shall dispose of them as we shall will you. The ATHENIANS agreed vnto the articles contained in that bill, following the counfell of Theramenes the fonne of Agnon,

Who when a young Orator called Cleomenes, did openly aske him in anger, if he were fo bold to dare to do, or fay, any thing contrary vnto that, which Themsfooles had done before time. to affent vnto the LACED EMONIANS, that the wall which he built in despight of them, should by their commandement now be razed: he answered him openly againe: Yong man, my friend. I do nothing contrary to Themistocles doings: for like as he heretofore did build the wall for the fafety and benefit of all the citizens and people that were in ATHENS at that time: euen so doe we that are here now, for the felfe same cause plucke it downeand raze it. And if it be true that wals do make cities happie, then it must needs follow that the city of Sparta which neuer had any wals, should be the vnfortunatest of all other. So Lylander having received all the ATHENI-ANS ships but twelve, and the wals of the city also to vie them at his pleasure: on the sixteenth day of March (on which day in old time the ATHENIAN's had won the battel by sea, within the ftraight of SALAMINA, against the king of PERSIA) he counselled them straight to change the forme of their gouernment. The people could not brooke that motion, and were maruelloufly offended withall. Whereupon Lysander sentto declare vnto them, that they had broken thearticles of the peace made betweene them, for that their wals were yet standing, the ten daies being expired in which they had promised to ouerthrow them; and therefore that he would once againe referre it to the determination of the councell, how they should be vsed, that had broken the articles and coucnants of the first peace. Other say, that immediatly he referred it vnto the deliberation of the councel of their confederates, that is to fay: whether they should altogether destroy the ciry, and make the inhabitants thereof flaues and bondmen, or no. In this councell it is reported that there was a THEBAN called Erianthus, whose opinion was, that they should vtterly raze the city, and make the country a defert: fo that it should neuer after serue for other thing, but for pasturage of beasts. But during this diet and councell, there was a banket made. wherunto al the captaines and chiefe efficers of the army being bidden, there was a Phocian. a finger of fongs, that fang the entry of the Chorus to the tragedy of Electra, made by the Poet Euripides, which began in this fort:

Electra noble Dame, and daughter to a king, Euen Agamemnon, king of Greece, whose fame so wide didring: I come now to your courts, which lie both wide and wast,

By spoile of warres depopulate, destroyed and disgraft. These words moued althe hearers with copassion, so that the most part of them thought it were The first too great a fin to destroy fo noble a city, which brought forth so many famous wise me, & great persons. Wherfore Lylander, when the ATHENTAN'S had submitted themselves altogether to his will, caused all the women-players of pipes or shalmes to come out of the city, and gatheredall those together which he had in his owne campe also, and with the found of their instruments he made the wals & fortificatios of the city of Athen's to be pulled downe to the very ground,& fet all their galleys on fire, & burnt the in the presence of the confederates of the LACED EMO-NIANS, who danced and played in the meane scason with garlands of flowers on their heads, in token that that day was a beginning of their full & perfect liberty. Immediatly after he changed also the state of the gouernment, establishing a councell of thirty Magistrates in the city, & other ten also in the hauen of PIR ÆA, hauing all equall and like authority; and therewith all made Callibrus a gentleman of Sparta captaine of the castle there, and left a good garrison of the Lace-DEMONIANS with him. This Callibius one day lift vp his staffe he had in his hand to strike Antolyeus withall, a strong made man to wrestle: wherupon Xenophon the Philosopher made his book in old time, called Comminium. But Autolycus that was a cunning wreftler, having all the fleights of wreftling, fuddenly tripped Callibius with his leg, and lifting him vp at the armes end, cast him to the ground. Howbeit Lyfander was not angry with Autolycus for it, but reproued Callibius, telling him that he should have remembred (if he had bene wife) that he had the government of free men, and not of bondmen. Notwithstanding, shortly after the thirty gouernors of the citie, to satisfie Callibius, put this Autolycus to death. When Lysander had done all these things, he took sea againe, and went into the country of THRACIA, and fent by Gylippus before vnto Sparta (who had bin Captaine and General of the Syracysans in Sicilia) al the gold and filuer that was left in his hands, with all the prefents besides which had bene prinately given him, and with the crowns alfothat had bin presented him: which were maruellous in number, as it is to be thought for that many came to present him, considering the great power he had, & that in maner he was chief and fole prince of al GRECE. This Gylippus did rip the seames of cuery bag in the bottome where the mony was, & took a good fum out of enery of them: and afterwards fewed them vp Gylippus. again, not thinking that there had bin a border vpon enery bag, vpon the which was declared, the number & kinds of gold & filuer that were therein. Now when he was come to Sparta, he hid apple carithe mony he had stolne vnder the house cauings, & went & deliuered the bags he had brought into the hands of the Ephori, shewing them Lyfanders scale, which he had set to enery one of the. The Ephori having opened the bags, and told the mony, found that the fum agreed not with the borders of the contents: and yet could not tell where the fault was. But a fernant of Gylippus told them in darke words, saying: that under the tiles of his masters house there lay a great number of owles. Now the greatest part of the coine of gold & silver which was currant through GRECE, was stamped with the marke of an owle, by reason of the ATHENIANS. Thus Gylippus after so was marmany noble exploits done in wars, committing fo shamefull and vile a deed, was banished out ked with an of his countrey of LACED EMONIA. But the wifest men of Sparra, and of deepest judgement, Grippus fearing the power of gold & filuer, & feeing by proofe of Gylippus doings, that it had fuch power banifomens to make one of their chiefest men to fall through couctousnes: they greatly blamed Lyfander for couctousness bringing of it into LACED AMON, befeeching the Ephori that they would fend all his gold and of money filter out of Sparta, as a plague, prouocation, & wicked baite, to make them do cuillideclaring vinto them, that they should vie no other mony, but their own only. Wherupon they referred all one of the to the wisdom & determination of the councell. Theopompus writeth, that Soir aphidas was he that chiefeth me didmoue the councell of the Ephori in it. Howbeit Ephorns calleth him Phlogidas, who was the first that spake against it in the councell, that they should not admit nor receive into the city of Thirm SPARTA, any mony of gold or filuer: but should only content themselves with their owne countered and the state of the stat try iron coine, the which first of al, comming from the fire red-hor, was quenched with vineger, ms. to the end they should be forged no more, nor employed vnto any other vse. For it was so eager and brittle by meanes of this temper, that they could no more conuert it to any other purpose: and beside, it was very heavy and vnhandsome to remove, considering that a great heape and quantity of it, was but of smal value. And it seemeth they did vse of old time, certaine little iron mony, and in some places copper mony, called Obelifci, from whence the small peeces of mony now extant are called Oboli, wherof fixe made a Drachma, fo termed for that it was as much as the hand could gripe. Neuerthelesse, at the earnest suce of Lysanders friends that stood against i, and held hard with him, it was decreed in the councell, that the money should remaine in the Liesders. city, and ordained that it should be currant only but for the affaires of the common wealth. And if it were found, that any prinate man did either locke vp, or keepe any mony, that he should sufferdeath for it: as if Lycurgus when he made his lawes, feared gold or filuer, & not the conetout- agains. nesseand auarice which the gold and siluer bringeth with it. The which was not taken away so much, prohibiting private mento haucit: as it was engendred onely by a toleration of getting it. For, the profit which they saw it brought withall, made it to be esteemed and desired. For it was vnpossible they should despise a thing prinately for vnprositable, which they saw reckoted of commonly, as a thing very necessary; and that they should thinke it would not serue their turne privatly, seeing it so commonly esteemed and defired. But we are rather to think, that prinatemens maners are confirmed according to the common vies & customes of cities, then that of the Man the faults and vices of private men do fill cities and commonweales withill qualities. And it is the could more likely, that the parts are marred and corrupted with an infection of the whole, when it of diforder fallethoutill: then that the parts corrupted should draw the whole to corruption. For to the in a common fallethoutill: contrary, the faults of a part destroyed, which might be prejudiciall vnto the whole, are oftentimes redreffed and corrected by the other parts, whole and entire. But they that took this refolution in their councell at that time, to have mony in the commonwealth, made feare of punishment, and of the law, to be the outward watchmen of citizens houses, to keepe that no moncy should come into them. But all this while they made no inward prouision, to keepe the entry of their soules from all passion and greedy desires of mony: butto the contrary, they made them all to haue a couetons defire to be rich, as if it were a great & honorable thing. But for that we haue hertofore in other places reproued § LACED EMONIANS. And moreouer Lysander caused a stathe of braffe to be made like himself of the spoile he had gotten of the enemies, to set it vp in the chy of DELPHES, and for enery prinate captain of the galleys in like case, and the two stars of Caffor and Pollux in gold befides, which vanished away a little before the battell of LEVCTRES:

and no man knew what became of them. Againe, in the chamber of the treasurie of Brasidas, and of the ACANTHIANS, there was also a galley made of gold & iuorie, of two cubits long, which Cyrus fent vnto him after the victory he had won by sea of the ATHENIANS. And furthermore Alexandrides the historiographer borne at DELPHE's, writeth, that y felf same Lyfander had left there to be kept safe, a ralent of filuer, two and fiftie Minas; and eleuen peeces of gold called Stateres. But all this accordeth nor with that which althe other historiographers write, agreeing of his pouerty. But Ly (ander being aloft then, and of greater power then euer any GRECIAN was before him, caried a greater port & countenance then became his ability. For as Duris writeth he was the first of the GRECIANS vnto whom they did euer creet any altars, and offer facrifice vnto as a god, and in honor of whom they did first fing any hymnes: and at this day there is ver good memorie of one which began in this manner:

The noble Captaines praise, we meane to celebrate Of Greece: that land which is divine in every kind of state:

The Samians by publicke decree ordained, that the feasts of Iuno, which were called in their city Hercea, should be called Lysandria. Lysander had cuer one Charilus a Spartan Poetahoun him, to write and fet forth all his doings in verse. Another Poet called Antilochus, one day made certaineverses in his praise: which pleased him so well, that he gaue him his hat full of silver. There were two other Poets, Antimachus Color Honian, and Niceratus borne at HERACLEA. which did both write verses to honour him, striuing whether of them should do best. Lylander indged the crowne and victory vnto Niceratus wherewith Antimachus was fo angry, that herazed out all that he had written of him. But Plato who at that time was yong, and loued Antima. chus because he was an excellent Poet, did comfort him, and told him that ignorance did blind the vnderstanding of the ignorant, as blindnesse doth the sight of the blind. Aristonus an excellent player of the citherne, and one that had fixe times won the prifes of the Pythian games:to win Lyfanders fauor, promised him, that if ever he wanthe prise of his art againe, he would cause himselfe to be proclaimed Lysanders slave. This ambition of Lysander was very odious and grienous, onely vnto great persons, and men of his estate: but besides his ambition, in the end hebecame very proud and cruell, through the flatteries of his followers, and them that courted him: fo that he exceeded in recompencing his friends, as also in punishing of his enemies. For, togratific his friends and familiars, he gaue them absolute power and authority of life and death in their townes and cities: and to pacifie and appeale his anger where he once hated, there was no other way but death, without al possibility of pardon. And that he plainely shewed afterwards in the city of MILETVM, where, fearing left they would flie that tooke part with the people, and because he would have them appeare that hid themselves: he gave his word, and sware that he would do them no hurt at al. The poore men gaue credit to his word; but so soone as they came out and did appeare, he deliuered them all into the hands of their aduersaries, (which were the chiefest of the Nobility) to put them all to death: and they were no lesse then eight hundred men one with another. He caused great murders of people also to be done in other cities: for he did not onely put them to death that had privately offended him, but numbers besides, only to fatisfie and reuenge the private quarels, enmittee and coverousnes of his friends, whom he had in every place. And therfore was Eteocles LACED EMONIAN greatly commended for his faying: That GRECE could not abide two Lyfanders. Theophraslus writeth also, that the very like was spoken of Alcibiades by Archestratus. Howbeit in Alcibiades there was nothing but his infolencie and vainglory that men misliked: but in Lysander, a seuere nature, and sharpe conditions, that made his power fearefull & intollerable. Neuertheleffe, y LACED EMONIANS paffed ries Lysander had done him, spoiling and destroying the countrey under his gouernment: then Thoraxbut should returne immediatly vpon receipt thereof. the Ephori being offended with him, clapped vp Thorax in prison, one of his friends and Captaines that had ferued vnder him: and finding that he had both gold and filuer in his house contrary to the law, put him to death. And to himselse they sent immediatly that which they call

These two little states they call Scytales. Now when they will maner aduertise their General secretly of matters of importance, they take a serolle of parchment, long thing it is, and narrow like a leather thong, and wreath it about the round staffe, leauing no voide space be and here tweene the borders of the scrolle. Afterwards when they have bound them fast together, then they write vpon the parchment thus rolled what they will, and when they have done writing, vnfold it and send it to their General, who cannot else possibly reade it to know what is written, (because the letters are not joyned together, nor follow in order, but are scattered here and there)vntill he take his litle rolle of wood which was given him at his departure; and then wreathing the scroll of parchment about which he receiveth, the folding and wreaths of the parchment falling inft into the selfe same place as they were first folded, the letters also come to joyne one with another, as they ought to do. This little scrolle of parchment also is called as the rolle of wood, Scytala, even as we commonly fee in many places that the thing measured, is also calledby the name of the measure. When this parchment scrolle was brought vnto Lysander, who was then in the countrey of Hellespont, he was maruellously troubled withall, fearing about all other things the accusations of Pharnabazus: so he sought meanes to speake with him before he departed, hoping thereby to make his peace with him. When they were together, Lysander prayed him he would write another letter vnto the Lords of Sparta, contrarie to his first, how that he had done him no hurtatall, and that he had no cause to complaine of him: but he did not remember that he was a CRETAN, (as the common Prouerbe faith) that could deceine another Cretan. For Pharnabazus having promifed him that he would performe his defire, wrote a letter openly, purporting the effect of Lyfanders request: but behind he had another of contrary effect, folike on the outside vnto the other, that by fight no man could discerne the one from the other. And when he came to put to his scale, he changed the first with the last that was hidden, and gaue it him. When Lysander came vnto Sparta, he went as the Lysander manneris, straight to the pallace where the Senate kept, and gaue his letters vnto the Ephores, terragains thinking that by them he should have bene cleared from all danger of the greatest accusations bimselfe. they could have burdened him withall: because that Pharnaba Tus was very well thought on of mon prouerbe was true: That Vlyffes was not subtill alone.

Thereupon he went home to his house maruellously troubled; but within few dayes after returning to the pallace againe to speake with the Lords of the councell, he told them that he must needs make a voyage vnto the temple of Iupiter Ammon, to discharge certain sacrifices, which he Lyander had vowed & promised to him before he had won the battels. Some say, that indeed suprter Am- goesso supi. monappeared to him in a dreame as he did befiege the city of the APHYTÆIANS, in the country of THRASIA, and that by his commandement he raised the siege, and charged them of the city, that they should thanke Iupiter Ammon, and do facrifice vnto him: by reason whereof they thinke that he meant good faith, when he fued for licence to make this voyage into Lybia, to performe the vowes which he had made. But the most part did certainly beleeue, that he made futetogo this journy, for a cloke & colour only to absent himselfe, because he feared the Ephom,& that he could not endure the yoke & subjection which he must abide remaining at home. neither could like to be commanded. And this was the true cause of his sute to go this voyage, much like vnto a horse taken out of a fresh pasture and goodly medowes, to bring him into a stable, & make him to be iorneyed as he was before. Neuertheleffe, Ephorus writeth another cause, the which I will recite hereafter. In the end, Lyfander having hardly obtained licence, tooke ship and hoised saile: but during his absence, the kings of LACEDÆMON remembring that he kept all the cities at his commandement, by meanes of the friends he had in enery city, whom he had made chiefe governours of the fame, and that by their meanes he came in manner to be absolute prince ouer all GRECE, they took vponthem to redeliuer the gouernment of the towns and citics againe into the hands of the people, and also to put downe his friends whom he had stablished there. And hereupon fell outgreat insurrection again; for first of all, they that were banished the Lords of LACED EMONIA, for that he did euer shew himselfe willing and ready to helpe them in all their warres, more then any other of the kings Lieutenants of Persia. The Ephori

from ATHENS, having furprifed and taken the castle of Phyla, vpon the sodaine did set vponthe thirty gouernors tyrants (whom Lyfander had placed there) & ouercame them in battell. Wherupon Lyfander straight returned to Sparta, and perswaded the LACED EMONIANS to refer the gouernement to the number of a few, and to punish the infolency of the people. So by his procurement, they fent first an hundred talents vnto the thirty tyrants, for an aide to maintaine this war, and appointed Lylander himselfe generall. But the two kings of Sparta enuying him, and fearing left he should take the city of ATHENS againe, they determined that one of them would go. Whereupon Paulanias went thither immediatly, who in apparance feemed to maintaine the tyrants against the people: but in effect, he did his endeuour to appease this warre, for searc lest Lylander by meanes of his friends and followers should once againe come to have the city of A. THENS in his power, the which he might casily do. And thus having agreed the ATHENIANS againe one with another, and pacified all faction and commotion among them, he plucked vo the root of Lylanders ambition. Butflortly after the ATHENIAN's rebelling againe against the LACED EMONIANS, Pausanias himselfe was reproued, because he yeelded so much to the boldnesse and insolencie of the people, which were bridled and restrained before, by the authority of the small number of the Gouernors: and to the contrary, they gave Lylander the honor to be generall, who ruled not in this rebellion to please mens minds & to content them, neither with fond oftentation of glory, but feuerely, for the profit and commodity of Sparta. It is true, he would give great words, & was terrible to them that relifted him. As he answered the Augives one day, who contended for their confines with the LACED EMONTANS, and feemed to alledge the best reasons. Even they (said he) that shal prove the Aronger hereby (shewing the his sword) shall be they that shal pleade their cause best for their confines. Another time, when a ME GARI-AN had told his minde boldly enough in open councell, he answered him: Thy words (good friend) had need of a city, meaning thereby that he was of too meane a towne to vie fo great words. And to the Borotians also, who were in doubt to professe themselves friends or enemies:he sent vnrothe, to know if he should passe through their country with his pikes vpwards or downwards. And when the Corinthians also were revolted fro their alliance, he brought his army hard vnto their wals: but when he faw his men were afraid, and made curticy whether they should go to the assault or not; by chance spying a hare coming out of the towne ditches, he faid vnto them: Are ye not ashamed to be afraid to go and assauk your enemies, that are so cowardly & flothfull, as hares do keepe their formes at ease within the circuit of their wals! Now king Agis being deceased, he left behind him his brother Agestaus, & his supposed son Leosychides. Wherefore Ly fander that had loued Agefilaus aforetime, gaue him counsell to stand for the right of the crowne, as lawfull heire & next of the bloud, descending of the race of Hercules because it was suspected that Leorychides was Alcibiades son, who secretly had kept Timea Agis wife, at what time he was banished out of his country, and came then to remaine in Sparta. And Aeis felfe also, concluding by reckoning of the time of his absence, that his wife could not be with child by him, made no reckoning of Leotychides: (and had openly shewed it all the rest of his lifetime) that he did not acknowledge him for his fon, vntill fuch time as falling fick of that disease whereof he died, he was carried to the city of HERÆA: and there lying in his death bed, at the humble fute of Leotychides himselfe, & partly at the instant request of his friends, who were inportunate with him, he did acknowledge Leotychides for his fon in the presence of diverse, who he prayed to be witnesses vnto the Lords of LACED EMON, of his acceptatio & acknowledging of him to be his fon: which they all did in fauour of Leotychides. For all that, Agefilaus took it vpon him, by the support and maintenance of Lyfanders favour. Howbeit, Diopithes a wise man, and knowne to be skilfull in ancient prophecies, did great hurt to Agefilaus fide, by an ancient Oracle which he alledged against a descêt Agesilans had, which was his lamenesse:

O Sparian people you, which beare high haughtie hearts, And looke aloft: take heed I say looke well unto your marts: Lest whiles you stand vpright, and guide your state by grace, Some halting kingdome privily come creeping in apace. By that meanes might you move, great troubles, carke and care, And mischiefes heape upon your head, before you be aware: And plunged should you be, even over head and eares, With waste of warres, which here on earth doth perish many peeres.

Many by occasion of this Oracle, fell to take Leonychides part: but Lyfander declared vnto them. that Dispithes did not construct he meaning of the Oracle wel, For God, said he, cared not whether he halted of one legge or no, that should come to be king of LACED AMON: but indeed the crown and kingdome should halt and be lame, if bastards not lawfully begotten, should come to reigne ouer the true naturall iffue and right line of Hercules. By these perswasions, Lylander with his great countenance and authority befides, wan all men to his opinion: fo that Agefilans by Through this meanes, was proclaimed king of LACEDEMON. This done, Lysander began straightto working, counsell him to make wars in Asia, putting him in hope that he should destroy the kingdome Asessian, of Persia, and should come to be the greatest man of the world. Moreouer he wrote vinto his king. friends in the cities of Asia, that they should send unto the LACED EMONIANS to require king Agesilaus for their Generall, to make wars against the barbarous people. Which they did, and fent Ambaffadours purposely vnto Sparta to suethat they might have him the which wasno leffe honour procured vnto Agefilaus by Lylanders meanes, then that he did, in making him to bechosen king. But men ambitious by nature, being otherwise not vnapt nor vnfit to command, Ambition have this imperfection: that through the icalousie of glory, they do commonly enuie their e- abideth us quals, the which doth greatly hinder them from doing any notable things. For they take them equal. for their enemies, enuying their vertue, whose service and meanes might helpe them to great matters. Thus Agesilaus being chosen Generall of this enterprise, tooke Lysander with him in this journey, amongst the thirty counsellers which were given vnto him to affist him: and made speciall choise of him, as by whose counsell he hoped most to be gouerned, and to have him nearestabout him, as his chiefest friend. But when they were arrived in As 1A, they of the countrey having no acquaintance with Agestlaus, seldome spake with him, or but litle; and to the contrary, having knowne Lyfander of long time, they followed him, and waited vpon him to his tent or lodging, lome to honour him, because they were his friends, others for feare, because they did mistrust him. Euen much like as it falleth out oftentimes in the Theaters, when they play tragediesthere, that he that shall play the person of some messenger or servant, shall be the best player, and shall have the best voice to be heard aboue all others; and to the contrarie, that he which hath the royall band about his head, and the scepter in his hand, a man doth scant heare him speake. Euen so it fell out then: for all the dignity due vnto him that commanded all, was shewed only to the counseller: and there remained to the king no more, but the royall name onely of aking, without any power. Therefore methinks that this vndiscreete and importunate ambition of Lyfander, did well deserve reproofe, evento make him to be contented onely with the second place of honor next vnto the king. But for Agesilaus againe, through extreme couetousnes and ie alousie of glory, to cast Lysander altogether off, and to set so light by his friend and benefactor, that surely became not him neither. For first of all, Agesilaus neuer gaue Lysander occafion to do any thing neither did commit any matter of weight vnto him, that might be honourable for him: but which is worst of all, if he perceived that he had taken any mans causes in Azestans hand, and that he did fauour them, he did alwaies fend them backe againe into their countrey, printe demandation from the country gradgets denying their fuite, without that they could obtain any thing they fued for, leffe then the mea- tylander, nest persons that could have come, extinguishing Lysanders credit by little and little, and taking from him all authority by this meanes. Wherefore, Lyfander perceiuing how he was thus refused and rejected in all things, seeing that the countenance and fauour which he thought to shew vnto his friends, fell out hurtfull vnto them: left off to follicite their matters any more, & prayd Lyfanders them to forbeare to come vnto him, or to follow him, but to go to the king, and vnto those that wiledome. could do them better pleasure then himselfe, and specially those that honoured him. When they heard that, many defisted to trouble him any more in matters of importance, but not to do him all the honour they could, and continued still to accompany him, when he went out to walke, or otherwise to exercise himselfe; the which did aggravate and increase Agesilaus anger more against him, for the enuie he bare vnto his glory. And where he gaue very honorable charge and commission in the wars, oftentimes vnto very meane souldiers to execute, or cities to gouerne : the victuals. heappointed Lysander surveyor generall of all the ordinarie provision of victuals, and distribu-Lysanders ter of flesh. And then mocking the Ion ian's that did honor him so much: Let them go now, said king section he, and honor my flesh distributer. Wherefore Lysander seeing it high time to speake, went vnto laus after Agesilaus, and told him in few words after the Lacon I an maner: Truly Agesilaus, thou hast learned well to abase thy friends. Indeed, said heagaine, so have I, when they will be greater then my

felfe; and to the contrarie, they that maintaine and increase my honor and authority, it is reasont that I esteeme of them. Yea marry, said Ly (ander, but perhaps I have not done as thou sayest, ver I pray thee giue me such an office, as I may be least hated, and most profitable for thee though it be but in respect of strangers eyes that looke vpon vs both. After this talke betweene them, dee. Claus fent him his Lieutenant into the country of HELLESPONT, where Ly ander still kept this anger secret in his heart against him, but for all that, did not leave to do all that he could for the benefit of his mafters affaires. As amongst many other things, he caused a Persian Cantaine called Spithridates, to rebell against his master, who was a valiant man of his hands, and a great enemy of Pharnaba Zess, and had an army also, which he brought with him vnto Agefilaus. Now concerning this warre, this was all that he did in that journey. Wherefore he returned againe to Sparta not long after, with litle honor, being maruelloufly grieued & offended with Agestlaus, and having more then before, all the state and government of the city of Sparta: by reason whereof, he determined to put that in practise, which he had long time thought you concerning the alteration of government, and his enterprise was this: Amongst the of-spring and iffue of Hercules, who were mingled with the Dor IANS, and returned again into the country of Peloponnesys, the greatest number and chiefest of them, dwelled in the city of Spar-TA; how beit all they that came of that race had no right of fuccession to the crowner faving two families only, the Eurytiontides, and the Agiades. The other families, albeit they were all for nobility of bloud descended out of one selfe house, yet had they no more right nor interest vnto the realme, then the refidue of the people: for the dignitics that were attained vnto by vertue, were giuen vnto the inhabitants that could deserue the. Lysander then being one of those which was descended of the true race of Hercules, who notwithstanding had no interest in the crowner when he faw himfelfe aloft, and called to great honor through his famous acts & merits, and that he had won many friends, and great credit & authority by dealing in matters of the state: it grieued him much, to fee that they which were no nobler then himselfe should be kings in that city which he had increased by his vertue, and that he could not have so much power as to take from these two houses, the Eurytiontides & the Agiades, the prerogative that the kings should be chofen only out of one of these two houses, and to cast it vpon the of-spring of Hercules. Some say againe, that he would not only have enlarged that prerogative vnto the iffue of Hercules, but vnto all the naturall Spartans also: because that Hercules race should not only defire this reward of honor, but even they also that followed his steps in vertue, which had made him equall with the gods in honor. For he doubted not but if they would dispose the crowne in this fort, that there was no man in the city of Sparta that should sooner be chosen king then himselfe: whereupon he attempted first to perswade his citizens by very good reasons, & to bring this about y better he conned an oration without book, penned by Cleon Halicarnaffeus, made him for this purpose. But afterwards weighing with himfelfe, that to great and strange a change as he would bring in. had need of some better and stronger helpe; he began to frame a deuice, as they say, to moue the people by, much after the manner they vie in tragedies, framing engines to bring some godto come downe from heaven vnto them, and this was his fained invention. He deuised certaineoracles and prophecies, thinking that all Gleons rhetorick would stand him in no stead, if first of al he did not fill the citizens harts with some superstition and feare of the gods, thathe might bring them afterwards more eafily vnto reason. And Ephorus saith, that he proued first to corrupt the Nun with money, that gineth all the oracles and answers in the temple of Apollo at DELPHES: and that afterwards, he would have won the Nun also at the temple of Dodon E with mony, by Pherceles practife. And that he being rejected by them both, went laftly vnto the temple of fupiter Ammon: and that there he spake vnto the priests, and offered them great store of money for the same purpose. But they were so offended with Lysander, that they sent men of purposeto Sparta, to accuse him, that he would have corrupted them with mony. The councell clearing Lyfander of this accusation, the Lybians his accusers at their departing said: We will one day indge more infly, then you my Lords of LACED AMON have done now, whe you shall come to dwell in our country of LyBIA: supposing there was an ancient prophesie that said, the LACE-DEMONIANS one day should come to dwell in the countrey of Lybia. But we shall do better to write the whole story at large of this practife subtilty, & malicious deuice, which was no matter of small importance, nor lightly grounded: but as in a mathematicall proposition, there were many great coniectures and presuppositions, and many long circumstances to bring itto conclusion, clusion, the which I will dilate from point to point, deliuering that which an historiographer & philosopher both hath written. There was in the marches of the Realme of Powr, a woman Lylanders philosopher both hath written. There was in the marches of the Realme of Pont, a woman fained de that said, she was gotten with child by Apollo, the which many (as it is to be thought) would not wite to posbeleene at all, and many alfo did beleene it i fo that the being delinered of a goodly fonne, diners felle the noblemen and of great estate were carefull to bring him vp, and to haue him taught. This child kingdome. Iknow nor whereupon, nor how, was named silenus: and Lyfander fetching the plot of his denice from thence, added to all the rest of himselfe, to go on with his practise. Now he had many (and they no small men) that made his way to frame this icast, giving out a rumour of the birth of this child, without any suspition gathered out of the intent of this rumour. And furthermore, they brought other newes from DELPHES, which they dispersed abroad through the citie of Sparta, to wit, that the priefts of the temple kept fecret bookes of very ancient oracles, which they themselves durst not touch nor handle, neither might any man reade them, vnlesse he were begotten of the feed of Apollo, who should come after a long time, and make his birth appeare vnto the priests that kept these papers, and that by some secret marke and token, which they had amongst them: and thereby being knowne for Apollees sonne, he might then take the bookes and readethe auncient reuelations and prophecies of the same. These things prepared in this sort. there was order taken, that Silenus should come and aske for these bookes, as though he were the fon of Apollo: and that the priests which were priny to this practise, should make as though they did diligently examine him of every thing, and how he was borne. And that at the length, after they had feemed to know all, they should deliuer these prophecies vnto him, as if he had bene indeed Apolloes fonne: and that he should openly reade them in the presence of many wirnesses. And among the rest of the prophecies, that he should reade that specially, for the which this long paltry fained drift was framed, touching the kingdome of LACED EMONIA: that it was better, & meetlier for the Spartan's they should choose them for their kings, whom they found the meetest men of all their magistrates. But when Silenus was come to full age, and brought into GRECE of purpose to performethis practise, all the mysterie was marred by the faint heart of one of the players and companions of Lyfander, who holp him to countenance this device; who when the matter should haue taken effect, shrunke for feare, and let the mystericalone. This notwithstanding, nothing was betrayed in Lysanders life time, till after his death. For he died beforeking Agefilaus returned out of Asia, being fallen into warres with Bo Eoria before his Themans death, or rather having himselfe made GRECE to fall into warres. They do report it either way: of Barolia. and some lay the fault upon him, other upon the Thebans, & other upon them both: and they burthen the THEBANS withall, because they did vtterly ouerthrow the comon sacrifices which Diverseas. Agesslaus made in the city of Avilde. And they say also, that Androelides and Amphitheus did sustainmised mischis war among the Grecians, being before corrupted with mony by the king of Per-ginning of SIA, to bring wars vpon the LACED & MONIAN'S in GRECE: and began to inuade & destroy the shefewars. country of the Phocians. Other fay, that Lyfander was very angry with the THEBANS: because they only of al other their confederates, did askethe tenth part of all the spoile which was won in the war against the ATHENIANS: and that they were not pleased that Lyfander had sent themony away vnto Sparta. But about all, Lyfander did malice them most, because they were the first that made way for the ATHENIANS to be delivered from the oppression of thirty tyrants, whom he had stablished gouernors in ATHENS, and in whose favor (to make them to be dreaded the more) the LACED AMONIANS had ordained by a commo edict, that they that were Anedista. banished, and did flee from ATHENS, might lawfully betaken & apprehended in what place soeuerthey fled vnto3& that who soeuer should refist or let them to do it, they shold be proclaimed building rebels, and open enemies vnto the LACED EMONIANS. THEBES, with armour and mony, and the THEEAN'S did helpe them to begin and practife their. enterprise fo secretly, that it was not discovered. These were the causes why Lylander was so carnefly bent against the THEBANS, and his choler being so extreme, by reason of his melancholinelle that grew daily ypon him more and more through his age, he follicited the Ephon Be fo, that he perfyaded them to fend a garrifon thither; and himfelf taking the charge of them, you dertooke the journy straight with his men. But afterwards they fent king Paulanias also with an armie thither, who was to fetch a great compasse about to enter into the countrey of Bo B of 1A by mount Citheron: and Lyfander should go to meete him through the countrey of PHOCIDES. with a great company of fouldiers befides. Now as Lyfander went, he tooke the city of the OR. CHOMENIANS, who willingly yeelded themselues to him as sooneas he came thither. From thence he went to the city of LEBADIA, which he spoyled; and from thence he wrote vnto kine Paulanias, that departing from PLATÆES, he should march directly to the city of ALIARTE where he should not faile to meete him the next morning by breake of day at the towne wals. These letters were intercepted by certain souts of the THEBANS, who met with the messenger that carled the. Thus the Theban's having intelligence of their purpose, left their city in custody unto the Athenians who were come to aide them, and departed out of There about midnight, and marched al night with great freed, that they came to ALIART in the morning a litle before Lyfander, and put halfe their men into the city. Now for Lyfander, he was determined at the first to keepe his men upon a hill which is neare to the city, & there to tarry the coming of king Paulinias. But afterwards when he faw that the day was far fpent, and that he came not he could tary no longer, but arming himselfe, after he had made an oration vnto the confederares which he had brought with him, he marched on with his men in battel ray, longer then large, by the high way that went vnto the city. In the meane feason, the THEERAN'S that were left without the city, leaving ALIARTE on the left hand, did fet upon Lyfanders rereward of his army against the fountaine called Ciffufa: where the Poets faine that the nurses of Bacchus did wash him, when he came out of his mothers wombe, because the water that commeth out of it (though it be very cleare & fweet to drink) hath not with flanding (I cannot tell by what meanes) a colour like wine & not far from thence there grow great plenty of Styrap trees. The which the ALIARTANS do alledge, to proue that Radamanthus heretofore dwelt in that part, & do they his sepulcher there yetto this day, which they call Alea. And hard by that also, there is the monument of Alemena, which was buried (as they fay) in that place, and was maried to Radamanthus, after the death of Amphirryon. But the THEBANS who were within the city with the ALIARTIANS, stirred nor vntill they faw that Lyfander with the first of his troope was neare vnto the towne wals; and then opening the gates on the fudden, they made a fally out vpon Lyfander, & fluc him with his foothflaine by the I hebas. fayer and a few other, because the most part of the voward sed into the strengh of the battell. Howbeit the THEBAN'S gaue them not ouer fo, but followed them fo valiantly, that they brake their order, and made them al fly through the mountaines, after they had flaine 3000 of themin the field fo were the three hundred Thebans also slaine there, who followed their enemies so fiercely, till they recourred straight narrow waies, of great strength for the. These three hundred were in maner al those that were suspected in Thebes to favor the Laced Emonians secretly:wherfore, for the defire they had to take away this opinio from their citizens, they hazarded themselues to no purpose, and were cast away in this chase. King Pausanias heard news of this oouerthrow, going from PLATEE s vnto THESPIES, & went on further, marching still in battel ray towards Aliant B, where Thrasybulus also arrived at the self same time, bringing the aide of the ATHENIANS from THEBES. And whe Paulamas was purposed to send to askelicence of the enemies to take away the bodies of their men which they had flaine, to the intent to bury them: the old Spartans that were in his army, misliking it much, at the first were angry in themfelues. But afterwards they went vnto the king himfelf, to tell him that he dishonored Sparta, to offer to take vp Lysanders body by his enemies leave and favour, and that he should valiantly recourr himby force of armes, and honourably bury him, after that he had ouercome their enemies or else if it were their fortune to be overthrowne, that yet it should be more honorable for dead, is di- them to lie dead in the field by their Captaine, then to askeleaue to take up his body. But notwithstanding all these words of the old men, king Pausanias seeing that it was a hard matter to ouercome the THEBANS in battell, now that they had gotten the victory, and furthermore, that the body of Lysander lay hard by the wals of ALIARTE, and that he could not come to take it away without great danger, although they should win the battell : he sent a Herauld to the enemies, and hauing made truce for certaine dayes, he led his army away, and tooke vp Lyfanders body with him, and buried him after they were out of the confines of BOEOTIA, within the territoric of the PANOPEIANS: where vntill this day his tombe remaineth vpon the high way, Lyfanders going from DELPHES vntothe city of CHERONEA. Thus Paufanius campe being lodged there, it is faid there was a PHOCIAN, who reporting the battell vnto one that was not there, faid that the enemies came to giue a charge vpon them; as Lyfander had passed the Oplites. The other wondring at that, there was a Spartan avery friend of Lyfanders by, having heard all their talke, asked him what that was which he called Oplites: for that he had not heard that word named before. What answered the PHOCIAN to him againe. Euenthere it was where the enemies did ouerthrow y first of our men which were slaine in the fields: for the river that runneth by the wals of the city, is called Oplites. The Spartan hearing that, burst out in weeping for sorrow, Destine faying: Then I fee it is unpossible for a man to auoide his destinie. For Lyfander aforetime had an immitable. Oracle that told him thus:

Lyfander, take good heed, come not I thee aduife, Neare Oplites that rivers banks, in any kind of wife. Nor neare the Dragon he which is the earth her fonne, Who at the ength will thee affault, and on thy backe will runne.

Howbeit some take it, that this river of Oplites is not that which passeth by the wals of ALi-ARTE, but it is the river that runneth neare vnto the city of CORONEA, and falleth into the river of Phliarus, hard by the city; & they fay that in old time it was called Hoplia, but now they call Phliarus, of Phliarus, hard by the city; & they lay that in old time it was cancel Hopita, but they can risk in formantus. He that flue Lyfander, was an ALIARTIAN called Recehorus, who caried a Dragon Hopita, Jo. painted vpon his target: and this was that which the Oracle of likelihood did signifie. They say Meetherus allo, that in the time of the warres of Peloponnesvs, the Therans hadan Oracle from the five Lyfantemple of Apollo Ismenias: which Oracle did prophecy the battel which they wan by the castle of DELIVM, and the battell of ALIARTE also, which was thirty yeares after that. The effect of that Oracle was this:

When thou thy nets shalt spread the wolves for to intrap, Beware thou come not neare unto, a little hill by hap. Of Orchalide. Nor neare, to any his confines:

For there the craftie foxes keepestheir dens and privile mines. Hecalleth the territorie that is about Delivm, the vetermost confines, because Bosotta doth confine there with the countrey of Attica, and the hill Orchaide which is now called Alone confine fave the fove denne, which lies on the Gde of the city of A the hill or the fave denne, which lies on the Gde of the city of A the hill or the fave denne, which lies on the Gde of the city of A the hill or the fave denne which lies are the gde of the city of A the hill or the fave denne which lies are the gde of the city of A the hill or the fave denne which is now called the min. Alopecon(to fay the foxe denne) which lieth on that fide of the city of ALIARTE, that looketh towards mount Helicon. Lyfander being flaine, the Spartans tooke his death foill, that they Helicon would have condemned king Paufanias of treason by law who durst notabide the triall, but fled who the city of TEGEA, where he ended the rest of his life within the sanctuary of the temple exile. of Minerua. When Lyfander was dead, his poucrty appeared to the world, which made his vermefarre more famous, then when he lived. For when they faw, that for all the gold and filuer Lyfanders which had paffed through his hands, for all his great authority and countenance that he had catied, and for althat fo many cities and townes did come to honor him and briefly, for all that he commended had so great & puissant a kingdome in manner in his hands: yet he did neuer enrich nor increase ofter his his house with so much as one farthing. So writeth Theopompus, whom we should rather believe death, when he praiseth, then when he discommendeth: for commonly he taketh more delight to dispraise, then to praise any. It fortuned not long after, as Ephorus writeth, that the LACEDEMO-NIANS and their confederates fell at variance together, whereupon Lyfanders letters were to be Renethat were in his house. King Agestlaus going thither to peruse them, amongst other writings, found the oration penned by Gleon Halicarnasseus, which Lysander had prepared to per- Lysanders swade the Spartans to change their gouernement, and to declare vnto them that they should counting renoke the prerogatine which the Eurytiontides and the Agiades had: that the kings of Spar attering of the could not be chosen but out of the fermilies. At the kings of Spar atte kings of Spar attering of the kings of th ra could not be chosen but out of those two families, & to leave the prerogative at liberty, that dome. the chiefest magistrates might be lawfully chosen kings of Sparta. Agestians stood indisterent wisdomes to have showed this opation openly to the people that the Sparta of Sparta. to have shewed this oration openly to the people, that the SPARTANS might seewhat manner a forbearing citizen Lysander had bene in his heart. But Lacratidas, a graue wise man, and President at that to show extime of the councell of the Ephori, would not fuffer him: faying, that he should not dig Lyfander the dead.

out of his grave againe, but rather bury his oration with him, that was so passingly well and cloquently penned to perswade. Yet notwithstanding, they did him great honour after his death.& among ft others, condemned two citizens in a great fumme of mony, that were made fure to two of his daughters while he liued, & refused to marry them when he was dead, seeing their father died so poore: because they sought to march in his house, supposing he had bene rich, and forfooke them afterwards for their fathers pourty, when they faw he died a good and inft man, Thus we fee, that at Sparta there was a punishment for them that did not mary, or that maried too late, or that maried ill: and vnto this punishment were they most subject that sought great matches for couetousnesse of goods. This is all we have to write of Lylanders life and acts.

THE LIFE OF Sylla.

Syllaes kin-

mesty reproned by

bis great wealth,

Vcius Cornelius Sylla was of the race of the Patricians, who be the noblemen and gentlemen of Rom E: and there was one of his ancestours called Rufinus, that obtained the dignity of Confull. He notwithflanding his Consulship, wan more dishonour by defame, then he obtained honor by dignity of Consull. For they finding in his house about ten pounds worth of plate, contrary to the law at that time expresly forbidding it, he was expulsed the Senate, and lost his place there, after which dishonor once received, his issue neuer rose, nor yet recovered it. And Sylla himselfe had very little left him by his father: so that in his youth he was faine to hire another mans house, and sate at a small rent, as afterwards he was twitted in the teeth withall, when they faw him richer then they thought he had deferued. For when he gloried & boasted of the victory at his returne from the wars of Africk E, there was a noble man that faid vnto him: Why, how is it possible thou shouldest be an honest man, that Sillaes bor having nothing left thee by thy father, thou art now come to have fo much Now, though Rome had left her ancient iuftice and purenesse of life, wherewith she brought vp her people in former times, and that their hearts were poyfoned with couctous defire of vaine superfluous delights: yet notwithstanding it was a foule reproach to them that did not maintaine themselues in the pouerty of their fathers, as vnto them that did confume their patrimony, and bring all to naught which their parents had left them. But afterwards also when he caried the whole sway in Rome, and that he had put so many men to death: a free man being borne of the slaues infranchised, and being ready to be throwne downe the rocke Tarpeian, because he had saued and hidden one of theoutlawes and men proclaimed to be put to death whereforeur they were found, cast it in Syllaes teeth, how that they had lived & dwelttogether a long time in one felfe house, he having payed a thousand Nummos for the rent of the vppermost roomes of the same house, and syllathree thousand for all the neathermost roomes. So that betweene both their wealthes, there was but onely two thousand and fiftie Drachmas of Athens difference. And this is that we find in writing of his first wealth. As for his stature and person, that appeareth sufficiently by 5,1440, stature and person, that appeareth sufficiently by the statues and images that were made for him which yet remaine. But for his eies, they were likefire, and wonderfull red: and the colour of his face withall, made them the more fearefull That is, beto behold. For he was copper-nosed, and that was full of white streakes here and there: whereupon they say that the surname of sylla was given him, by reason of his colour. And there was a iester at ATHENS that finely mocked him in his verse:

of great importance, whereunto he should have taken good regard. For after he was once set at histable, he was not to be moued any more in matters of weight. Now, though from the table he wascommonly tound both very active, painefull, and feuere: yet falling into fuch company, by drinking, bowfing, & making good cheere, he suddenly became another maner of man. So that without all compatte of modesty and judgement, he was too familiar and conversant with playtrs, iesters, tumblers, and dancers: who when they had him in that veine, might do what they was greatly given, and eafily drawne after love and pleasure in such fort, as his gray haires could not restraine his voluptuous life. His unlawfull lusting loue began in his young yeares, with one Metrobius a common player, which stretched on increasing his amorous desire until his latter age. For at the first he loued Nicopolis a rich curtifan: & frequenting her company by oft accesse; belides that he spent the prime of his beauty and youth in feafting her with great delight and passing pleasure, she afterwards became in love with him, so that when she died, she made syllaher heire of all she had. He was heire also vnto his mother in law, who loued him as her ownbegotten sonne: and by these two good haps he was stept vp to pretie wealth. Afterwards being chosen Quæstor (to say treasurer) the first time that Marius was Consull, he imnued at the campe, he shewed himselfe a man of great service in all other things, but in this espe-cally, that he could wifely vie the benefit of any occasion offered him, and thereby wan Bocchus king of the Numidians to be his fast and faithfull friend: whose Ambassadours, that scaped from a company of Numidian theenes, he courteously entertained, and having given them goodly prefents, sent them backe againe with a safe conuoy. Now concerning king Bocchus, him, and for this cause sent secretly for Sylla, desiring rather that Ingurth should be taken by sylla, then by himselfe. Sylla brake this matter vnto Marius, of whom having received a small number of fouldiers to acompany him (without respect of perill or danger) went and committed him selfe to the faith and fidelity of one barbarous king, to take another: considering also that the king whom he trusted was so vniust of his word, euen vnto his nearest friends and con-sederates. Now Bocchus having Ingurth and Sylla both in his power, and brought himselfe to that pinch, that of necessity he must betray the one or the other: after he had taken good breath toresolue which of the two he should deale withall, in the end went on with his first plot and barked with him in his sourny into Africke, to warre with king Ingurth. When he was ar-

Sylla is like a blacke Berie sprinkled with meale.

It is not amisse to search out the naturall disposition of this man by such outward markes and becommeth tokens. It is faid also that he was so naturally given to mocke and lest, that being a yong man vnknowne, he would neuer be out of the company of players, fooles, and tumblers, but fill eating andtippling with them in dissolute manner. And afterwards also when he was in his chiefest au-color in thority, he would commonly eate and drink with the most impudent iesters and scoffers, and all vitruula such rakehels, as made profession of counterfeit mirth, & would strive with the badest of them purple cotogiue the finest mockes: wherein he did not only a thing vncomely for his yeares, and dishonored the maie fly of his office and dignity, but thereby also grew carelesse & negligent in matters would with him. Of this ryoting came (in mine opinion) his vice of letchery, whereunto he

he had of long time both hated and feared king Ingurth his fonne in law: infomuch, that after Theeaste he was ouercome in battell, and came to him for succour, Bocchus practifed treason against of Bocchus king Bocof Iugarths tugurt de deuice oftreason, and so deliuered Iugurth into Syllaes hands. Indeed Marius triumphed fortaking of king Ingurth: but his euill willers, for the spite and grudge they bare him, did attribute the glory & honor of Ingurths taking wholly vnto Sylla. That lecretly went to Marius heart, and specially for that Sylla being high minded by nature(comming then but newly from a base, obfcure, and vnknown life, to be knowne and well accepted of the people of Rome, and to taffe alfo what honor meant) became fo ambitious and couerous of glory: that he caused the story to be grauen in a ring, which he did euer after vie to weare & seale withall: wherein king Bocchns was delivering of Ingurth vnto Sylla, and Sylla also receiving Ingurth prisoner. These things misliked Marius much: but not with standing, judging that Sylla was not so much enused as himselfe, he tooke him with him vnto the wars. Marins in his second Consulfhip, made Sylla one of his Lieu. tenants: and in his third Confulship, he had charge under him of a thousand footemen, and did many notable and profitable exploits for him. When Sylla was his Lieutenant, he tooke one Capillus, a Generall of the GAVLES Tectofages. And when he was Colonell of a thousand foormen, he so wrought the Marsians (a populous nation of ITALIE) that he perswaded them to remaine good friends and confederates of the ROMAINES. For this his good feruice, he found that Marius grew in great misliking with him, because from thenceforth he neuer gaue him any honourable charge, or occasion to shew good service: but to the contrary, did whathe could to hinder his rifing. Wherefore, Sylla afterwards tooke Catulus Luctatius part, who was companion with Marius in his Confulship. This Catulus was a very honest man, but somewhat flacke and cold in martiall matters, which was the cause that indeed he did commit vnto Sylla all the speciall service and matters of weight in his charge: whereupon he gaue him occasion nor only to increase his estimation, but also his credit and power. For by force of armes, he conquered the most part of the barbarous people which inhabited the mountaines of the Alpesiand Catulus campe lacking victuals, having commission, he made a maruellous great quantity of provifion to be brought thither, infomuch as Catulus camp being plentifully victualled, they fent their ftore and furpluffage vnto Marius fouldiers, the which sylla himselfe writeth, did much mislike Marius. And this is the first cause of their enmity. The which being grounded vpon solightoccasion, was followed with civill warres, great esfusion of bloud, and with incurable factions and swist Sylla diffentions, that it ended at the length with a cruell tyranny, and confusion of all the Romaine state and Empire. This doth prouethat Euripides the Poet was a wise man, and one that foresaw the ruines of commonweale, when he counfelled, and also commanded gouernors to flie ambi-Ambieion is tion, as a most pestilent and mortall fury vnto them that are once infected withall. Now Sylla thinking that the reputation he had gotten already in the wars, would have made his wayopen to preferre him to some honorable office in the city of Rome: he was no sooner returned from the wars, but he would needs proue the peoples good wils vnto him, & procured his name to be billed among them that fued for the Prætorship of the city (that is to say, the office of the ordinary Judge that ministreth inflice vnto the citizens) but he was reiected by the voyce of the people. For the which he layd the fault vpon the meaner fort, faying, that the communalty knew well inough the friendship he had with king Bocchus, and that therefore they hoping that ishe were made Ædilis before he came to be Prætor, he would make them see noble huntings and great fightings of wild beafts of Lybia: and that therefore they did chuse other Prætors, and put him by his fuite, in hope to compell him by this meanes to be first of all Ædilis. Howbeit it feemeth that he doth not confesse the truth of his refusall: for his own act doth condemne himsyda dosen selse: because the next yeare following he was chosen Prætor, partly for that he wan the people with curtefie, and partly with mony. So he falling out with Cafar vponthat occasion, in his anger threatned him that he would vie the power and authority of his office vpon him. But Cafar imiling, answered him, Thou hast reaso to call it thine office, for indeed it is thine, because thou hast bought it. But after the time of his Prætorship was expired, he was sent with an army into Capa PADOCIA, colouring his voyage thither with commission to restore Ariobar Zanes into his kingdome againe: howbeit the only cause of his journy was indeed to suppresse king Mithridates alittle, who took too many things in hand, and increased his power and dominion with a new signiory of no lesse greatnes then that which he had before. In truth he brought no great army out of ITALY with him, but he was faithfully holpen by the cofederates of the ROMAINES in eucry place, through whose aide he ouerthrew a great number of the CAPPADOCIANS, & afterwards also a great number of the ARMENIANS, which came in like case to aide them: so that he expulsed Gordins king of Phrygia out of Cappadocia, and restored Ariobarzanes to his Realmeagaine. After which victory Sylla, remained by the riner of Euphrates, and thither Orobazon came unto him one Orobazus a Parthian, Ambassadour of Arfaces king of the Parthians. ambassa Now these two nations, the Romaines and the Parthians, were neuer friends before: dor from and that with other things shewed the great good fortune sylla had, that the PARTHIANS of the Part came first to him by his meanes to seeke triendship with the ROMAINES. They say, that re- thrans onto ceiuing this Ambassadour orobazus, he made three chaires to be brought out, the one for souls. King Ariobar anes, the other for Orobazus the Ambassadour, and the third for himselfe. which he placed in the middest betweene them both, and fitting downe in the same, gaue audience vinto the Ambassadour: for which cause the king of PARTHIA afterwards put Orobasusto death. Some do commend Sylla for this acte, for that he kept his state in such maiestie among the barbarous people. Other do reproue his ambition in it, shewing himselfe stately out of time, and to no purpose. We do reade that a Soothsayer of CHALDEA being in Orobaaustraine, hauing diligently viewed and confidered the physiognomy of Sylla, and all his other mouings and gestures of mind and bodie, to judge not by the climate of the countrey; but according to the rules of his art what his nature should be: all well considered of, he sayd that sillaone day must needes come to be a great man, and that he maruelled how he could suffer ighat he was not even then the chiefest man of the world. When Sylla was returned againe to Rome, one Cenforinus accused him of extortion, that he had carried away a great summe of Salla accesmoney with him, contrarie to the law, out of one of their confederates countrey: howbeit fed of extorhe profecuted not his accusation, but gaue it ouer. In the meane time the enmitte begunne bewixthim and Marius, kindled againe upon a new occasion of king Bocchus ambition: who partly to creepe further into the peoples fauour of Rome, and partly also for to gratific Sylla: game and dedicated certaine images of victory carrying tokens of triumph, vnto the temple of Imputer Capitolin, and next vnto them also the image of Ingurth, which he delinered into the hand of Sylla, being all of pure gold. This did so offend Marius, that he attempted to take themaway by force: but others did defend the cause of Sylla. So that for the quarrell of these two, the city of Rome taking armes, had like to have brought all to ruine: had northe warres cinil wari. ofthe confederates of ITALY bene, which of long time did kindle and smoke, but at the length bake out into open flame and sedition for that time. In this maruellous great warre which fell outvery dangerous, by fundry misfortunes and great loffes to the Romaines, Marius did mnotable exploite: whereby it appeareth, that the vertue of warlike discipline hath neede of astrong, lustie, and able body. For Sylla to the contrarie, having done notable service, and obmindmany profitable victories, wan the fame and estimation among the ROMAINES, of a mble fouldier, and worthie Captaine: and among the enemies themselues, of a most fortunate man. Notwithstanding, Sylla did not as Timothen, ATHENIAN, the sonne of Conon had done: who, when his aduersaries and ill willers did attribute his noble deeds vnto the fauour of Forune, and did paint Fortune in tables, that brought him all the cities taken and snared in nets whileft he flept, he tooke it invery ill part, and was maruellous angrie with them that did it, lying, that they robbed him of the glory that inftly belonged vnto him. Wherefore one day when this Timotheus was returned from the warres with great victories, after he had openly aquainted the Athenians with the whole discourse of his doings in his voyage, he sayd Timultum Vinothem: My Lords of ATHENS, Fortune hath had no part in all this which I have told vn- Athenian toyou. Hereupon the gods, it should feeme, were so angry with this soolish ambition of Timotheus, that he neuer afterwards did any worthy thing, but all went veterly against the baire the glorie withhim: vntill at the length he came to be so hated of the people, that in the end they banihedhim from ATHENS. But Sylla to the contrary, did not onely patiently abide their words, that said, he was a happie man, and singularly beloued of Fortune: but also increasing this Fortune the opinion, and glorying as at a speciall grace of the gods, did attribute the honour of his domgs vnto Fortune, either for a vaine glory, or for that he had in fancie, that the gods did profperhim in all his doings. For he wrote himselfe in his commentaries, that the enterprises which he hazarded most hotely according to the sudden occasion offered, did better prosper with him, then those which by good aduice he had determined of. Furthermore, when he lidthathe was better borne vnto Fortune, then to the warres: it seemeth that he confessed all his prosperitie came rather by Fortune, then by his worthinesse. And to conclude, it appeareth that he did wholly submit himselfe vnto fortune, acknowledging that he did altogether depend vpon her: confidering that he did attribute it to the speciall grace and fauour of the gods, that he neuer disagreed with Metellus his father in law, who was a man of like dignity and authorize as himselfe was. For where it was thought he would hauebene a great hinderer of his doings. he found him very courteous and gentle in his behalfe, in all that they had to deale in together, by reason of the society of their office. And furthermore, in his commentaries which he dedicated vnto Lucullus, he counfelled him to think nothing more certain & affured, then that which the gods should reueale vnto him, and command him in his nights dreame. He writethalso that when he was fent with an armie vnto the warres of the confederates, the earth suddenly opened about LAVERNA, out of the which immediatly came a maruellous bright flame of fire figur uppea that ascended up to the element. The wise men being asked their opinions about the same, radiosilla. made answer, that a very honest man, and also a maruellous faire man of complexion taking so ueraigne authority in his hands, should pacifie all tumules and seditions which were atthat time in Rom E. Whereupon Sylla faid it was himfelfe whom the gods meant, because that amongstother things he had the fingular gift of beauty, that his haire was yellow as gold : and he wasnot ashamed to name himselfe an honest man, after he had wonne so many notable great victories. Thus have we fufficiently fpoken of the truft he had in the favour of the gods. And furthermore he feemed to be very contrary in his maners, and vnlike to himfelf. For if he took away muchin one place, he gave as much more also in another. Some he preferred without cause: and others he put downe without reason. Hee would be very gentle vnto them of whom he would haue ought: and vnto those that sought of him, he would stand much vpon his honour, and look for great reverence. Whereby men could hardly differne his nature, whether pride or flattery did more abound in him. And as for the inequality he vsed in punishing of them that had offended him; fometimes he hanged up men for very small and light causes stome other times againe to the contrary, he patiently abode the most gricuous offences in the world, and lightly pardoned and forgaue fuch faults as were in no wife to be forgiuen; and afterwards againe wouldpunish right small crimes, with murthers, effusion of blood, and confiscation of goods. This judgement may be given of him: that by nature he had a malicious and a revenging mind: yet not withstanding he quallified that naturall bitternesse with reason giving place to necessity, and his benefit. For in this war of the confederates, his fouldiers flue Albinas one of his Lieutenants, beating him to death with staues and stones, being a man of goodly quality, and one that had bene Prætor. This great offence he passed ouer with filence, vsing no maner of punishment, and turned it to a boast in the end, saying that his men were the more obedient and diligent in any pecceof feruice that was to be done, and that he made them amend their faults by worthy feruice. And furthermore, hee did not regard them that did reproue him: but having determined with himselfe to destroy Marius, and to procure that he might be chosen General I in the warsagainst king Mithridates, because that this warre of the confederates was now ended: for this cause he flattered and curried fauour with his fouldiers that ferued under him. At his returne to Rome from these wars of the confederates, he was chosen Confull with Q. Pompeius, being then fifty Sylla chofen yeares old, and maried with Cacilia a noble Ladie, and Metellus daughter, who was then chiefe Bishop of Rome, for which mariage the common people sang songs and ballads up and downe Rome against him: and many of the Noble men enuied him for it, thinking him vinworthy of fo noble a Lady, whom they thought worthy to be Confull, as Titus Liuins faith. Now she was not his only wife, for he had a young wife before called Ilia, by whom he had a daughter. After he had maried Ælia, then a third called Calia, whom he put away because she brought him no children. But not with standing she went honourably away from him, with very good words of her, be fides many other goodly rich gifts he gaue her; how beit fhortly after he maried Metalla which made the world suffect that Calia was put away for her naughtinesse. Howsocuerit was, Sylla did euer honour and loue Metella: in fo much as the people of Rome afterwards making fute, that they that were banished for Marius faction might be called home againe: and being denied, and refused by Sylla, they cryed out with open voice for Metella, praying her to helpe them to obtain their request. And it seemeth also that when he had taken the city of ATHENS, he dealt more critelly with them, because that some of them had scoffed at Mesella from the wals:howbeit that was afterwards. So Sylla making his reckoning at that time that the Confulthip was a finall matter, in comparison of that which he looked for in electime to come: was marnellous maruellous desirous to go against Mithridates. But therein Marius also, of a mad furious ambition and couetous nesses of glory stood against him, and sued to go that iourny in like maner, being tion. fibiect to those passions, which never wax old, as we may daily see by experiece. For being now a heanie man, fickly of body, and broken in feruice abroad in the wars, from the which he came but newly home, and brused moreouer with age: did not with standing yet aspire to have the charge of the wars fo farre off beyond the feas. Wherefore to obtaine his purpose, whilest sylla was gone a litle vnto the campe to give order for certainerhings that were to be done, he remaining in the city, did practife this pestilent mortall sedition, which alone did more hurt vnto the wonderfull city of Rome, then all the enemies that Rome euer had: the which the gods themselves had fignes Jene foreshewed by many signes and tokens. For fire tooke of it felfe in the states of the ensignes, before the which they had much ado to quench. Three Rauens brought their your ones into the high civil wars. way, and dideate them vp in the fight of many people, and afterwards carried the garbage they left of them in their nests. Rats also having gnawne some lewels of gold in a Church, the sextens ferting a trap for them; as a rat was taken full of yong, and kindled fine yong rats in the trap, of the which she ear vothree. But more yet, on a faire bright day when there was no cloud scene in the element at all, men heard fuch a sharpe found of a trumpet, that they were almost all out of their wits, for feare of fo great a noise. Whereupon the wife men and foothfayers of THVs -CAN being asked their opinions, they answered that this so ftrange and wonderfull a signe did The Thusforeshew the change of the world, and the departure out of this into another life: for they hold opinion, that there should be eight worlds, all contrary one vnto another, in manners and worlds. falhions of life: vnto enery one of the which, fay of they, God hath determined a certaine time ofcontinuance: but that they should all end their course within the space of the revolution of the great year eand that when the one is ended, and the other leady to begin, there shall appeare such strange signes on the earth, or in the element. So that such as have studied that science, do certainly know, as foone as men be borne, which are meere contrary unto the first in their lives and maners, and which are either more or leffe acceptable vnto the gods, then those which lived informer age. For they fay, that among st great changes and alterations which are done in those places from one age vnto another, the icience of chinination and foretelling of things to come, doth grow in reputation, and meeteth in their predictions, when it pleaseth God to fend most certaine and manifest signes, to know and foretel things to come. And in contrariwise also in another age it groweth to contempt, and loseth her reputation for that it is very rash, and faileth to meete with themost part of her predictions, because she hath but obscure meanes, and all her infruments defaced to know what should come. And these be the fables which the wifest foothlayers of THVICAN reported abroad, and they specially who seemed to have some singular speculation about others. But as the Senate were talking with the foothfayers of these woders, being affembled together within the temple of the goddesse Bellona, a sparrow came flying into thechurch in fight of them all, and caried a graffiopper in her bill, and parted it in the middeft, & left one part within the temple, and caried the other away with her. Whereupon the wife men and interpreters of fuch wonders, faid, that they doubted a commotion & a rifing of the country men against the commons of the city, because the common people of the city do crie out continually like grashoppers, & the husbandmen do keepe themselves upon their lands in the county. Thus Marins grew great and very familiar with Sulpitius, one of the Tribunes of the peo- The wicked. ple, who in all kinds of wickednesse and mischieferhara mar. can reckon, would give place to no lining creature: so that a man need not to feeke or demand any where for worse then he, but Tribune. the question is rather wherein he himselfe was not the worst of all others. For he was full repleat with all kinds of cruelty, anarice, and raffinesse, and that so extremely, as he cared not what villany and wickednesse he openly committed, so that the same might turne to his profit. For he had fet up a table in the open market place, where he fold freedome, making flaues and ftrangers denizons of Romn for their money: and for that purpose he entertained a guard of three thousand about him, besides a band of yong gentlemen of the order of knights that attended alwaies vpon his person ready at his commandemet, whom he called the gard against the Senare. And furthermore, himselfe having passed a law by the voice of the people, that no Senatour should borrow nor owe aboue two thousand Drachmas; it was found that at the houre of his death, he dyed three millions of Drachmas in debt. This man now like a furious raging beaft, being left by Marins amongst the people, turned all things topsic turney, by force of

Marine or armes and maine strength. He made also many wicked lawes to passeby voice of the people, and amongst others, that one specially, whereby he gaue Marius commission to make warres against king Mithridates. For which extreme oppressions and dealings of Sulpitius, the two Confuls (Sylla and Quintus Pompeius) left off to heare publike causes, and ceassed the common course of law and inflice. And as they were one day occupied about the adiornement of the law in an timely read came vpon them with his fouldiers, and flue many people, and among others, the Confull Pome peins owne fonne, and the father himselfe being Consull, had much ado to sauchis lifeby flying. And Sylla the other Confull, was also pursued even into Marius house, where he was compelled to promife before his departure, prefently to go and reuoke the adiornement of the law which he had before commaunded. Thus Sulpitius having deprined Pompeius of his Confulfhip, did not depose sylla, but onely tooke from him the charge he had given him to make warres against Mithridates, and transferred that vnto Marius. And sending Colonels to the city of NoLA to receive the armie that lay there, and to bring them vnto Marius, Sylla prevented them, and fled to the campe before them, and told the fouldiers all what had paft as it was indeed: who when they heard it, fell all to a tumult, and flue Marius Colonels with stones. Marius on the other fide put all Syllaes friends to death at Roma, and tooke the spoyle of their goods and houses: so was there nothing else but flying from the campe to Rome, and from ROME to the campe againe. The Senate were in manner befides themselves, not being able togouerne as they would, but driven to obey Marius and Sulpitius commandements. Who being aduertised that Sylla was comming towards Rome, sent straight two Prætors vnto him. Brutus and Servitius, to command him as from the Senate, to approch no nearer. These two Prætors spake a litle too boldly vnto Sylla: wherupon the souldiers fell to a mutiny, in such fort. that they flood indifferent whether to kill them presently in the field or no howbeit they brake their axes and bundels of rods, which were caried before them, & took their purple robes wherwith they were apparelled as magistates, from the & sent them home thus shamefully handled and intreated. Vpon their returne now to Roma, their fad filence only, and them selues so firing ped besides of all their markes and tokens of Prætoriall dignity, made all menthen to judge that they brought no other newes, but fuch as were the worst that possible could be: and that there was no way then left to pacifie the fedition, which was now altogether vncurable. Wherefore Marius and his followers began to make himselfe strong by force and Sylla with his companion Quistus Pompesus, departed in the meanetime from the city No 1 A, and brought fixe entire legions on with him, who defired no other thing but to make haft to march to Rome ward. Howbeit Sylla stood in doubt with himselfe what to do, thinking of the great danger that might follow. Vntill fuchtime as his foothfayer Posthumius having confidered the fignes and tokens of the facrifices, which Sylla had made upon this determination, gaue him both his hands, and bad him bind them hard, and shut him up fast, untill the day of battell should be past: faying that he was contented to fuffer death, if he had not good fuccesse, and that out of hand, to his great homour. And it is faid also, that the same night there appeared vnto Sylla in a dreame the goddesse Bellona, whom the ROMAINES dogreatly honour, following therein the CAPPADOCIANS: and I know not whether it be the Moone, Minerua, or Enyo the goddesse of battels. So he thought, that she comming to him did put lightning into his hand, commanding him that he should lighten vpon his enemies, naming them one after another by their proper names: and that they being striken with this lightning, fell downe dead before him, and no man knew what became of them. This vision incouraged Sylla very much, and having reported the same to Pompeius, his fellow Confull and companion, the next morning he marched with his army to Rouse When he was at Picine s, there came other Ambassadours vnto him, to pray him in the name of the Senate that he would not come to Rome in this heate and furie, declaring therewithall that the Senate would grant him all things that should be meete and reasonable. When Sylls had heard the ineffage, he answered them, that he would campe there: and so commanded the marshals to deuide the squadrons according to their manner. The Ambassadours beleeuing that he would have done fo indeed, returned againe to Rome: howbeit their backes were no sooner turned, but Sylla straight sent Lucius Basillus, and Caius Mummius, before to seize one of the gates of Rome, and the wall which were on the side of mount Esquilin, and he himselfe also in person with all possible speed marched after them. Basillus entred Rome, and wanne the gate by force. But the common people ynarmed, got them vp ftraight to the top of their houses, and with tiles and stones stayed and kept him, not onely for entring any further: but also draue him backe againe, even to the very wals of the city. In this hurly burly came Sylla himfelfe to Rome, who feeing apparantly in what state things stood, cryed out to his men, and bade them fet fire on the houses: and himselfe taking a torch light in his hand, shewed them the way what state the they should do, appointing his archers and darters to hurle and bestow their darts and other fire fiery instruments, to the tops of the houses. Herein he was too much our come with vnreaso- Rome. nable choler, passion, and defire of reuenge: for seeking onely to plague his enemies, he tooke noregard to friends, to parents or confederates, neither had he yet any manner of remorfe or pitie: fuch and fo fierie was his anger then, that he put no kinde of difference betweene those that had offended, and them that had done him no hurt at all. By this meanes was Marius driuen into the city, vnto the temple of the Earth, where he made open proclamation by found of trumpet, that he would make free all the flaues that would come to his part. But forthwith came his enemies, fet vpon him, and prest him so neare, that he was constrained vtterly to flie and for fake the city. Then Sylia affembling the Senate, caused Marius, and certaine others, to- Marine and gether with Sulpitius Tribune of the people, to be condemned to death. Sulpitius was betrayed Sulpitius by affauc of his owne, whom Sylla made free according to his promife pair by publike edict: to death. but when he had made him free, he caused him to be thrown e down e headlong from the rocke Treson Tarpeian. And not contented with this, he promifed by proclamation a great furmer of mony to him that would kill Marius: a very ingrate and vnthankfull part, confidering that Marius Theingranot many daies before, having Sylla in his owne house, in his hands and custodie, delivered him titude of Sylla refrom peril, and fet him in fafety. Which if at that time he had not done, but had fuffered Sulpitius Synare. to have flaine him, himselfe had bene sourraigne Lord of the whole without all contradiction, and might have ruled all things at his own will and pleasure. But Sylla shortly after vpon the like advantage, vied no fuch maner of requitall or gravity towards him, which bred a fecret mifliking amongft the Senate: howbeit the common people made open show of the cuill will they bare vnto Sylla, by rejecting one Nonius his nephew, and one Sernius, who vpon confidence ofhis fauour, prefented themselves to sue for certaine offices. And besides the shame of this refusall, to spite him the more, they chose others in their steades, whose honour and preferment they right well knew that Sylla would not onely mislike, but be much offended withall. Howbeit he wisely diffembling the matter, seemed to be very glad, saying that by this meanes the people of Rome enjoyned a full and perfect liberty, that in fuch cases of election they might freely do what themselves listed. And to mitigate somewhat the peoples ill will towards him, he determined to chuse Lucius Cinna Consull, who was of a contrarie faction vnto him: Lucius Cinhaving first bound him by solemne oath and curse to fauour his doings and whole proceedings. n: conful. Whereupon Cima wentyp to the Capitoll, and there holding a stone in his hand, did solemnely so be syllars fweare and promife, that he would be Syllaes faithfull friend; befeeching the gods if he did the friend. contrarie, that he might be throwne out of Rome, even as he threw that stone out of his hand: and with those words, threw it to the ground before many people. But not with standing all these curfes, Cinna was no fooner entred into his Confulship, but presently he began to change and alterall. For amongst other things, he would needs have Sylla accused; and procured Verginius, one of the Tribunes of the people, to be his accuser. But Sylla left him with his Iudges, and wentto make warres against Mithridates. And it is faid, that about the time that Sylla tooke sylla mene flip, and departed out of ITALIB, there fortuned many tokens and warnings of the gods vnto against Alibbida king Mithridates, who was at that present in the citie of Pergamys: as amongst others, ter. that the PERGAMENIANS to honour Mithridates withall, having made an image of victory, carrying a garland of triumph in her hand, which was let downe from aloft with engines: fo some as the was ready to put the garland vpon his head, the image brake, and the crowne fell to the ground in the middest of the Theater, and burst alto peeces. Whereby all the people that were present, were stricken with a maruellous feare, and Mithridates himselfe beganne to mislike this enill lucke: although all things at that time fell out more fortunately then he looked for. For he had taken Asia from the Romaines, and Bithynia and Cappadocia, from Millrida. the kings which he had driven out: and at that time remained in the city of Pergamvs, to tespowerdeuide the riches and great territories among his friends. As touching his fonnes, the eldest governed the realme of Pontvs, and Bosphonvs, which he inherited from his predecessors, euen vnro the deferts beyond the marishes of Moeotides, without trouble or molestation of any man. The other also, Ariarathes, was with a great army in conquering of THRACIA, and MAA CEDON. His Captaines and Licutenants moreover, didmany notable conquests in diverse places, with a great power: amongst the which, Archelans being Lord and master of all these for the great number of ships he had, conquered the Iles Cyclades, and all those beyond the head of Malea, and specially amongst others, the Ile of EVBOEA. And beginning at the city of ATHENS, had made all the nations of GRECE to rebell, even vnto THESSALIE, faving that he received some losse by the city of CHERONEA. Where Brutius Sura, one of the Lieu tenants of Sentins gournour of Macedon (a man of great wisedome and valiantnesse) came against him, and stayed him for going any further, oue running the whole countrey of Bo E o. TIAlike a furious raging river. And fetting vpon Archelaus by the city of CHERONEA, OUCL. threw him in three feuerall battels: repulled, and enforced him to take the feas againe. But as Brutius was following him in chase, Lucius Lucullus sent him commandement to give place vnto Sylla, to follow those warres against Mithridates, according to the charge and commisfion in that behalfe given him. Whereupon Brutius Sura went out of the countrey of Boso-TIA, and returned towards his Generall Sentine, notwithstanding his affaires prospered better then he could have wished, and that all GRECE were very willing to revolt, for the reputation of his wifedome and goodnesse. Howbeit the things that we before have spoken of, were the most notable matters that Brutius did in those parts. Sylla now vpon his arrivall, recoursed immediatly all the other cities of GRECE: who being aduertifed of his comming, fent prefently to pray him to come to their aide, the city of Athens onely excepted, which was compelled by the tyrant Aristion, to take part with Mithridates. Sylla thereupon with all his power went thither, befreged the hauen of Pir As round, causing it to be battered and assaulted on every fide, with all forts of engines and inftruments of batterie: whereas if he could have had patience but a little longer, he might have had the high towne by famine, without putting himselse in any manner of danger, the same being brought to such extreme dearth and scarcity of all kinde of victuals. But the hafte that he made to return again to Rome, for feare of the new change which he heard of daily from thence, compelled him to hazard this warre in that fort with great danger, many battels, and infinite charge: confidering alfo, that besides all other provision and furniture, he had twenty thousand mules and mulets labouring daily to furnish his engines of batterie. And when all other wood failed him, because his engines were oftentimes marred after they were made, some breaking of themselues by reason of their weight, others confumed with fire throwne from the enemies: at the length he fell to the holy wood, and cut downe the trees of the Academia, being better flored and furnished, then any other parke of pleafure in all the fuburbes of the city, and felled downe all the wood of the parke Lycæum. And franding in need of a great fumme of money to entertaine this warre withall, he dealt also with the holiest temples of al GR ECE, causing them to bring him from the temples of Syllatooke EPIDAYRYM and OLYMPYS, all the richest and most precious iewels they had. He wrotemoreouer vnto the councell of the Amphictyons holden in the city of Delphes, to bring him and ready the ready mony they had in the temple of Apollo, for that it should be kept in better safety with him, then if it fill remained there: promifing befides, that if he should by occasion becomzemples of pelled to vie it, he would reftore as much againe vnto them: and for this purpose he sent Caphia Greece and brought it PHOCIAN, one of his very friends and familiars, and commanded him to weigh all that he took. So Caphis went vnto DELPHES: but when he came thither, being afraid to touch the holy Caphis fisthings, in presence of the councell of the Amphyeryons he wept, that the teares ranne downe by his cheekes, as a man compelled to do fuch an acte against his will. And when somethat were present, told Caphis that they heard the sound of Apolloes Citherne in the temple: whether he beleeued it was so indeede, or because he would put this superstitious feare into Syllaes head, he wrote to him of it. But Sylla mocking him fent him word that he maruelled he could not confider, that finging and playing on the Citherne, were tokens rather of ioy then of anger, and therefore that he should not faile to proceede farther, and bring him those things which he commanded, for that (faid he) Apollo did give them him. Now for the other levels of the temple of Apollo, the common people knew nor that they were fent vnto Sylla but the filmertunne, which only was that that remained of the offerings of the kings, the Amphicarous were faine to breake that in peeces, because it was so great and massie, that the beasts of draught could not draw it whole as it was. This act made them to remember the other ancient Ro-M AINE Captaines, as Flaminius, Manius Acilius, and Paulus Amylius: of the which, the one haning driven king Antiochus out of GRECE, and the rest also having overthrowne the kings of MACEDON, they never once touched the gold and filter of the temples of GRECE: but contrarily fent their offerings thither, and had them all in great honour and reuerence. But as to them, they were all captaines lawfully chosen and sent to their charges: their fouldiers well trained, and obedient at commandement, void of rebellion, or any manner of mutinie. And for of the autin themselues, were kings in greatnesse of courage and magnanimity of mind: but in expense of ent Rotheir persons, very spare and scant, without any lauish, but needfull and necessary, proportioned taken for by reason, and thinking more shame to flatter their souldiers, then feare their enemies. Now ordering of the captaines contrarily in Syllaes time, fought not their preferment in the common-wealth by their foul vertue, but by force, and having greater warres one with another, then with strangers their ene- also for mies, were compelled to flatter their fouldiers whom they should command, and to buy their their mopaines and service, feeding them still with large and great expences, to please and content them. Wherein they did not confider, that they brought their country into bondage, and made themfelues flaues of the vilest people of the world, whilst that in the meane time they sought to commaund by all meanes possible those, which in many respects were farre better then themselves. And this was the cause that both draue Marius out of Rome, and made him also to return againe against Sylla. This felfe same cause made Cinna to kill Octanius, and Fimbria to slay Flacens: Syllathe of which ends sylla was the very first and only author, spending out of all reason, and giving the spelled all fouldiers largely that served vnder him, to win their goodwils the more, and thereby also to all good served. lurethem. By reason whereof, sylla had need of mountaines of money, and specially at the siege of soldiers. where he was: both to make strangers traytors, and besides, to surnish and satisfie his owned iffolute fouldiers: for he had fuch an earnest defire to take the city of ATHENS, that he could not berie and possibly be diffwaded from it. And either it was of a certaine vaine ambition he had to fight a- sufferance. gainst the ancient reputation of that city, being then but a shadow to that it had bene: or else of avery anger, for the mockes and gibes which the tyrant Ariflion gaue in his speeches from the wals, against him and Metella, to spite him the more withall. This tyrant Arifton was full of all crueltic and wickednesse, having taken vp all the worst qualities and greatest imperfections of the wicking Mithridates, and heaped them wholly together in himselse: by reason whereof the poore the typant city of ATHENS which had escaped from so many warres, tyrannics, and civill diffentions untill Arifion. that prefent time, was by him, as by an vncurable difeafe, brought vnto al extremity; for a buffiell of wheate was worth a thousand Drachmas, and men were driven for famine to eate feuersew that grew about the castle: and they caused old shoots and old oyle potsto be sodden, to deliuer some fauour vnto that they did eate, whilst the tyrant himself did nothing all day long but cram in meate, and drinke drunke, dance, maske, scoffe, and flour at the enemies, suffering the holy lampe of Minerua in the meane season to go out for lack of oyle. And when the Nun of the same temple fent vnto him for a quarter of a bushell of wheate, he fent her a quarter of a bushell of pepper. And when the counsellors of the city, the priests & religious came to the castle, holding up their hands, and befeeching him to take femepitic of the city, and fall to composition with Sylla: he made them to be driven away & scattered with slings. In the end, very late, & yet with great ado, he fent two or three of his quaffing companions vnto sylla, who whe they were come to him, made no demand of composition for the towne, but began to praise and magnifie the deeds of Thefeus, of Eumolpus, and of the ATHENIANS against the MEDES. Whereupon Sylla made them this answer: My goodly orators, returne you againe with all your rhetoricke; for the ROMAINES sent me not hither to learne nor to study, but to ouercome & conquer those that are rebelled against them. In the meanetime there were certaine spies in the city that heard old men talking together in a place called Ceramicus, blaming the tyrant because he kept no better watch on that fide of the wallthat was directly ouer against the Heptachalchon, which was the onely place where the enemies might eafilieft get vp vpon the wals. Those spies wet straight vnto Sylla & told him what they had heard the old men fay. Sylla tracted no time, but came to the place in the night to fee it: and perceiving that it was to be taken, fet the matter straight abroach. And himfelfe writes in his commentaries, that the first man that scaled the wals, was Marcus Teins: The groun who finding a fouldier ready to refift him, gaue him fuch a fore blow with his fword upon his relianting headpeece, that his fword brake in two and yet not with standing that he saw himselfe naked & fram, disarmed of a sword, did not for al that give backe, but stood still to it, and kept the place so long till through him the city was taken, and all vpon the talke of these old men. So Sylla caused the wall to be pulled downe betweene the hauen of PIR AA, and the holy hauen and hauing before made the breach very plaine, entred into the city about midnight with a wonderfull fearefull order, making a maruellous noise with a number of hornes, and sounding of trumpets, and all his armie with him in order of battell, crying, To the facke, to the facke: kill, kill. For he had given them the towne in spoyle, and to put all to the sword. The souldiers therefore ranthrough the streetes with their swords drawne, making an uncredible slaughter: so that to this day they be not acknowned nor do not declare what number of persons were flaine, but to shew the greatnes of the murder that there was committed, the place is yet extant to be seene where the blood ranne. For befides them that were flaine through all the city, the blood of them onely that were flaine in the market fleed, did wet all the ground of Ceramicus, euen vnto the very place called Dipylon: and some say also, that it ranne by the gates into the suburbes of the city. But if the muliitude of the people that were flaine in this fort were great, much more (or 10 many at the leaft) it is faid were those that flue themselues, for the forrow and compassion they had to see their countrey in such pitifull state, supposing certainly that their city was now come to vtter ruine and destruction. This opinion made the noblest men of the city to despaire of their owne fafetie, and feared to line any longer, because they thought they should find no mercy, nor moderation of cruelty in Sylla. Notwithstanding, partly at the requests of Midias and Calliphon, who were banished men from ATHENS, and fell at Syllaes feete vpon their knees: and partly also at the requests of the Romaine Senators that were in his campe, who prayed him to pardon the body of the city, and the rather for that he had already quenched the thirst of his rauening mind fufficiently well: after that he had fomewhat faid in praise of theancient ATHENIAND, he concluded in the end, to give the greater number vnto the smaller, and the living to the dead. Sylla writeth himselfe in his commentaries, that he tooke the city of ATHEN'S on the very selfe day of the calends of March, which commeth to agree with the first day of the moneth that we call Anthesterion, on the which day by chance many things are done at Athens in memory of Noes floud, and of the vniuerfall destruction of the whole world, that was in old time by rage of waters, falling out even in that very moneth. When the city was thus taken, the tyrant Aristion fled into the castle, where he was besieged by Cu. vio, whom Sylla left there of purpose about that matter. And after he had a great time kept it, at the last constrained thereunto for lacke of water, he yeelded. The castle was no sooner given vp, but immediatly by Gods prouidence, the weather miraculoufly altered. For the selfesame day, and the very selfe instant that Curio carried the tyrant Aristion out of the castle, the clement being very faire and cleare, the cloudes suddenly gathered together, and there fell fuch a maruellous glut of raine, that all the castle was full of water. Shortly after also, Sylla hauing gotten the hauen of Pirka, burnt the greatest part of the buildings: amongst others was the arfenall and armorie, which Philo in old time had caused to be built, being of a strange and wonderfull edifice. In the meane time, Taxilles, one of the Lieutenants of King Mithridates, comming from THRACIA and MACEDON, with a hundred thousand footmen, ten thousand horsemen, and fourescore and ten thousand carts of warre all armed with sithes: fent vnto Archelaus to ioyne with him, lying yet at anker in the hauen of Munychia, and not willing to leave the fea, nor come to fight with the ROMAINES, but feeking rather to draw these warres out in length, and to cut off all victuals from his enemies. Sylla vinderstanding this drift better then himselfe, departed out of the countrey of ATTICA (avery barren soyle, and indeed not able to keepe him in time of peace) and went into Borotia: wherein most men thought he committed great errour to leave ATTICA, which is a very hard countrey for horsemen, and togo into Boxoria, a plaine champion: and so much the rather, because he knew well inough that the chiefest strength of the barbarous people consisted in their horsemen, and their armed carts with fithes. But to avoide famine, and lacke of victuals as we have faid, he was compelled to feeke battell. Furthermore, he had another cause also that made him affraid, and compelled him togo: and that was Hortenfius a famous Captaine, and very valiwith fither ant alfo, who brought him aide out of THESSALIE; and the barbarous people lay in waite for Tie firaight him in his way, in the straight of Thermopyles. And these were the causes that made Sylla take his way into Bosoria. But in the meane time, Caphis that was our countrey man, deceiving the barbarous barbarous people, guided Hortensius another way by mount Parnassius, and brought him under Parnassius the city of Tithora, which was not then fo great a city as now at this present it is, but was a The city of caffle onely, situated vpon the point of a rocke, hewne all about: whither the Phocians in old Tithora. time flying king Xerxes comming vpon them, retired themselues for their safetie. Hortensius lodged there, and there did also both defend and repulse his enemies, so long as day-light lasted; and when the night came on, got downe through very hard stonie waies, vnto the city of PATRO- Syllaand NIDE, where he loyned with Sylla, who came to meete him with all his power. Thus being loyned together, they camped vpon a hill that standeth about the middest of the plaine of Elatca: tronide. the foyle was very good, and well replenished with great store of trees and water at the foot of The plaints the same. The hill is called Philobæotus, the nature and situation whereof, Sylla doth maruel- Philobeoth loufly commend. When they were camped, they feemed but a handfull in the eye of their enemies: and no more they were indeede, for they had not aboue fifteene hundred horfe, and arms togelesse then fifteene thousand footmen. Whereupon the other Captaines their enemies, against ther 1900 Archelaus mind, brought out their bands into the field, and filled all the valley and plaine thereabouts with horfemen, with carts, with shields and targets, so that the aire was even cut as under formen. as it were with the violence of the noise and cries of so many fundry nations which all together did put themselves in battel ray. The sumptuousnesse of their furniture moreover, was not altogether superfluous and vnprositable, but served greatly to scare the beholders. For the glissering armour of of their harnesse, fo richly trimmed and set foorth with gold and silver, the colours of their ar- furniture ming coates vpon their curaces, after the fashion of the MEDES and SCYTHIANS, mingled with of the Threethe bright gliftering feele and shining copper, gaue such a shew as they went and remound too Matedoniand fro, that made a light as cleare as if all had bene on a very fire, a fearefull thing to look vpon. and from the fearing Infomuchasthe Romaines durft not formuch as once go out of the trenches of their campe, Taxilles nor Sylla with all his perfwasion could take away this great conceiued feare from them: wherefore (and because also he would not compell them to go foorthin this feare) he was driven not threstates to flir, but close to abide, (though it griened him greatly) to see the barbarous people so proudly Lieutenans andvillainously laugh him and his men to scorne. How beit the distaine and scotling of his enemies, stood him to great good purpose afterwards: for they making now no account of him, kept small watch and ward, strayed vp and downe disorderly besides, though otherwise they were notvery obedient vnto their Captaines, being many commanders, and few good followers: by Many coin. reason whereof, a small number kept in the campe, and all the rest of the great multitude entired manders with the gaine they made by spoyling and sacking of townes thereabouts, dispersed themselves bedient many daies iourny from their campe. For it is faid, that at that very time they destroyed the city fouldiers. of PANOP ÆIA, sacked the city of LEBADIA, and spoyled the temple without commandement orlicence of any of all their Captaines to do it. In tho meane while, Sylla feeing fo many cities & townes spoiled and destroyed, took it both grieuously and also angrily: howbeit he suffered not hismen to lie idle, but kept them in labour, to turne the course of the river of Cephisus, and to fraghtnes call great trenches, not suffering any man to take ease or rest, but contrarily with great senerity is his foulpunished fuch as went faintly and lazily to worke, to the end that being wearied with the paine dress. they tooke after fo many works, they would rather proue to hazard battell, as it fell out indeed. Livie to west-For the third day after they had begun thus to labour, as Sylla passed by them, they cryed out vnto him, to leade them against their enemies. But this answer was vnto them againe: That those with exwere but cries of men wearied rather with labor, then desirous to fight. Notwithstanding, if it be trevelation, foindeed, and that you have fo good a will to fight as you make shew of then I will, said he, that whereby to make their youarme your selues presently, and get youto yonder place; shewing them therewithall where deficus to the castle of the Paraporamians stood in old time, which then (the city being destroyed) was sight. no more but the top of aftonie mountaine cut all about, and seuered from the mount of E- Edylium dylium by the breadth of the river of Assus that runneth betwixt, and which at the very foote month. of the same mountaine falleth into the river of Cephisus, and both these rivers running in one, as and some falleth into the river of Cephisus, and both these rivers running in one, carying a swift streame, do make the knap of the said hill very strong of situatio to lodge a camp vpon. And therefore Sylla feeing the fouldiers of his enemies campe, marching with their coppertargets to take vp that place to lodge in:to preuent them, and to get it before them (as indeed he did)he marched thither in all hast possible, and got it even with the earnest goodwill of al his fouldiers. Archelaus being so repulsed from thence, turned his way towards the city of CHOE-NONEA. Whereupon certaine of the CHOERONEANS that were in syllaes campe, befought him that he would not for sake their city, and leaue it to their enemie. Sylla desiring to gratifie them therein, sent Gabinius one of his Colonels with a legion, and therewith all gaue the CHOE-RONEANS leaue to go thither, who did what they could possible to get into the city before 64binius: but that they could not, fuch was the diligence and honestie of the man, as he seemed more desirous of their safety, then they were themselues. Neuerthelesse, Iubas doth not call the Colonell that was fent thither Gabinius, but Hircius. And thus was the city of CHOERONEA prescrued from the danger it stood in at that time. In the meane time came very good newes to the ROMAINES, both of oracles and prophecies, which promifed them victory from thetemple of Lebadia, and the caue of Trophonius: of which prophecies, those countreymen make great mention. But Sylla in the tenth booke of his commentaries writeth, that Quintus Titius.a man of quality and name amongst them that trafficked into the countrey of GRECE, came vnto him after he had wonne the battell of CHOERONEA, totell him that Trophonius gaue him tovnderstand, that shortly after he should have a second battel, and that he should yet again have another victory in the same place. After him another mã of war called Saluenius, told him also what fuccesse he should have in the wars of ITALY, saying, that he knew it by reuclation: & both these men agreed in the maner of the reuelation. For they faid, that they had seene a god, in maiestic, beauty and greatnes, like vnto the image of Iupiter Olympias. Sylla having passed the river of Asfus, went to lodge at the foot of mount Edylium, hard by Archelaus, who had placed & fortified his campe betweene the two mountaines of Acontium & of Edylium, ioyning to the city of the Assians. The place where Archelaus camped, beareth his own name Archelaus vnto this day. One day after Sylla had changed his lodging, he left Murana in his campe with a legion, and two cohorts, to keepe the enemies still occupied that were in great trouble, & he himselfe in y meane time went & facrificed by the river of Cephifus. His facrifice being ended, he marched towards the city of CHOERONEA, to take the force he had there vnder Gabinius, & to know the mountain also called Thurium, which the enemies had taken. It is a knap of a mountainevery steepeand sharpe of al sides, with a narrow point like a pine apple, by reason wherof we do call it Orthopagum. At the foot of the same runneth the river called Morion, and there is also the temple of A. pollo furnamed Thurias: & they fay, that this furname of Thurias was given vnto him of the name of Thuros, who was mother of Charon, the founder and builder of the city of CHOERONEA. Other think that the cow which was given to Cadmus for a guide, came to him in that placewhich hath euer fince kept § name, for that the Phoenician's call a cow, Thor. Now when Sylla came neare vnto Choer on easthe Colonel Gabinius whom he had fent thither with a garrifon to defend the same, went to meete him, with his men very well armed, wearing a laurell garland; and Sylla after he had faluted him & his fouldiers, made an oration vnto them, exhorting them to do their duty in fighting, And as he was in his oration, there came two citizens of CHOERONEA to him, one his name was O noloichus, and the other Anaxidamus, who promised him to driue the enemics from mount Thurium which they had taken, if he would but give them some smal number of fouldiers. For there was a little path-way, which the barbarous people miftrufted not beginning at a place called Petrochus, hard by the temple of the Muses, by the which they might cafily go to the top of this mountaine Thurium: fo that following that path, it would bring them ouer the barbarous peoples heads, & they might eafily kill them with stones, or at the least they should drive them maugre their heads downe into the valley. Gabinius assuring Syllathat they were both very valiantmen, and such as he might boldly trust vnto: Sylla gaue them men, and commanded them to execute their enterprise; and he himselfe in the meane scason went and set his men in order of battell in the plaine, deuiding his horsemen on the wings, placed himselse in the right wing, appointing the left vnto Murana. Galba and Hortensius his Lieutenants, were placed in the taile with certaine bands of the rereguard, which thy kept vpon the hils, to watch and let that the enemies should not enclose them behind: because they perceived a farre off that the enemies put foorth a great number of horsemen and footemen light armed in the wings, to the end that the points of their battell might the more eafily bow and enlarge themselues, to compaffe in the Romaines on the backe fide. Now in the meane time, these two Choer one ans whom Sylla had fent vnder Hircius their Captaine, having compassed about the mountaine Thurium, beforethe enemies were aware of them, fodainly came to shew themselves vpon the top of the mountaine, which did so feare the barbarous people, that they beganne immediatly to flie, one of them for the most part killing another. There was no resistance, but flying downe the mountaine, fell vpon the points of their owne partifans and pikes, and one of them thrusting in anothers necke, tumbled headlong downethe mountaine together, having their enemies befides on their backes, which draue them from the hill, and ftrake them behind where they lay o- Sylla draue penvnto them: fo as there were flaine three thousand of them about this mountaine Thurium. Arthelaus And as for them that fought to faue themselues by flight, Murana that was already set in battell the bill. ray, met with some, cut them off by the way, and flue them downeright. The other fled directly to their campe, and came in great companies, thrusting into the battell of their footemen, put the most part of them quite out of order, and maruellously troubled their captaines before they could fer them againe in order: which was one of the chiefest causes of their overthrow. For Sylla were and gaue a charge voon them in this trouble and diforder, and had quickly won the ground that was betweeneboth armies, whereby he took away the force of altheir armed carts The force of with fythes, which are then of greatest force, when they have the longest course, to give them the armed course with aswift and violent stroke in their chase: whereas when their course is but short, the blow is so street entered much the weaker and of leffe strength, even as arrowes are, that a far offenter not deepe into the fift in long thing they be shot at:as at that time it fell out with the barbarous people. For their first carts set foorth fo faintly, and came on with fo feeble a force, that the ROMAINES fent them backe, and eafily repulfed them, with great flaughter, and clapping of hands one to another, as they commonly vie in the ordinarie games of horse-running at Romm. When they had thus repulled the carts, the battel of Syllaes footmen beganto charge the barbarous people, who basing their pikes Syllaes conflood close one to another, because they would not be broke; and the Romaines on the other flot with fide, bestowed first their darts among them, and then sodainly drew out their swords in the heate at larvis, they were in, and pur afide the enemies pikes, whereby they might come nearer to their bodies. There were fifteene thousand slaves in the front of the battell of the barbarous peopl, whom Mithridates Lieutenant had made free by open proclamation, & had deuided them by bands, a- stanes mongst the other footmen. By occasion whereof, there was a Romaine Centurion spake plea- madefree fantly at that time, faying, That he neuer faw flaues before haue liberty to speake & do like free to the men, but only at Saturnes feasts. Neuerthelesse, they against the nature of slaues, were very vali- Lieutenate antio abide the shocke, and the Romains footemen could not so readily breake nor enter into in the field, them, nor make them giue backe, because they stood very close one to another, and their rankes were of fuch a length befides: vntill fuch time as the ROMAINES that were behind the first rankes, did fo pelt them with their flings, hurling stones, bestowing their darts and arrowes vpon them, that in the end they compelled them all to turne their backes and flie amaine. And when Archelaus did first thrust out the right wing of his armie, supposing to enclose the Ro-MAINES behind, Hortensius straightwayes caused the bands he had with him to run and charge vpon the flankes: which Archelaus perceiuing, made the horsemen he had about him, turne their faces foorthwith, which were in number about two thousand: infomuch as Horten fine being fer vpon with all his troupe, was compelled to retire by litle and litle towards the mountaine, perceining himselse farre from the battell of his footmen, and enuironed round about with his enemies. Sylla seeing that, being in the right wing of his battell, and having not yet fought, went straight to the rescue of Hortensius. But Archelans coniecturing by the dust which the horses raised, what the matter was: left Hortensius there, and with speed returned against towards the right wing of his enemies, from whence Sylla was gone, hoping he had left it vnfurnished of a sufficient Captaine to command them. Taxilles on the other fide, caused his copper targets also to marchagainst Murana: so as the noise they made on both sides, caused the mountaines to ring againe, wherewithall sylla stayed, standing in doubt which way to take. At the last he resoluted to returne to the place from whence he came, and fent Hortenfius with foure enfignes to aide Murana: and himselfe with the fifth in great speede went towards the right wing of his armie, the which was now already bickering, and joyned with their enemies, fighting handto hand with Archelaus. By reason whereof, when Sylla was come with his aide, they did easily distresse them: Syllaes wiand after they had broken their array, they chased them, flying for life to the riner, and vnto the Milhida. mountaine Acontium. But sylla notwithstanding forgat not Murana, but went againe to his tes Liente. reliefe: and finding that he on his fide had also put the enemies to flight, followed him with the chase of them that field. There was a maruellous slaughter made in that field of the barbarous people, & many of them supposing to have recovered their campe, were slaine by the way so as of all that infinite multitude of fighting men, there escaped onely ten thousand, who saued them-felues by Aying vnto the city of CHALCIDE. Sylla for his part writeth, that he could make recke. ning of no more but foureteene of his fouldiers only that were flaine, whereof there came two againe to him the same night. Wherfore in the markes of triumph which he set up for tokens of that victory, he caused to be written on the top thereof, Mars, Victorie, and Venus : fignifying thereby, that he had ouercome in these warres as much by good fortune, as by force, policie, or martiall discipline. These marks of triumph were set vp for the battel which he wan in the plaine field, in that place where Archelaus beganne to flie, euen vnto the riuer of Molus. And he fet vn another also on the top of mount Thurium, where the barbarous people were set vpon behind. and there is written in Greeke letters: That the valiant deedes of Omoloichus and Anaxidamus." gaue way to the winning of this victory. Sylla for the joy of this great wonne battell, caused mufirians to play in the city of THEBES, where he builded a stage for all the musitians nearevnto fountaine O'Edipus, and certaine noble Grecians were appointed judges of that mulicke. whom he caused to be sent for our of other cities, because he mortally hated the THEBANS: infomuch as he tooke from them halfe their lands, which he confecrated vnto Apollo Pythias, and Iupiter Olympias, appointing that of the reuenue thereof, they should redeliuer and pay back the mony which he had taken and caried away from out of their temples. Sylla after this having in. telligence that Placeus, one of his enemies, was chosen Consultat Rome, and had passed the sea Ionium with anarmy, under pretext to make warre against king Mithridares, but indeede to make war with himfelfe: tooke his journey towards Thessaly to meet him. But when he was in the city of Melite A, there came newes to him out of all parts, that there was a new and fecond armie of the kings arrived, no leffe then the first, the which spoyled and destroyed all the countrey which he had left behind him. For Dorylans, one of king Mithridates Lieutenants, was arrived in the city of CHALCIDE with a great fleet of shippes, having brought thither with him fourescore thousand fighting men, the best trained, the best armed and appointed souldiers that were in all his kingdome of Pontys in Asia: and from thence went into Bofotia, had all that country at commandement, and fought to fight with Sylla, notwithanding that Archelaus alledged many reasons to dissiwade him from it: and furthermore, gaue it out in every place, thatso many thousands of fouldiers could not have bene cast away in the first battel, without some notable treason. Wherupon Sylla returned with all possible speed, and made Dorylaus know before many daics passed ouer his head, that Archelaus was a wise man, and knew well enough the work thineffe & valiant courage of the Romain Bs. And Dorylaus having had but a little proofe only in certaine light skirmisses which he made against Sylla, about TILPHOSSION in THESSALY: himselfe was the first that could say then, it was not for them to hazard battel, but rather to draw out the wars in length, and supplant the Romain Bs with charge and expence. And yet not withftading, the commodity of the great large plaine that lyeth al about OacHOMENE, where they were encamped, gaue great encouragement to Archelans, who judged it a very fit placetogiuc battel in specially because he was the stronger of horseme in the field. For al the plaines that are within the country of BOEOTIA, the greatest and largest of them, is the plaine neare to the city of ORCHOMENE, which is altogether without trees, and runneth out in length vnto the marishes where the river of Melas disperseth it selfe abroad. The head of the same river is not far from the city of ORCHOMENE, and that river only of all other rivers of GRECE, from the very head whence it cometh, is nauigable; & hath befides another fingular property, that it rifeth & swelleth euen in the longest sommer daies, as the river of Nilus doth, & bringeth forth the selfesame plants & trees, fauing that they beare no fruit, neither are they fo great as those of Ægypy. This riuer hath no long course, because that the most part of the water runneth into lakes and marishes, covered with brambles and briars, and there is but a very litle part of it that falleth into the riuer of Cephifus, in the place that the reedes grow where they make good flutes with all. When they were camped one neare to another, Archelaus lay quietly and stirred not but Sylla presently cast great trenches fro one side to another, to stop the way against their enemies, that they could not come into that great plaine, where they might have taken what ground they would for their men of armes, & have driven the Romains into the marishes. The barbarous people not being able to endure that, fo fooneas their captains had given them liberty, discharged with such a fury, that they did not only featter them that wrought in Syllaes trenches, but put the most part of their guard also that stood in battel ray to defend them, in a maruellous feare, who also began to flie. Which Sylla perceiuing, lighted ftraight from his horse, and taking an ensigne in his hand, rannethrough the middeft of his men that fled, vntill he came to his enemies, and crying out, faid vnto them: O my Romaine fouldiers, mine honour commandeth me to die here, and therforewhen any man asketh you where you for fooke your captaine, remember that you answer, words to It was at Or CHOMENE. They were so ashamed at these words, that he made them turne: besides souldiers. that there came two cohorts vnto him from the right wing of his battell, who vnder his leading gaue such a hot charge vpon their enemies, that they fled foorthwith vpon it. That done, Sylla retired with his men, and made them dine; and the reupon by and by fet them againe to the trenchesto enclose his enemies campe, who then came out in better order then they did before. There was Diogenes, Archelaus wives sonne slaine, fighting valiantly before them all, in the right Diogenes wing of their battell. And the bow-men being pressed soneareby the Romaines, that their saine. bowes would do no good, took their arrowes in their hands in stead of swords, and strake their enemies with them, to force them to give back, vntill such time as at the last they were all driven into their campe, where they passed that night in great forrow, as well for the losse of them that were flaine, as alfo for the number of those that were hurt. The next morning, Sylla leading his men againetowards the camp of his enemies, went on still continuing his trenches; and certaine of them being come out to skirmish with them, he set vpon them so lustily, that at the first charge heput them to flight. That brought fuch a feare to all the whole campe of the enemies, that not aman durst abide any longer: so as Sylla valiantly following on his victory, shuffled in among syllaes val them as they fled, and in the end took all together. Straightway all the marishes were filled with Mithride. bloud, and the lake full of dead bodies: so that untill this present day they find there in that place to Lieute. many bowes of the barbarous people, morians, peeces of taffes, and fwords drowned in the mid of the marishes, not with standing that it is wel-neare two hundred yeares ago since this battell was stricken. And thus much for the wars about the cities of Chobronea and Orcho- syllaquer-MENE. Now the wars being past in this sort in GRECE, Cinna and Carbo dealt very cruelly and same are vonaturally at Rom E with the Noblemen and greatest persons by reason whereof, many flying two sames their tyranny, went to Syllaes campe, as vnto the hauen of their health and fulneffe of felicitie, battells, as fothat in short time Sylla had an affembly of a ROMAINE Senate about him. Metella her selfe, charones his wife, having stolen away very hardly with her children, came to bring him newes that his chomene, houses in the city and country both, were all burnt and destroyed by his enemies: praying him that he would go & helpe them that yet remained at Romn. Sylla vpon hearing of these newes, fellingreat perplexity. For on the one fide, it grieued him to fee his countrey fo miserably afflided; and on the other fide, he knew not well how he might go, leaving fo great an enterprise as that war was, and specially against a king of such might and power as Mithridates shewed himselfeto be. And being in these dampes, there came one Archelaus a merchant to him, borne in thecity of DELIVM, who brought him a fecret meffage from the other Archelaus, king Mithridates Lieutenant: the which pleased Sylla so well, that he desired that Archelaus and himselfe might meete and talke together. So at the length they met by the sea side, neare vnto the city of DELIVE, where there is a temple of Apollo. Archelaus began to enter the talke with him, decla- Talke beting vnto Sylla, that he would wish him to leave the coquest of Asia, & of the realme of Pont, winte Sylla and to returne into his country to the civill warres at Rom E and in fo doing, the king would fur law as their nishhim, not only with as much money, but with as many ships and men, as he himselfe would meeting. defire. Syllavpon this motion told him againe, that he would wish him to for sake Mithridates fruice, and to make himselfe king, offering to proclaime him a friend and consederate of the ROMAINES, fo that he would deliver him all the navie which then he had in his hands. Arche. luss feerned much to abhorre to heare him speake of treason. But Sylla going on with his tale, replyed againe vnto him: Why Archelaus, said he, thou that art a Cappado e IAN, and servant to a barbarous King, or his friend at the least: hast thou so good a heart with thee, that for all the benefits I offer thee, thou wilt not once commit an illact? And art thou indeed to bold to speake to me of treason, which am the ROMAINES Lieutenant generall, and Sylla? As if thou were not he, that at the battell of CHOERONEA diddest sauethy selfe by flying, with a small number left thee of fixe score thousand fighting men, which thou before hadft in thy campe: and that hid thy selfe two dates together in the marishes of ORCHOMENE, leaving the fields of BOBOTIA with fuch heapes of dead bodies, that no man could passe for them? After this reply, Archelaus altered his speech, and falling downe at Syllaes seete, humbly befought him to end this warre, and to make peace with Mithridates. Whereunto Sylla answered, that he was very well contented

And thereupon peace was concluded between them under conditions: that Mithrida. should depart from Asia the lesse, and from Paphlagonia, that he should restore Bithy-NIA VIIO Nicomedes, and CAPPADOCIA VIITO Ariobar Zanes, that he should pay 2000 talents to the Romain Es, and give them threescore and ten gallies, with all their furniture. And voon this, Sylla would also assure him the rest of his Realme: and would cause him to be proclaimed a friend of the Romaines. These articles being past by agreement betwixt them, Sylla taking his iourney through THESSALY & MACEDON, into the country of HELLESPONT, carried Arche. laws with him, whom he honourably intreated. For Archelaus falling dangerously sicke of a difcale in the city of Larissa, he stayed there for him, and was very carefull to recouer him; as if he had bene one of his chiefest Captaines and companions. And this was the cause that made Archelaus to be blamed for the battell of CHOERONEA, as if he had not faithfully fought itour. nor Syllatruly wonne it, but by treason. And againe, Archelaus was the more suspected, because Sylla redeliuered Mithridates all his feruants and friends which he had prisoners, fauing thetyrant Aristion that kept ATHENS, whom he poyloned, because he was Archelaus enemy but spea. cially for the lands Sylla gaue vnto this CAPPADOCIAN. For he gaue him ten thousand Iugera. (or acres of land) within the Ile of Eve o EA, and gave him moreover the ritle of a friend of the ROMAINES for euer. But Sylla denyethall these things in his commentaries. In the meane time, Ambaffadors came from king Mithridates vnto Sylla, who told him that the king their ma. fter did ratific and accept all the articles of peace, fauing that he only prayed him he would not take the country of PAPHLAGONIA from him: and as for the gallies, he would not fo much as once say he would promise them. Sylla being offended herewith, angerly answered the agains: Then Mithridates (as ye fay) meaneth to keepe PAPHLAGONIA still, and retuseth to give the ships I demanded: where I looked that he would have humbly thanked me on his knees, if I left him his right hand onely, with the which he put fo many Romaine citizens to death. But I hope to make him tell me another tale, if I come once into Asia: but now at Pergamys, he speaketh his pleasure of this war which he hath not seene. The Ambassadours being afraid of his words, replied not againe. Whereupon Archelaus spake, and befought him with teares in his eyes to be contented, and tooke him by the hand. By intreatie, in the end he obtained of syllato fend him vnto Mithridates: promifing that he would either bring him to agree to all thearticles and conditions of peace that he demanded, or if he could not, he would kill himselfe with his owne hands. Vponthis promife Sylla fent him away, and in the meane while entred with his armic into the countrey of Medical and after he had destroyed the most part thereof, returned backe againe into MACEDON, where Archelaus being returned from Mithridates, foundhim nearevnto the city of PHILIPPES, bringing him newes that all should be well: howbeit that his master Mithridates prayed him he might speake with him in any case. Now the matter that made Mithridates fo earnest to speake with Sylla, was chiefly for Fimbria : who having slaine Flaceus the Confull, being of the contrary faction vnto Sylla, and certaine of Mithridates Lieu. tenants also, went himselfe against him to fight with him. Mithridates fearing his comming, choserather to make himselfe Syllaes friend. So Mithridates and Sylla mettogether in the countrey of TROADE, in the city of DARDANE, Mithridates being accompanied with a fleete of two hundred fale of shippes with oares at sea, with twenty thousand footemen, sixe thousand horse, and a number of armed carts with fithes befides by land, Sylla having onely but four enfignes of footmen, and two hundred horsemen. Mithridates went to Sylla, and offering to take him by the hand: Sylla asked him first, if he did accept the peace with the conditions which Archelaus had agreed vnto. Mithridates made him no answer. Sylla following on his tale, said vnto him: It is for futers to speake first, that have request to make: and for conquerours, it is enough to himselfeso hold their peace, and heare whatthey will fay. Then began Mithridates to excuse himselfe, and to lay the occasion of the warre, partly vpon the ordinance of the gods that so had appointed it, and partly also vpon the Romaines themselves. Whereunto Sylla replyed, that he had heard of long time that Mithridates was an eloquent Prince, and that he knew it now by experience, feeing that he lacked no comely words to cloke his foule and shamefull deedes: but withall he sharpely reproued him, and draue him to confesse the cruelties he had committed. And afterwards asked him againe, if he did confirme that which Archelaus had done. Mithridates made answer, that he did. Then Sylla saluted, embraced, and kissed him: and calling for the kings Ni-Cappadorio. comedes and Ariobarzanes, reconciled them together, and made Mithridates their friend againe.

Inconclusion, after Mithridates had delinered Syllathreescore and tengallies, and fine hundred bow-men, he returned by sea into his realme of Pontvs. But Sylla hearing that his fouldiers were angry with this peace made with Mithridates, because they could not abide to behold that king, whom they accounted for their most cruell and mortall enemie, (hauing in one selfeday caused a hundred and fiftie thousand Romain E citizens to be slaine, that were dispersed abroad and fiftie indiuers places of Asia) foto depart, and go his way fafe, with the riches and spoyles of the thousand countrey, which he had berefithem of, and vsed at his pleasure, the space of forty yeares together:answered them in excuse of himselse, that he was notable to make warres with Mithridates, one day in and Fimbria both, if once they were joyned together against him. And so Sylla departing thence Mithrida. went against Fimbria, who then was encamped neare to the city of THYATIRA, and lodged tes commahimselse as neare vnto him as he conveniently might. Now whilest he was compassing in his demens. lodging with a trench, Fimbriaes fouldiers came out of their campe in their coates without any armour or weapon, to falute Syllaes fouldiers, and holpe them very friendly to make up their Thaira. trench: which Fimbria feeing, and perceiving his fouldiers mindes to changed, of an extreame feare which he had of Sylla, at whose hands he looked for no mercie, killed himselfe in his owne campe. Sylla hereupon condemned the whole countrey of As 1 A the leffe, to pay the fumine of twenty thousand talents amongst them, and presently also he vindid many poore housholders bandly inthrough his infolent fouldiers, lying long vpon their charge, which he left in garrifon there. For treated the he ordained, that every housholder should give the souldier that lodged in his house, soure Te- of Ma. tradrachmaesa day, and should be bound to give him and his friends (as many as he would bring with him) their supper also: and that enery Captaine should have fiftie Drachmaes a day, a night gowne for the house, and a garment to go abroad into the city when he thought good. When he had given this order, he departed from the city of Eph Bsvs with all his fleete, and in three daies fay ling arrived in the hauen of Piræa at ATHENS, where he was received into the fraternity of the Mysteries, and reserved for himselse the Librarie of Appellicon Teian: in the which were the most part of Ariffolle and Theophrastus workes, not then thought meete to come in eue- Ariffolle riemans hands. And they fay, that this Librarie being brought to Rome, Tiramion the Gram.

marian found the manager of average payr of them and they device the Post of the phrashs. marian found the meanes to extract a great part of them : and that Andronicus the RHODIAN ha- booker. uing recouered the originals into his hands, published them, and wrote the summaries which we have at this present. For the ancient Peripateticke Philosophers were of themselues very wise and learned men, but they had not all Aristotles works, nor Theophrastus amongst them, and yetthose few they had, were not by them seene all whole and perfect together: because that the goods of Nelew Scepsian (to whom Theophrastus left all his bookes by will) came to fall into thehands of meane ignorant men, who knew not the vertue and estimation of them. And furthermore, Sylla being at ATHENS, had fuch a paine and numneffe in his legges, and was so heavie withall, that Strabo calleth it aspice of the gout, that is to say, a feeling or entring therinto, which then began to roote and take hold of him. Vpon which occasion he tooke the seas, and went vnto a place called Adips v M, where there are naturall hot baths; and there remained a while fola- at Adipsum cing himself all the day long with musick, seeing of playes, and entertaining such kind of people. for the goal Voon a day as he was walking by the sea side contain filter me made him a present of fell, which Vpon a day as he was walking by the sea side, certain sisher me made him a present of sish, which pleafed him maruellous well: and demanding of them whence they were they answered him againe, that they were of the city of ALES. What of ALES faid he is there any of them yet left allue: speaking it, because that after the battell of Orchomens, when he followed the chace of hisenemies, he hadtaken and destroyed three cities of Bobotia all at one selfe time, to wit, Anthebon, Larymna, and Ales. The poore fisher men were so amazed with these words, that they stood still, and could not tell what to say. Syllafell a laughing thereat, and badthem go their wayes a Gods name, and be not afraid, for they brought no finall interceffours with them, which were worth the reckening of. When sylla had given them these words, the ALEIANS which were worth the reckening of. When Sylla nad given them there words, the ALETANS went home with a mery heart, to gather themselves together agains in their city. preters what he was, he made no answer that a man could vnderstand, but onely put foortha tharpe voice like the neying of a horse, or whinnying of a goate. Sylla wondering at it, abhorsed him, and made him to be carried from him as a monstrous thing. Furthermore, when Syllahad imbarked his men to passe the sea, he was afraid that so soone as they had landed in ITALY, they would shrinke from him, and curry man go home to his own city. But they sware and promised first of themselves, that they would tarie & keepe together, and by their wils would do no hurt in ITALY. Moreouer, perceiuing that he stood in need of mony, they offered him of theirs, and enery man to lend him as his ability ferued. But Sylla would none, yet thanked them for their good will:and after he had exhorted them to fight like valiant fouldiers, he went against fifteene Generals of armies of his enemies, who had foure hundred and fiftie enfignes of footmen well armed, as he himselfe writeth in his commentaries. But the gods promifed him good fortune in his wars, by many fundry apparent fignes. For in a facrifice he made by TARENTYM, after he was come on land, the liner of a certaine beaft facrififed, was altogether fashioned after the manner of a crowne or garland of lawrell, out of the which did hang two bands or rolles. And alitle before he went into Campanta, neare vnto the mountaine Epheum, there appeared two great goates in the day time fighting together, euen as two men do when they fight which neuertheleffe was no matter of truth, but a vision only that appeared, and rising from the earth dispersed it felfe by little and little here and there in the aire, and in the end vanished quite away as clouds which come to nothing. Shortly after, in the selfe same place, Marius the younger, and Norbamus the Confull, who brought two great armies against him, were ouerthrowne by him, before he had fer his men in battell, or had appointed any man in his place where he should fight: and this proceeded only upon the courage and life of his foulders, whose good will to serue against them was such as following this victory, he compelled the Confull Norbanus after he had flaine fixe thousand of his men, to take the city of CAPVA for his refuge. This noble exploit (as himsclfereported) was the cause that his men kept so well together, that they neither went home to their houses, nor made any reckening of their enemies, although they were many against one. And he faith furthermore, that in the city of Sylvin, there was a flaue of one Pontius acitizen, who being inspired with a propheticall spirit, came to tel him from the goddesse Bellona, that he should grow in strength, and cary away the victory of these wars; howbeit that if he did not hie him the fooner, the Capitoll at Rome should be burnt. And so it fell out the same day according to his words, being the fixteenth day of the moneth called Quintilis, and now Irdy. And furthermore alfo, Lucullus (one of Syllaes Captaines) being neare vnto the city of Fidentia with fixteene enfignes onely, against fiftie enfignes of his enemies, knowing his men to be very well affected to ferue, because the most part of them were naked and vnarmed, was afraid to hazard the battell: and as he was even bethinking himselfe what was best to determine thereof, there rose a litle wind out of a goodly meadow, that blew a wonderfull fort of flowers upon the fouldiers on every part of them. These flowers stated of themselves as they fell, some vpontheir targets, and others upon their morians, without falling to the ground: so that it seemed to their is failure enemies a far off as if they had benegarlands of flowers ypon their heads. This made Lucullus for ldiers more lufty a great dealethen they were before, & with this good will they determined to give a charge upon their enemies: whom they overthrew, flue eighteene thou fand of them in the field, & took their camp. This Lucullus was brother vnto the other Lucullus, that afterwards ouerthrew the kings Mithridates & Tigranes Neuertheleffe, Sylla perceiving that his enemies lay round about him with many great puissant armies, thought good to vse policie with force: and therefore practifed with Scipio one of the Confuls to make peace with him. Scipio was willing to it and thereupon were oft meetings and affemblies of both fides. Now Sylla draue off the conclusion of the peace as long as he could, still feeking occasio of delay, to the end that his soldiers which werethroughly acquainted with craft & fubtilty as well as himfelfe, might in the meane time corrupt Scipioes fouldiers by repaire into his campe: for they coming into Scipioes campe, being very convertant with them, ftraight corrupted fome of them with readic mony, other with promises, and other with faire flattering words, and many goodly tales they told them. At the length, after this practife had continued a while, Syllacoming neare vnto Seipioes campe with 20 entignes onely: all his men faluted Scipioes foldiers, & they refaluting them again, yeelded themsclues vnto Sylla, so as Scipio was left postalone in his tet, where he was take, but they afterwards let him go. So Sylla with his 20 enfignes, like to the fowlers, that by their stales draw other birds into their nets, hauing gotten forty enfignes from his enemics by his craft, brought them away with him into his campe. There it was that Carbo faid of Sylla, that he had to fight with a foxe, Carbon and a lion both: but that the foxe did him more hurt and mischiefe then the lion. After this, Ma- sylatonrius the younger having fourescore and flue ensignes in his campe neare unto the city of $10- shing the NIVM, presented battell vnto sylla: who having very good desire to fight, and specially on that fixed 18. day because the night before he had seene this vision in his dreame, that he thought he saw Ma- younger rius the father (who was deceassed long before) warning his sonne that he should come to him. Sylla forthis respect desired maruellously to fight that day: and thereupon caused Dolabella to presenteth come vnto him, that was before lodged farre from him. But the enemies stept betweene him 5,14 band and home, and stopped his passage to keepe him from loyning with Sylla. Syllaes souldiers to the by the car contrary, fought to keepe the way open for him, with so great labour and paine, that they were sillato pie al weary and ouerharried. And furthermore, there fell a maruellous great shower of raine vpon for in his them as they were buffe opening the way, that troubled them more then the labour they had in hand. Wherupon the prinat captaines of the bands went to make Sylla vnderstand it, and to pray him to deferre the battel vntil another day: shewing him how the fouldiers wearied with labor, lay down vpontheir targets on the ground to take their ease. Sylla perceiuing this, was cotented withall, though greatly indeed against his will. But when he had given the signall to lodge, and that they began to trench and fortifie their campe, Marius the younger cometh on horsebacke marching brauely before all his company, hoping to haue furprifed his enemies in diforder, and by that meanes to haue ouerthrowne them eafily. But far otherwise did fortune then performe the reuelation which Sylla had in his forefaid dreame: for his men falling in a rage withall, left their worke in the trench where they wrought, stucke their darts vpon the banke, ran vpon their enemies with their fwords drawne, and with a maruellous crie fet vpon them fo valiantly, that they were not able to relift their furie, but fodainly turned their backs and fled, where there was a great and notable flaughter made of them. Marins their Captaine fled to the city of PRENE- Marins fled st B, where he found the gates shut: but they threw him downed rope from the wall, which he tyedabout his middle, and so was triced vp by it. Yet some writers say, and Fenestella among other, that Marius neuer saw the battell: for being wearied with labour, and very sleepie, he lay vnder some tree in the shadow to resta little, after he had given the signall and word of the battell, and flept fo foundly, that he could fcant awake with the noise and flying of his men. sylla himfelfe writeth, that he loft at this battell but three and twenty men, flue twentie thoufand of his enemies, and tooke eight thousand prisoners. His Lieutenants also had the like good successe in other places, Pompeius, Crassus, Metellus, and Seruilius: which without any losse of their men, or but with a very small, ouerthrew many great mighty armies of their enemies. Infomuch as Carbo, the head and chiefe of all the contrary faction, and he that most maintained imagrick. it, fled one night out of his campe, and went beyond the feas into Africke. The last battell that Sylla had, was against Thelesiaus Samnite, who comming like a freshchampion to set vpon him, when he was already wearied, and had fought many battels, had almost staine him euen the Samat Romn gates. For Thelesinus having gathered rogether a great number of fouldiers, with niepus one Lamponius Lycanian, marched with all speeds towards the city of PRENESTE, to deliver great dan. Marius the younger that was besieged there. But vnderstanding that Sylla on the one side ger. came in great haste also to meete him, and that Pomponius came behind him on the other side, and perceiting moreouer that the way was so shut vp, that he could goe neither forward nor backward, being a valiant fouldier, and one that had bene in many great foughten fields, most dangeronfly ventured to go straight to Rome. And so stole away by night with all his whole power, and marching to Rome ward, had almost taken it at his first comming, for that there was neither watch nor ward kept:but he stayed happily tenne furlongs from the gate Collina, bragging with himselfe, and beleeuing that he should do wonders, for that he had mocked so many great Captaines. The next morning betimes came divers young Noblemen and Gentlemen out of the city to skirmish with Thelesinus: who slue agreat number of them, and among others one Appius Claudius a young Gentleman of a noble house, and very honest. Whereupon (as you may easily imagine) the city trembled for feare, and specially the women, who fell ashreeking, and running vp and downe, as if they had bene all taken. But in this great scare and trouble, Balbus (whom Sylla had fent) came first with seuen hundred horse vponthe spurre, and staying but a little to coole and give them breath, bridled straight again, & went to set vpon the enemies, thereby to flay them. Soone after him came Sylla alfo, who commanded his men that came first, quickly to eate somewhat, and that done, put them straight in battell ray: notwithflanding that Dolabella and Torquatus perswaded him to the contrarie, and besought him nor to put his fouldiers wearied with their journey, to fo great and manifest a danger; and the rather, because they had not to fight with Carbo and Marius, but with the SAMNITE'S and LVEANS? who were both warlike nations and good foul diers, & those besides that most deadly hated the ROMAINES. But for all that, Syllaient them backe, and commanded his trumpets to found the alarme, being almost within foure houres of night: and this battell was sharper and more cruell, then any other that ever he fought before. The right wing where Crasses was badthe better much: but the left wing was very fore distressed, and stood in great perill. Syllahearing thereof, and thinking to helpe it, got vp vpon a white courfer that was both fwift & very ftrong. Sylaes da-The enemies knew him, & there were two that lifted up their armes to throw their darts at him. whom he faw not: but his page gaue his horse such a lash with his whippe, that he made him so to gird forward, as the very points of the darts came hard by the horse tayle & stucke fast in the ground. Some fay, that Sylla had a little golden image of Apollo, which he brought from the city of DELPHES, and intime of warres were it alwaics in his before, which he theretooke in his hand, and kiffing it, faid : O Apollo Pythias, haft thou fo highly exalted Cornelius Sylla, so fortunate hitherto through fo many famous victories, and wilt thou now with shame ouerwhelme him wholly, euen at the very gates of his own naturall city among his countreymen? And so crying out to Apollo for helpe, thrust into the prease among his men, intreating some, threatning others, and laying upon the rest to stay them. But for all he could do, all the left wing of his armie was broken and ouerthrowne by his enemies : and himfelfe amongst them that fled, was compelled to recouer his camp with speed, having lost many of his friends and familiars. There were moreouer many citizens flaine and troden under feete (both with horse and men) that came onely to Lucretius fee the battell fought: fo that they within the city thought themselves verily violone. Lucretius Offella be-Offella furthermore (he that befieged Marius in the city of PRENESTE) had almost raised his fieged Mafiege, you the words of them that fled and came thither from the battell, who wished him to rins in Praremoue with all speed possible, for Silla was slaine, and Thelesinus had taken Rome. Now about In the end midnight came certaine fouldiers from Crassus to Syllaes campe, and asked for meate for Crassus of Marius life it is refupper, and his mens, who having chased his flying enemies whom he had overthrowne vnto ported conthe city of ANTEMNA (Awhich they tooke for refuge) had lodged his campe there. Sylla undertravie, that standing that, and being advertised that the most part of his enemies were overthrown eat this Silla befieeed Marius battell, went himselfe the next morning betimes vnto Antemna, where three thousand of his the vonger enemies fent to know if he would receive them to mercy if they yeelded them felues ynto him. in Perufia, and not in His answer was, that he would pardon their lives, so as they would do some mischief to their sel-Prenefte. lowes before they came to him. These three thousand her cupon trusting to his promise, fell vp-2 can faued on their companions; and for the most part one of them killed another. Notwithstanding Sylthem(elues in Antem la having gathered all those together that remained of his enemies, as well the three thousand, as na: and the reft amounting in all to the number of fix thousand, within the shew-place where they vsed yeelded to to runtheir horses: whilest he himselfe held a councell in the temple of the goddesse Bellona, and Sillarpon promiseof was making his oration there, he had appointed certaine to fet vpon those 6000, and put them to the fword every man. Great & terrible were the cries of fuch a number of men flaine in folmall gainfi the a roome, as may eafily be conjectured: infomuch as the Senators fitting in councell heard them very easily, and maruelled what the matter was But Sylla continuing on his oration which he had armes and begun with a fet fleadie countenance, without changing of colour, willed them only to hearken bis eromife. saused sixe what he faid, and not to trouble themselues with any thing done abroad, for they were but certhoufand taine offenders and leud persons that were punished by his commandement. This was enough to shew the simplest Romain E in Rome, that they had but onely changed the tyrant, and not the tyrannie. Now for Marius, that had ever bene of a churlish and severe nature, even from his childhood, he neuer changed for any authority, but did rather harden his natural labburnnes. Where Sylla contrarily in the beginning, was very modest and civill in al his prosperity, & gave great good hope, that if he came to the authority of a prince, he would fauour nobility well, and yer loue not with standing the benefit of the people. And being moreouer a man in his youth giuen to all pleasure, delighting to laugh, ready to pity, & weepe for tender hart in that he became after so cruell and bloudy, the great alteration gaue manifest cause to condemne the increase of honor and authority, as the only meanes wherby mens manners continue not fuch as they were Honour at the first, but still do change and varie, making some fooles, others vaine and phantasticall, and change the strategies. others extreame cruell and vnnaturall. But whether that alteration of nature came by changing sollathe his state and condition, or that it was otherwise a violent breaking out of hidden malice, which example. then came to shew it selfe, when the way of liberty was layed open: this matter is to be decided in some other Treatise. So it came to passe, that Syllafell to shedding of bloud, and filled all months. Rome with infinite and vnspeakeable murthers: for divers were killed for private quarels, that committed had nothing to do with Sylla at any time, who fuffered his friends and those about him to worke in Remeby their wicked wills: vntill at the length there was a young man called Caius Metellus, that was fo bold to aske Sylla in open Senate, when all these miseries should end, and when they should rereknow that all the miseries were finished the which they dayly saw. For, said he, we will not intreate you to pardon life, where you have determined death; but only to put them out of doubt in Metelwhom you have determined to fauc. Whereunto Sylla made answer, that he was not resolved lustocal whom he would faue. Metellus replyed, Thentell vs (quoth he) who they are that shall die. Sylla sila bis cruelties in answered, he would. Howbeit some say, it was not Metellus, but Anfidius one of his flatterers, ofen Senate that spake this last word vnto him. Wherfore Sylla immediatly, without making any of the magiffrates privie, caused fourescore mens names to be set up upon posts, whom he would put to Syllaes prodeath. Euery man being offended withall, the next day following he fet vp 220 mens names more; and likewise the third day as many more. Hereupon, making an oration to the people, he told them openly, that he had appointed all them to die, that he could cal to remembrance: howbeit that hereafter he would appoint them that should die, by daies, as he did call them to mind, Whofoeuer faued an outlaw in his house, for reward of his kindnesse, he himselse was condemned to die: not excepting them that had received their brothers, their fonnes, their fathers, nor mothers. And the reward of every homicide & murtherer that killed one of the outlawes, was two talents: though it were a flaue that had killed his mafter, or the fonne that had flaine the father. But the most wicked and vniust act of all was, that he deprined the sonnes and sonnes sons of them whom he had killed, of all credit and good name; and befide nat, had taken all their goods as confifcate. And this was not onely done in Rome, but also in all the cities of ITALIE throughout and there was no temple of any god what soeuer, no altar in any bodies house, no libertie of hospitall, nor fathers house, that was not embrued with bloud and horrible murther. For the husbands were flaine in their wines armes, and the children on their mothers laps; and yetthey which were flaine for prinate hatred and malice, were nothing in respect of those that three entwere murthered onely for their goods. And they that killed them, might well fay, His good-lane genely great house made that man die, his goodly faire garden the other, and his hote bathes ano-rationagh ther. As among st others, Quintus Aurelius, a man that neuer medled with any thing, and least Quintus looked that these epils should light vpon him, and that onely pitied those which he saw so miserably murthered, went one day into the market place, and reading the bill fet up of the outlawes that make names, found his owne name amongst the rest, and cryed out aloud: Alasthe day that cuer I lid not, was borne, my house of Alba maketh me be put to death. He went not far from the market flame for place, but met with one that killed him prefently. In the meane time Marins the yonger feeing he Marins the place, but met with one that kined thin preferrely. In the meane that coming to PR ENESTE, did lorger flue could by no meanes escape if he were taken, flue himself as first execute them by one & by one, keeping a certaine forme of instice in putting them to death; hunfele at Prenefie. but afterwards, as if he had no longer ley sure to remaine there, he caused them all to be put in a syllasses place together, to the number of twelue thousand men, whom he caused to be put to the sword 12000. euery man, fauing his hoft onely; vnto whom he faid, that he fnewed him special fauour to faue Praneste. his life. But his hoft answered him flourly againe, that he would not be beholding vnto him for being at his life, seeing he had slaine all the rest of his countreymen: and so thrusting in among st the citione place zens, was willingly flaine with them. They thought the act of Lucius Catiline also very strange, together. who had flaine his owne brother before the civill war was ended: and then prayed Sylla to put Lucin Cahim in the number of the outlawes, as if his brother had bene aline. Sylla performed his defire. his owner Catiline thereuponto shew his thankfulnesse for the pleasure Sylla had done him, went present-brosher. ly and flue Marcus Marius, who was of the contrary faction, and brought him his head for a prefent before all the people, in the midst of the market place where he was sitting. grieucd the people maruelloufly. For he proclaimed himfelf Dictator, which office had not bin of fix (core yeares before in vie, and made the Senate discharge him of all that was past, giuing him free libertie afterwards to kill whom he would, and to confiscate their goods: to destroy cities, and to build vo new as he listed: to take away kingdomes, and to give them where he thought good. And furthermore, he openly fold the goods confiscate, by the cryer, fitting fo proudly & stately in his chaire of state, that it grieued the people more to fee those goods packet vp by them to whom he gaue and disposed them, then to fee them taken from those that had forfeited them. For fometimes he would give a whole country, or the whole revenues of certaine cities, vnto women for their beauty, or vnto pleasant iesters, minstrels, or wicked slaves made free; and vnto some he would give other mens wives by force, and make them to be married against their wils. For he desiring (howsoeuer it happened) to make alliance with Pompeythe Great, commanded him to put away his wife he had maried: and taking Amylia (the daughter of Amilius Scaurus, and of Metella his wife) from the great Glabrio, caused him to mary her great with child as she was by Glabrio: but she died in childbed in Pompeys house. Lucretius Offellaalso that had brought Marins the younger to that distresse at the city of PR ENESTE, suing to be Confull, sylla commanded him to ceasife his suite: but he notwithstanding that expresse commandement, went one day into the market place, with a great traine of men following him that fauoured his cause: whither Sylla sent one of his Centurions that flue Offella before all the people, himself sitting in a chaire of estate in the temple of Cassor & Pollux, & Seeing fro about the murther done. The people that were about offella, laid hold of the murtherer straight, and brought him before Sylla: but Sylla bad them be quiet that brought the Centurion with turnult, and that they should let him go, because he commanded them to do it. Furthermore, as touching his triumph, it was a sumptuous fight to behold, for the rarenesse of the riches, and princely spoyles which were shewed at the same. But yet was it so much the better set out, and worth the fight, to fee the banished Romaines, who were the chiefest nobleme of al the city of Rome, following his chariot triumphant wearing garlands of flowers on their heads, calling Sylla their father and fauiour: because that by his meanes they returned to their country, and recouered their goods. wices & children. In the end of histriumph, he made an oration, in open affembly of the people of Rome, in the which he did not only declare vnto the (according to the custome) what things he had done, but did as carefully tell them also as well of his good fortune and successe, as of his valiant deeds besides: and to conclude his oration, told them that by reason of the great fauour fortune had shewed him, he would from thenceforth be called by them, Felix, to fay, happie or fortunate. And he himselfe when he wrote vnto the GRECIANS, Or that he had any thing to do with them, furnamed himselfe Epaphroditus, as who would say, a pleasant man, beloued and fauoured of Venus. His tokens of triumph which are yet in our countrey, have this superscriptions Lucius Cornelius Sylla Epaphroditus. And when his wife Metella had brought him two twinnes, a fon and a daughter: he named his fon Faustus, fignifying fortunate, and his daughter Faustus, because the Romaines call Faustum that which falleth outprosperously & happily. To be short, he trufted fo much vnto his good fortune and doings, that notwithfranding he had killed & put fo many mento death, and had made fo great a change and innovation in the commonwealth, yet of himself he left off his office of Dictator, and restored the people to the authority of election of Confuls againe, without his presence at the election: and frequented the market place as a private man among the citizens, offering himselse to every man that would aske him account of his doings past. It happened that a stout and rash enemy of his was chosen Consull against his Marcus Le will, called Marcus Lepidus, not for any denotion the people had to Lepidus, but onely to gratifie pidus cho-Pompey, who gaue countenance & fauour vnto him. Sylla feeing Pompey come merry homewards fen Confull. from the election, & joyfull that he had obtained his friends fute from all other futers: took him aside, and told him: Indeed thou hast great cause to reioyce, young man my friend, for thou hast done a goodly act, to choose Marcus Lepidus Consull, the veriest asse in all Rome, before Cas tulus the honestest man. But I tell thee one thing, thou hads not neede to sleepe: for thou hass firengthened an enemie, that will be thine owne deftruction. And sylla proued a true prophet:

During these feasts which continued many daies, his wife Metella fickened, and died, and in her ficknesse the Priests and Soothsayers willed Sylla he should not come neare her, nor suffer his houseto be polluted and defiled with mourning for the dead. Whereupon Sylla was dinorced from her in her fickneffe, and caused her to be carried into another house, whilest she lived. And thus did Sylla curiously observe the superstition and ordinance of the Soothsayers: Sylla bialo but yet he brake the law which he made himselfe, touching the order of funerals, sparing no bisowne costat Metellaes buriall. So did he also breake another order himselfe had made, touching laws he the reformation of bankets: comforting his forrow with ordinarie feafts, full of all vanitic made. and lascinionsnesse. Within a few moneths after, he had sencers games at the sharpe: and the roomes of the Theater being open and vnfeuered, men and women fitting together, it fortuned that there was a faire Ladie, and of a noble house, that sate hard by Sylla, called Valeria: the was the daughter of Messala, and fifter of Hortensius the Orator, that had bene divorced not long before from her husband. This Ladie passing by Sylla behind him, did softly put her hand on his shoulder, and tooke a haire from off his gowne, and so went on to her place, and fatcher downe. Sylla maruelling at this familiarity, looking earneftly vpon her: It is nothing my Lord (quoth sie) but that I desire with others to be partaker a little of your happinesse. Her Valeria, dewords misliked not Sylla, but contrarily he shewed that she had tickled him with them: for he from to be fent straight to aske her name, and enquired of what house she was, and how she had lined. of syllags Butafter many flie lookes betweene them, they turned their faces one to another vponeuery happinesses occasion, with prettie similing countenances: so that in the end, they came to promise and solutions marriage together, for the which redesigned provided the end of Paleria, was not to be blomed. For the which redesigned to the end of Paleria, was not to be blomed. contract mariagetogether, for the which Valeria was not to be blamed. For though she was as the fifter of wife, as honest, and as vertuous a Ladie as could be possible, yet the occasion that made Sylla Hornessus marrie her, was feither good nor commendable, because he was taken straight with alooke and a fine tongue, as if he had bene but a yong boy: which commonly shew forth the filthiest passions of the minde, to be so carried, and with such motions. Now, notwithstanding he had this faire young Ladie in his house, he left not the company of women minstrels and tumblers and to have pleasant iesters and musitions about him, with whom he would lye wallowing and drinking all the day long, vpon little conches made for the nonce. For, his companions that were in greatest estimation with him at that time, were these three: Roseius a maker of common playes, Sorax a prince of scoffers, and one Metrobius a finging man, whom he was in love withall while he lived, and yet did not diffemble his love, though he was past age to be beloved. This wicked life of his was cause of increasing his disease, the originall cause whereof had light foundation at the first. For he lived a great time before he perceived that he had an impostume in his body, the which by processe of time came to corrupt his stesh in such fort, that iturned alltolice: so that notwithstanding he had many men about him, to shift him conti- fostume mally night and day, yet the lice they wiped away were nothing, in respect of them that mul- turned to tiplied still vpon him. And there was neither apparell, linnen, bathes, washing, nor meate it felfe, but was presently filled with swarmes of this vile vermine. For he went many times in the day into the bathe to wash and cleanse himselse of them, but all would not serue: for the changing of his flesh into this putriture wan it straight againe, that there was no cleansing, nor hifting of him, that could keepe fuch a number of lice from him. Some fay, that in old time (amongst the most ancient men, whereof there is any memorie) Acastus the sonne of Pe. Dinese fai lius, died of the lowfie euill: and long time afteralfo, the Poet Aleman, and Pherecides the mous min that died of diune: and so did Callisthenes OLYNTHIAN in prison, and Mutius a wise lawyer. And if we lice shall make mention of those that are famous, although it be not in any good matter: we finde that a bond man called Eunus, he that was the first procurer of the warres of the bondmen in Sicilia, being taken and carried to Rome, died also of the same disease. Furthermore, Sylla Syllancomdid not onely foresee his death, but he wrote something of it also: for he made an end of writing the two and twentieth booke of his commentaries, two daies before he died. In that booke containe 22 helaith, that the wife men of CHALDEA hadtold him long before, that after he had lived honourably, he should end his daies in the flower of all his prosperity. And there he saith also, that was that his sonne (who departed a little before his mother Metella) appeared to him in his sleepe, deed appear apparelled in an ill fauoured gowne, and that comming vnto him, he prayed him he would inhingrams go with him vnto Metella his mother, thencefoorthto line in peace and reft with her. But for in ill fauouall his disease, he would not give over to deale in matters of state. For tendaies before his red apparell fleathepes. for Lepidus being bent to all cruelty immediatly after, flatly fell at defiance with Pompey. Now Fle. Sylla confecrating the diffues of all his goods vnto Hercules, made exceeding fumptuous feaftes sypeares old vnto the Romaines, the provision whereof was so vnreasonable great, that every day they & spward, threw a great deale of meate into the river, and they dranke wine of forty yeares old and aboue.

ling him, he was full of paine and pangs that night, and so died, leaving the two little children he hadby Metella. For Valeria, was brought to bed of a daughter after his death, which was called Posthumia, because the Romaines call those children that are borne after the death of their fathers, Posthumi. Now when Sylla was dead, many gathered about the Confull Lepidus. to let that his body should not be honourably buried, as they were accustomed to burie noblemen and men of quality. But Pompey, though he was angry with Sylla, because he had given him nothing in his will, and had remembred all his other friends: yet he made fome for love. fome by intreatie, and others with threatning to let it alone, and accompanying the corpesinto Rome, gaue both safetie and honour vnto the performance of his funerals. And it is saydalfo, that the Romaine Ladies, amongst other things, bestowed such a quantity of perfume and odoriferous matter towards the same: that besides those which were brought in two hundred and ten great baskets, they made a greatimage to the likenesse of sylla himselfe, and another of a forgeant carrying the axes before him, all of excellent incenfe and cinamon. When the day of the funerals came, fearing lest it would raine in the forenoone, all the element being so cloudie, they deferred to carrie forth the body to be burnt, untill past three of the clocke in the afternoone. And then rose there such a sudden boisterous wind, that it set all the stake of wood straight on fire, that the body was burnt at a trice; and the fire going out, fell a great slower of rainethat held on till night: fo that it feemed, good fortune following him even to his end, did also helpe his obsequies after his death. His tombe is to be seene in the field of Mars: and

Sylla with Lysander.

OW that we have at large also set forth the life of the ROMAINE, let vs come to compare them both together. In this they are both alike; that both of them grew to be great men, rifing of themselues through their owne vertue: but this onely is proper to Lyfander, that all the offices and dignities which he attained vnto in the common-wealth. were layd vpon him through the peoples goodwils and confents: for he compelled them to nothing, neither vsurped he any extraordinarie authority vpon them, contrarie to law: for as the common faying is:

Where partialitie, and discord once do raigne: There wicked men are most esteem'd, and rule with greatest gaine.

As at that time in Rome, the people being corrupted, and the state of gouernement viterly subuerted and brought to nought: to day there rose vp one tyrant, to morrow another. And therefore we may not wonder if Sylla vsurped and ruled all, when such fellowes as Glaucias & Saturmiu, did both banish and drive out of Rome such men as Metellus was: and where also in open affembly they flue the Confuls fons in the market place, and where force of armes was bought and fold for gold and filter, with the which the fouldiers were corrupted; and where they made new lawes with fire and fword, and forced men to obey the fame. Yet I speake not this in reproach of him that in such troublesome times found meanes to make himselfe the greatest man: butto shew that I measure not his honesty by the dignity hegrew vnto in so vnfortunate a city, The chiefe although he became the chiefe. And as touching him that came from Sparta (at what time it perform flourished most, and was the best gouerned commonweale) he in all great causes, and in the land most honourable offices, was reputed for the best of all bests, and the chiefe of all chiefes; whereof it came to passe, that the one did often resigne up his authoritie to his citizens, which they had given him, who also restored it to him againe many and fundrie times; for the honour of his vertue did alwaics remaine, and made him justly accounted for the worthieft man; where the other being onely once chosen Generall of an armie, remained ten yeares continually in warres and hostility, making himselfe by force, sometime Consult, sometime vice Confull, and sometime Dictator, but alwaies continued a tyrant. Indeed Lysander attempted to change and after the state of government in his countrey, howbeit it was with great lenity, and more lawfully then Sylla did. For he fought it by reason, and good perswafion, not by the fword: neither would he make a change of the whole at one felf time as Sylla did. but fought only to reforme the election of kings. The which thing according to nature doubtleffe feemed very just: that he which was the best amongst good men, should be chosen king of that city, which was the chiefe ouer all GRECE, not for her nobility, but for her vertue onely.

death, he pacified a fedition and tumult rifen among the inhabitants of the citie of Pyrro LANYM (in Italian called Pozzolo) and there he gaue them lawes and ordinances, wherehe they should gouerne themselues. And the day before he died, hearing that Granius who was in debt to the commonwealth, deferred payment of his money looking for his death: he fent for him, and made him come into his chamber, and there caused his men to compasse him a-they fay that he himselfe made his owne Epitaph that is written upon it, which was: That no mandid euer passe him, neither in doing good to his friends, nor in doing mischiefe to his enemies.

Sillaestyfaying

For like as a good hunter doth not feek for the whelp of a good dog, but for the good dog himfelfe: nor a wife man of armes also, the colt that commeth of a good horse, but the good horse himselfe. Euen so, he that taketh vpon him to stablish a civil government, committeth a foule fault. if he looke of whom his Prince should be borne, and not what the Prince himselfe should be confidering that the LACED EMONIANS themselves have deprived diverse of their kines from their crowne and realme, because they were not princely, but vnprofitable, and good for nothing. Vice, although it be in a noble man, yet is alwaies ill of it selfe; but vertue is honoured for her selfe alone, and not because she is placed with nobility. Now for the wrongs and injuries they both committed, the one did worke onely to pleasure his friends, and the other to offend them to whom he was bounden. For it is certaine that Lyfander did great wrongs to gratific his familiars: and the most part of them whom he put to death, was to establish the tyrannical power of certaine his friends. Where Sylla fought for spire to take away his army from Pompey and the Admiralty from Dolabella, which himselfe had given him, and caused Lucretius Offellato be flaine openly in his owne fight, because he sought to be Consul, for recompence of the good feruice he had done: for which cruelty of his, caufing his owne friends to be flaine in fuch fort. he made every man afeard of him. Furthermore, their behaviours touching coverous firefle and pleasure doth show, that the intent of the one was the desire of a good Prince, and the other than of a tyrant. For we do not find that Lysander, for all his great princely authority, did cuer vseanv infolency or lasciuiousnesse in his deeds, but alwaies auoided as much as a man might, thereproach of this common prouerbe: Lyons at home, and Foxes abroad: he led fuch a true LACONI-AN life, straightly reformed in all points. Where Sylla could neuer moderate his vnlawfull lufts. and prod. neither for poucity when he was young, nor for age, when it came vpon him. But whileft he gaue lawes to the ROMAINES touching matrimoniall honestie and chastitie, himselse in the meanetime did nothing but follow love, and commit adulteries, as Salust writeth. By meanes whereof he so much impouerished RomE, and left it so voide of gold and siluer, that for readje mony he fold absolute freedome vnto the cities their confederates, yet was it his daily studieto confiscate & take for forfeit, the richest and most wealthy houses in al the whole city of Rome. But all this spoyle & hauock was nothing in comparison of that which he daily cast away your his iefters and flatterers. What sparing, or measure may we think he kept in his gifts and private bankets, when openly in the day time (all the people of Rom being present, to see him sellthe goods which he had caused to be confiscate) he made one of his friends and familiars, to truste vpa great deale of houshold stuffe, for a very little price? and when any other had out-bidden his price, and that the cryer had cried it out aloud: then was he angry, and faid: My friends, I have great wrong done me here, not to fuffer me fell the spoile I have gotten, at mine owne pleasure. & dispose it as I list my self. Where Lysander contrarily sent to the commonwealth of Sparta, with other money, the very presents that were given to himselfe. And yet I do not commend him in that deed. For peraduenture he did more hurt to Sparta, bringing thither that gold and filter, then Sylla did to Rome, in wasting and consuming that he consumed. Howbeit I alledge this onely for proofe and declaration, that Lyfander was nothing couetous. They both haue done that vnto their city, which neuer any other but themselues did. For Sylla being ariotous and licentious man, brought his citizens notwithstanding to good order and gouernement; and Lyfander contrarily filled his city with vice, yet not infected withall himselfe. Thus were they both offenders, the one for breaking the law he commanded to be kept, and the other in making the citizens worse then he was himselfe: for he taught the Spartans to desire those things, which he about all things had learned to despise. And thus much concerning peace and civille gouernement. Now for matters of warreand battels fought, there is no comparison to be made of Lyfander to Sylla, neither in number of victories, nor in hazard of battell. For Lyfander wan onely but two battels by sea, besides the taking of the city of ATHENS: which (though I grant him)being rightly confidered, was no great exploit of war, howbeit it was a noble act, confidering the fame he wan by it. And as for things which happened to him in Bozor 1A, hard by the city of ALIARTE: a man might fay peraduenture that he had ill lucke. But yet methinkes also there was a fault in him, for that he staied not for king Pausanias aide (the which came from Plas TÆE'S immediatly after his ouerthrow) and because he went in a gaire, in fury, and in a vaineambition to run his head against a wall: so that men of al forts making a desperate sally out of ALI-ARTE vpon him flue him thereto no purpose, Farre valike to Cleombrotus that died at the battell of LEVCTRES, refifting his enemies that distressed his men; nor yet like Cyrus, nor Epaminordas. who to keep his men from flying, and to give them affored victory, received his deadly wound: for all these men died like noble kings, and valiant captaines. Where Lysander rashly cast himself away, to his great dishonor, by too much venturing: prouing thereby, that the ancient Spar-TANS did like wife men, to auoide the fight with wals. For the nobleft and valianteft man that is, or possible can be, may easily be so flaine, not onely by the first souldier that commeth, but by enery filly woman or child. As they fay, that the worthic Achilles was killed by Paris within the very gates of TROIA. Now to the contrary againe, the victories that sylla wan in set battels, and thethousands of enemies which he flue, are not easily to be numbered, besides also that he took the city of Rome twice: and the hauen of ATHERS, not by famine as Lylander did, but by force, after he had by many great battels driven Archelaus out of firme land into the maine fea. It is to be consideredalso, against what captaines they made warres. For me thinks it was but a passime asaman might fay, for Lysander to fight with Antiochus, a pilot of Alcibiades, or to surprise and deceiue Philecles, a common Oratorat ATHENS:

Whose busie tongue, much worse then two edg'd sword did seeme: Which pratled still and honesty did neuer once esteeme.

And whom Mithridates (in my opinion) would not vouchfafe to compare with his horse-keeper.nor Marius with one of his fergeants or mace-bearers. But to leaue afide § particular names of all other Princes, Lords, Confuls, Prætors, Captaines, and Gouernours that made wars with Sylla; what Romaine Captaine was there more to be feared, then Marius? what king living nithmen wasthere of fuch power as king Mithridates? And of Generals and Lieutenants of armies in all of greatest ITALY, were there any ener more valiant, then Lamponius & Thelesinus: of the which Sylla draue power and ITALY, were there any ener more valuant, then Lamponius ∞ 1 neighbors: of the which sylla drane pressure the one away, and brought the other to obey him, and flue the two last? But the greatest matter them, of al that we have spoken of yet, in my opinion was, that Lyfander did all his noble acts, with the aideof his whole countrey, where Syllato the contrary did his (being banished from his countrey) by his enemies. And at the felfe fame time that they draue Syllaes wife out of Rome, that they ouerthrew his houses, and flue his friends also in Rome: he notwithstanding made warres in the meane time with infinite thousands of fighting men in Borotta, and ventured his perfon in manifold dangers, fo that in the end he conquered them all, to the honour and benefit of his country. Furthermore, Sylla would neuer stoupeto king Mithridates, for any particular alliance he offered him, neither yeeld vnto him for any aide of men, or mony, to war against his enemies: but (athing most chiefly to be noted about the rest) he would not vouchfafe to speake to Mithridates, nor to take him by the hand only, before he had spoken it with his own mouth, and faithfully promised, that he would forgo Asia, deliuer him his galleys, and give vp the realmes of BITHYNIA & CAPPADOCIA vnto their naturall kings. This me thinks was the goodlieft act soldies that ever Sylladid, and proceeded of the greatest magnanimitie, to have preferred the benefit of magnanity the companyeasth in the fore his private commodity. For the rip he was likewas a milit. the comonwealth in that fort, before his private commodity. For therin he was like vnto a good greyhound, that first pincheth the Deare, and holdeth him fast till he have overthrowne him: and then afterwards followeth the pursuite of his own private quarrell. And lastly, methinks it is cassly judged, what difference there was betweene their two natures, in that they did both towards the city of ATHENS. For Sylla having taken it, after the citizes had made fierce wars with him for the increase of king Mithridates greatnesse: yet he left it freevnto them, enioying their ownelawes. Where Lyfander to the contrary, feeing fuch a mighty state and Empire as that ouerthrowne from the great rule it bare, had no pitie of it at all, but tooke away the liberty of popular gouernment, whereby it had bene gouerned of long time before, and established there ve- Plut archs ry cruell and wicked tyrants. And therfore in mine opinion, we shall not much swarue from the troth, if we give this judgement: that Sylla did the greater acts, and Lyfander committed the Lyfanders fewer faults. And that we give to the one the honour of a continent and modest man; and to the other, the commendation of a valiant and skilfull fouldier.

The end of Syllaes life:

THE LIFE OF Cimon.

Paripoltas and his poferity.

Eripoltas the Soothfayer, he that brought King Opheltas out of Thesa SALY into the country of BOEOTIA, with the people which were vnder his obedience: left a posterity after him that long time sourished in that country, the more part of the which were ever resident in the city of CHERONEA, because it was the first city that was conquered from the barbarous people whom they expulsed thence. All they that came of that race, were commonly men of great courage, and naturally giuen to the warres: who were so forward and aduenturous in all dangers thereof (in the inualions of the Medes into Grece, and in the battels of the GAVLES) that they were flaine all of them, but onely Damon (a little childe left fatherlesse and motherlesse) surnamed Peripolias that escaped; who for goodly personage and noble courage excelled all the lufty youths of his time, though otherwise he were very rude, & of a seuere nature. Now it fortuned, that when Damon was growne of fullage, a ROMAINE Captaine of an enfigne of footemen (lying in garrifon for the winter season in the citie of CHA-RONEA) fell in great loue with Damon: and because he could not reapethe fruites of his dishonest loue by no intreaty nor gifts, there appeared vehement presumptions, that by force he wet about to abuse him, for that CHERONEA at that time (being my natural citie where I was borne) was a small thing, and (being of no strength nor power) little regarded. Damon mistrufting the Captaines villany, and detefting his abominable defire, watched him a shrewdturne, and got certaine of his companions (not many in number, because he might the more secretly compasse his enterprise) to be of counsell with him, and take his part against the Captaine. Now there were fixteene of them in confort together, that one night blacked their faces al with foote, and the next morning after they had drunke together, by the breake of day fet vpon this Ro-MAINE Captaine, that was making facrifice in the market place, and flue him with a good number of his men: and when they had done, fled out of the city, which was straight in a great vprore for the murther committed. Thereuponthey called a councell, and in the market place condemned Damon and his confederates to suffer paines of death; hoping thereby to have cleared their innocency for the fact done vnto the Romaines. But the felf fame night, as al the magistrates and officers of the city were at supper together in the towne-house, according to their

The man. sewd part: Peripoltas. custome: Damon and his followers stole vpon them suddenly, slue them all, and sled againe vppon it. It chanced about that time, that Lucius Lucullus being fent on fome journy, passed by the city of CH ERONEA with his army, & because this murther was but newly done, he stayed there afew daies to examine the troth and originall thereof: and found that the commons of the city Inches Inwere in no fault, but that they themselves also had received hurt: whereupon he tooke the souldiers of the ROMAINES that remained of the garrifon, and carried them away with him. In the truth of meane time, Damon destroyed all the country thereabout, and still houered neare to the city, infomuch as the inhabitants of the same were driven in the end to send vnto him, and by gentle words & fauourable decrees handled him fo, that they inticed him to come againe into the city: and when they had him among ft them, they chose him Gymnasiarchus, to say, a master of exercises of youth. But shortly after, as they were rubbing of him with oile in his stone or hot-house, flarke naked as he was, they flue him by treason. And because that there appeared spirits of long time after in that place, and that there were heard gronings and fighings as our fathers told vs, flaneby they caused the doore of the hot-house to be walled vp:yet for al that, there are visions seene, & ireason. terrible voices & cries heard in that fewe place vnto this present time, as the neighbors dwelling by dotestiffe. Now they that were designed of this Damon (for there are yet of his race in the country of Phocides, neare vnto the chy of the country of Phocides, neare vnto the chy of the country of Phocides are vnto the chy of the country of Phocides are vnto the chy of the country of Phocides are vnto the chy of the country of Phocides are vnto the chy of the country of Phocides are vnto the chy of the country of Phocides are vnto the chy of the country of Phocides are vnto the chy of the country of Phocides are vnto the chy of th language & maners of the Atolians) are called Asbolomens, fignifying black, and befinea- Astronomers red with foote; because that Damon and his fellowes did black their faces with foote, when they were and flue the ROMAINE captaine. But the ORCHOMENIANS being neare neighbours vnto the CHE- why fortal-RONEIANS, and therefore their enemies, hired an informer of Rome, a malicious accuser, to accuse the whole city (as if it had bin one private person alone) for the murther of the ROMAINES, whom Damon and his companions had flaine. The inditement was drawne, and the case pleaded therone before the governor of Macedon, for that the Romaines did fend no governors at that time indived for imo GRECE: & the counsellors that pleaded for the city of CHERONEA, relied vpon the testimony of Lucius Lucullus, referring themselues to his report, who knew the troth & how it was. Lucullus Thereupon the gouernor wrote vnto him, and Encullus in his letter of answer advertised the ve- salled for ry troth: fo was our city cleared of the accusation, which otherwise stood in danger of vtter destruction. The inhabitants of the city of CHERONEA, for that they had escaped the danger by testimony of Lucius Lucullus, to honour him withall, they set vp his image in stone in the marker place, next vnto the image of Bacchus. And we also that be lining at this present, though many yeares begone & passed fince, do notwithstanding reckon our selves partakers of his forepassed benefit. And because we are persuaded, that the image & portraiture that maketh vs acquaint: d estating with mens maners and conditions, is farre more excellent, then the picture that represente thany mass maners and conditions are more excellent, then the picture that represented any mass maners and conditions. mans person or shape only we will comprehend his life & doings according to the troth, in this mers and volume of noble mens lines, where we do compare and fort them one with another. It shall be wisedows. sufficient for vs therefore, that we shew our selves thankfull for his benefit; and we think, that he himself would missike, for reward of his true testimony, to be required with a fauorable lie told inhis behalfe. But like as when we will have a paffing faire face drawne, and lively counterfeited, a pretrie and that hath an excellent good grace with all, yet fome manner of blemish or imperfection in it, we will not allow the drawer to leaue it out altogether, nor yet too curioufly to flew it, because the one would deforme the counterfeit, and the other make it very vnlikely. Euenfo, because it is a hard thing (or to fay better, peraduenture unpossible) to describe a man, whose life should Homes dealtogether be innocent, and perfect: we must first studie to write his vertues at large, and thereby secke perfectly to represent the troth, euen as the life it selfe. But where by chance we find certaine faults and errours in their doings, proceeding either of passion of the minde, by necesfitie of the time or state of the commonwealth: they are rather to be thought imperfections of vertue not altogether accomplished, then any purposed wickednesse proceeding of vice, or certaine malice. Which we shall not neede too curiously to expresse in our historie, but rather to paffe them lightly ouer, of reuerent shame to the meere frailty of mans nature, which cannot bring forth aman of such vertue and perfection, but there is euer some imperfection in him. And therefore, confidering with my felfe vnto whom I might compare Lucullus, I thought it company best to compare him with Cimon, because they have bene both valiant souldiers against their Livellie in enemies, having both done notable exploits in warres against the barbarous people: and what skings moreouser they have been been some and married to be a sking were moreouer, they have both bene courteous and mercifull vnto their citizens, and were both alike.

and fure it is not vnlikely, confidering the time in which they were written. But furthermore, he was equall with the best of either of both in the discipline of warres, and for the valiantnesse of a noble captaine: and he did much excell them both in properties of a good gouernour, and in the administration of the affaires of a city, when he was but a young man, and had no experience of warres. For when Themistocles at the comming in of the MEDES counselled the people of ATHENS to go out of the city, to leaue their lands and country, and to ship into galleyes, and fight with the barbarous people by fea in the straight of Salamina: as every man was wondering at his bold and venturous counfell, Cimon was the first manthat went with a life and iolity through the streete Ceramicus, vnto the castle, accompanied with his young familiars and companions, carrying a bit of a bridle in his hand to confectate vnto the goddeffe Minerua, fignifying thereby, that the city had no need of horsemen at that time, but of mariners and seamen. And after he had given vp his offering, he tooke one of the targets that hung vpon the wall of the temple, and having made his prayer vnto Minerua, came downe to the haven, and was the first that made the most part of the citizens to take a good heart to them, and courarieman. So that many were still about him to encourage him to be lively and valiant, and to thinkethinceforth to do some acts worthy of the glory that his father had gotten at the battell of Marathon. And afterwards, fo foone as he began to deale in matters of state, the people were maruellous glad of him, and were wearied with Themistocles: by meanes whereof Cimen was presently aduanced and preferred to the chiefest offices of honour in the citie, being very well thought on of the common people, because of his soft and plaine nature. Moreover, Arifides also did greatly further his advancement, because he saw him of a good gentle nature, and for that he would vie him as a counterpoise to controle Themisticles craft and stoutnesse. Wherfore after the Medes were fled out of Grece, Cimon being fent for by the Athenians for

Besides all this, he was a man of a goodly stature, circum peras Ion the Poet testifieth, and had a faire curled haire and thicke, and fought so valiantly at the seaso day of the battell, that he wan immediatly great reputation, with the loue and good will of eucabout it, and in the meane time dealt very cruelly and straightly with the confederates of his King Pancountrey, and committed many infolent parts by reason of the great authoritie he had, and sineagh his through his foolish pride whereof he was full: Cimon farre otherwise, gently entertained them internal whom Pausanias iniured, and was willing to hearethem. So that by this his courteous manner, and pride, the LACEDEMONIANS having no eye to his doings, he stole away the rule and commanded sedamonic of the Lace of the sedamonic of ment of all GRECE from them, and brought the ATHENIANS to be fole Lords of all, not by and all forceand crueltie, but by his sweete tongue, and gracious manner of vsing all men. For the their rule the onely men that pacified the civill wars and diffention in their country, and both the one and the other of the wan notable victories of the barbarous people. For there was never Grecian Captaine before Cimon, nor Romaine captaine before Lucullus, that had made wars fo farreoff from their country, leaving apart the deeds of Bacchus and of Hercules, and the acts also of Perfeus against the ÆTHIOPIANS, the MEDES, and the ARMENIANS: and the deeds of Iason also, if there remaine any monument extant fince that time, worthy of credit in these our daies. Furthermore, herein they are to be likened together, that they neuer ended their warres: they onely ouerthrew their enemies, but neuer ouereame them altogether. Againe, we may note in them a great resemblance of nature, for their honesty, curtesie and humanity, which they shewed vnto strangers in their country: and for the magnificence and sumptuousnesse of their life and ordinarie expence. It may be we do leaue out some other similitudes betweene them: howbeir in the discourse of their lives they will easily appeare. Cimon was the sonne of Miltindes and of Hegesipyle, a Thractan woman borne, and the daughter of king olorus, as we finde written in certaine poeticall verses which Melanthius and Archelous have written of Cimon. The father of Thucydides the hittoriographer himfelf, who was of kin also vnto Gimen, was called in like maner Olorus, shewing by the agreeing of the name, that this king Olorus was one of his ancestours, and did also possesses of gold in the countrey of THRACIA. It is said moreover, that he died in a certaine place called the dirchy forrest, where he was slaine; howbest that his ashes and bones were caried into the countrey of Attica, where his tombe appeareth yetto this day, amongst the tombes of them of the house and family of Cimon, neare vnto the tombe of Cimons owne fister called Elpinice. Notwithstanding, Thucydides was of the village of ALIMVS, and Milia. des of the village of LACIA. This Militades, Cimons father, being condemned by the state to Miltiades pay the summe of fiftietalents, was for non payment cast into prison, and there died: and left Cimon and his fifter Elpinice aline, both orphanes, and very yong. Now, Cimon in his first young Cimon deyeares had a very ill name and report in the city, being counted a riotous young man, and a great his youth. drinker, following his grandfather Cimons fashions vp and downe, as he had also his name; sauing that his grandfather for his beastlinesse was surnamed Coalemos, as much to say, as foole. Stefm-Coalemos. brotus THASIAN, who was about Cimons time, writeth, that Cimon neuer learned mulicke, norany other of the liberall sciences, accustomably taught to yong noble mens sons of GRECE, and that he had no sharpe wit, nor good grace of speaking, a vertue proper vnto children bornein the country of Artica: howbeit that he was of a noble minde, and plaine, without diffimulation, so that he rather lived Peloponnesian like, then like an Athenian. For he was even condisions. fuch as the Poet Euripides described Hercules to be:

A simple man he was and could not well disguise : As honest cke in things of weight, as wit could well deuise.

This ferued fitly to be applied vnto Stesimbrotus words written of him: but not withstanding, in his first young yeareshe was suspected of incontinencie with his fister, who indeed otherwise had no very good name. For the was very familiar with the painter Polygnotus, who painting the TROIAN Ladies prisoners upon the wals of the gallery, called the Plesianaction, and now Pacile: (to fay, fet out and beautified with divers pictures) he drew (as they fay) Laodices face vpon Elpinices picture. This painter Polygnotus was no common artificer nor hireling, that painted this gallery for monies sake, but gaue his labour franckly to the commonwealth, as all the historiographers that wrote in that time do witnesse: and as the Poet Melanthius also reciteth in these

At his owne proper charge, greate cost he hath bestowed, In decking up our temples here with gilded roofes embowed, For honour of the gods. And in our tongue likewife, He bath adorn'd the common place, with many a fine deuise : Painting and fetting forth in stately shew to see, The images of demy-gods that here amongst vs be.

Elpinice be- Yet some say that Elpinice did not secretly company with her brother Cimon, but lay with him ing poore, bad regard openly as his lawfull maried wife, because she could not for her pouertie haue a husband of like nobility and parentage to her felfe. Howbeit, that a certaine man called Callias, being one of the seconding richest men in the city, did afterwards fall in fancie with her, and defired to marrie her, offering and calling, to pay her father Miltiades fine of fiftietalents, wherein he stood condemned a debter to the

Paufanias killed the Joung Bi Zantine

Her parents durst not keepe her from him, by reason of his cruelty, but suffered him to carry her away. The yong gentlewoman prayed the groomes of Paulanias chamber to take away the lights, and thinking in the darke to come to Paulanias bed that was alleepe, groping for the bed as foffly as she could to make no noise, she vnfortunately hit against the lampe, and ouerthrew it. The falling of the lampe made such ancife, that it waked him on the sudden, who thought straight therewithall that some of his enemies had bene come traiterously to kill him, wherupon he tooke his dagger lying under his beds head, and so stabbed it in the young virgine, that the died immediatly yponit. Howbeit she neuer let Pausanias take rest after that, because her spirit came energy night and appeared vnto him, as he would faine have flept, and spake this angerly to him in verse, as followeth:

Keepe thou thy selfe vpright, and instice see thou feare, For wo and shame be unto him, that inslice downe doth beare.

This vile fact of his did fo ftirre vp al the confederates hearts against him, that they came to be. ficechim in BIZANTIVM under the conduction of Cimon: from whom notwithflanding becscaped, and secretly saued himselfe. And because that this maidens spirit would neuer let him rest, but vexed him continually, he sted vnto the city of Heraclea, where there was a temple that conjured dead spirits, & there was the spirit of Cleonice conjured to pray her to be cotented So she appeared vnto him, & told him that he should be deliuered of all his troubles so soone as he came to Sparta: fignifying thereby (in my opinion) the death which he should suffer there. Diverse writers do thus report it, Cimon being accompanied with the confederates of the GRE-CIANS, which were come to him to take his part: was aduertifed that certaine great me of PER. sin, and allied to the king himfelfe, who kept the city of Eione, vpon the river of Strymonia the countrey of THRACIA, did great hurt and damage vnto the GRECIANS inhabiting there. abouts. Vpon which intelligence he took the fea with his armie, and went thither, where at his first comming he vanquished and ouerthrew the barbarous people in battell: and having ouer-throwne them, draucall the rest into the city of Eione. That done, he went to inuade the THRACIANS that dwelt on the other fide of the river of Strymon, who did commonly victuall them of Eron Band having driven them to for fake the countrey, he kept it, and was Lord of the whole himself. Whereupon he held them that were besieged at Eion E so straightly from vidu. als, that Butes the king of Persians Lieutenat, despaying of the state of the city, let fire on the fame, and burnt himselfe, his friends, and all the goods in it. By reason whereof, the spoiletaken in that city was but small, because the barbarous people burnt all the best things in it with themfor feare of felues: how beit he conquered the countrey thereabouts, and gaue it to the ATHENIANS to inhabir, being a very pleafant and fertile foile. In memorie whereof, the people of ATHENS fuffered him to confecrate and fet vp openly three Hermes of stone (which are foure square pillars) vpon the tops of the which they fet vp heads of Mercurie : vpon the first of the three pillars, this inscription is ingrauen.

The people truly were, of courage flout and fierce, Who having flut the Medes fast up (as stories do rehearse) Within the walled towne, of Esone that tide, Which on the streame of Strymon stands, they made them there abids The force of famines pinch, and therewith made them feele The dint of warre so many a time, with trustie tooles of steele: Till in the end, despaire so pierced in their thought, As there they did destroy themselves, and so were brought to nought.

Vpon the second there is such another:

The citizens which dwell in Athens stately towne, Haue here let up thele monuments, and pictures of renowne, To honor so the facts, and celebrate the fame, Their valiant chieftains did atchieue, in many a martiall game: That such as after come, when they thereby perceive, How men of service for their deeds, didrich rewards receive, Encouraged may be, such men for to resemble. In valiant acts and dreadfull deeds, which makes their foes to tremble.

And vponthe third another:

When Menestheus did leade forth of this citie here, An armie to the Troian warres, (by Homer doth appeare) He was about the rest, that out of Gracia went, A valiant knight, a worthie wight, a captaine excellent, To take in hand the charge, an armie for to guide: And eke to range them orderly, in battell to abide. That praise of prowesse then (o grave Athenians) Is now no newes to fill the eares of thefe our citizens, Since through the world so wide, the fame and worthie praise, For martiall feates, to you of yore hath indged bene alwaies. Now though Cimons name be not comprised in these inscriptions, yet they thought that this was a fingular honor to him at that time: for neither Miltiades nor Themsflocles had cuer the like. For when Miltiades requested the people one day that they would licence him to weare agarland of olive boughes vpon his head: there was one Sochares, borne in the towne of DECELEA, Sochares that standing vp in open assembly spake against him, & said a thing that maruellously pleased the Decolars people, though indeed it was an vnthankfull recompence for the good feruice he had done to the factor against Mile commonwealth. When you have Miltiades (said he) overcome the barbarous people alone in bades rebattell, then aske to be honoured alone also. But how was it then, that Cimons feruice was so ac- quell for battell, then aske to be honoured alone also. But how was it then, that Cimons feruice was so ac- quell for battell, then aske to be honoured alone also. ceptable to the ATHENIANS? It was in mine opinion, because they had with other captaines of Oline fought to defend themselves and their countrey onely; and that vnder the conduction of Cimon, benghes. they had affaulted and driven their enemies home to their owne doores, where they conquered the cities of Eione & of Amphipoirs, which afterwards they did inhabit with their own citizens, and wan there also the He of Scyros, which Gimen tooke vpon this occasion. uers on the sea of a wonderful long time, vsing piracy altogether to maintaine themselues withal: fo that in the end they spared not so much as the merchants and passengers that harbored in their hauens, but robbed certaine Thessalians that went thither to traffick. And whethey had taken their goods fro the, yet would they cast the in prison besides. Howbeit the prisoners foud means to cscape, & after they had faued themselves, repaired to the parliament of the Amphic-TYONS, which is a generall councell of all the states & people of GRECE. The AMPHICTYONS . The councel vnderstanding the matter, condemned the city of the SexRIANs to pay agreat sum of money. of the down

And therefore, because there was noother likelihood, but that the theeuesthe selues should be drive to answer the fine, they fearing it, wrote letters vnto Cimon, and willed them to come with his army, & they would deliuer their city into his hands; the which was performed. And thus Cimon hauing conquered the lland, draue out the Dolopian's thence, and rid the sea Ægev m of all pirats thereby. That done, remebring that the ancient The fews, the fon of Agens, flying from Athens came into that lland of Scyros, where king Lyconedes suspecting his comming had traiterously slaine him: Cimon was maruellous carefull to seeke out his tombe, because the Athenians had an Oracle & prophecy, that commanded them to bring his after and bones backe againe to Athens, and to honor him as a demy god. But they knew not where he was buried, for that the inhabitats of the Iland would neuer afore cofesse where it was, nor suffer any man to seeke it out, till he at the last with much ado found the tomb, put his bones aboord the Admirell galley fumptuoufly decked Thefens and set forth, and so brought him againe into his countrey, foure hundred yeares after The seus bones death. For this, the people thanked him maruelloufly, and thereby he wan exceedingly the A-broughte THENTANS goodwils and in memorie of him they celebrated the judgement of the tregicall years after playes of the Poets. For when Sophicles the Poet, being a yong man had played his first tragedy, bis death by Appension the prefident perceiuing there was great strife and contention among st the lookers on, coptages, would not draw them by lots that should be Judges of this play, to give the victory vnto that & Ash.

striue and contend who best should do, for the honour of the Judges: but Sepheeles by their sentence bare away the victory. But Afchylus (as they fay) was fo angry and griened withall, that he taried not long after in ATHENS, but went for spite into SILICIA, where he died, and was buried neare vnto the city of GELA. Ion writeth that he being but a young boy, newly come from CHIO VIIO ATHENS, supped one night with Cimon at Lasmedons house, and that after supper when they had given the gods thanks, Gimon was intreated by the company to fing. And hedid fing with fo good a grace, that every man praifed him that heard him, and faid he was more curtoous then Themsstecles farre: who being in like company, and requested also to play vponthe cithern, answered them, he was neuer taught to sing or play vponthe citherne, howbeit he could make a poore village to become a rich & mighty city. After that done, the company discoursing from one matter to another, as it falleth out commonly in speech, they entred in talke of Cimons doings: and having rehearfed the chiefest of them, he himselfe told one, which was the notablest and wifest part of all the rest that ever he played. For the ATHENIANS & their confederates together, having taken a great number of barbarous people prisoners, in the cities of Sestos and of Bizantiv m, the confederates to honour him withall, gaue him the preheminence to divide the spoyle among st them. Whereupon he made the diufsion, and set out the bodies of the barbarous people all naked by themselues, and layd the spoyles and their apparell by themselues: The confederates found this diffribution very vnequall: but neuerthelesse Cimongaue them the choise to chuse which of the two they would, and that the ATHENIANS should be conten-Herophytus ted with that which they left. So there was a Samian Captaine called Herophytus, that gaue the confederates counfell ratherto take the spoyles of the Persians, then the Persians themgane count fellues, and fo they did: for they tooke the spoyle of the prisoners goods and apparell, and left the men vnto the Athenians. Wherupon Cimon was thought at that time of the common foldiers to be but an ill divider of spoile, because that the confederates caried away great storeof chaines, carkanets, and bracelets of gold, and goodly rich purple apparell after the PERSIAN fashion: and the Athenians brought away naked bodies of men, very tender and vnacquainted with paine and labour. But shortly after, the parents and friendes of these prisoners, came out of PHRYGIA and LYDIA, and redeemed every man of them at a great ransome: so that Cimonga. thered fuch a masse of ready money together by their ransome, as he defrayed the whole charges of all his galleys with the same for the space of soure moneths after, and left a great summe of mony befides in the sparing treasure of ATHENS. Cimon by this meanes being now become rich, bestowed the goods which he had thus honourably gotten from the barbarous people, more honourably againe, in relieuing his poore decayed citizens for he brake vp all his hedges and inclosures and laidthem plaine and open, that trauellers passing by, and his owne poore citizens, might take as much fruite thereof as they would, without any manner of danger. And furthermore, he kept a continuall table in his house, not furnished with many dishes, but with meate sufficient for many persons, and where his poore countrymen were daily refreshed, that would come vnto that ordinarie: so as they needed not otherwise care to labour for their living, but might be the readier, and have the more leifure to ferue the commonwealth. Yet Arifotle the Philosopher writeth, that it was not for all the ATHENIANS indifferently, that he kept this ordinarie table: but for his poore towns men only in the village of Lacia, where he was borne. Furthermore, he had alwaies certain young men waiting on him of his houshold scruants well apparelled, and if he met by chance as he went vp and downe the city, any old citizen poorely arrayed, he made one of these young men strip himselfe, and change apparell with the old man, & that was very well thought of, and they all honoured him for it. Moreouer these young men caried ener good store of money about them; and when they met with any honest poore citizen in the market place, or elsewhere, knowing his pouerty, they secretly gaue him money in his hand, and faid neuer a word. Which the Poet selfe Cratinus seemeth to speake of, in a comedy of his intituled the Archiloches: I am Metrobius the secretarie, he

But the sparan. magnificence of Cimon, did farre exceed the ancient liberality, courtefie, and hospitality of the ATHENIANS: for they of all other were the first menthat taught the GRECIANS throughout al GRECE, how they should sow corne, and gather it to maintaine themselves withal, & also shewed them the vie of wels, and how they should light and keepe fire. But Gimon making an hof- cimon pitall of his own house, where all his poore citizens were fed and relieued, and permitting strangers that trauelled by his grounds, to gather such fruits there as the time and scason of the yeare yeelded: he brought againe (as it were) into the world, the goods to be common among it them, as the Poets fay they were in the old time of Saturnes reigne. And now, where some accused this the golden honest liberality of Cimon, objecting that it was but to flatter the common people withall, and world ato win their good wils by that meanes: the manner of life he led, accompanying his liberalitie, didytterly confute and ouerthrow their opinions that way of him. For Cimon euer tooke part with the Nobility, and lived after the LACED EMONIANS manner, as it well appeared, in that he was alwaies against Themisticles, who without all compasse of reason increased the authority & power of the people: and for this cause he joyned with Aristides, and was against Ephialtes, who would for the peoples fake have put downe and abolished Areopagus court. And where all other gonernours in his time were extortioners and bribe-takers, (Aristides and Epialtes onely excepted) he to the contrary led an uncorrupt life in administration of instice, and ever had cleane cimons in: hands, what focuer he spake or did for the state and common wealth, and would therefore neuer state hads take mony of any man living. And for proofe hereof, we find it writte, that a nobleman of Perstacalled Refaces, being a traitor to his mafter the king of Persia fled on a time vnto Athens, Refaces atwhere being continually baited and wearied with the common accufations of thefe tale beare is sempted to and picke-thankes that accused him to the people, he repaired at the length vnto Cimon, and brought him home to his owne doore two bolles, the one full of darickes of gold, and the other of darickes of filuer, which be peeces of money fo called, because that the name of Darius was Darickes written vpon them. Cimon feeing this offer, fell a laughing, and asked him whether of the two he called. would rather chuse, to have him his friend or his hireling. The barbarous nobleman answered him, that he had rather have him his friend. Then faid Gimon to him againe, Away with thy gold A noble and filter, and get thee hence for if I be thy friend, that gold and filter shall ever be at my com- forms of mandement, to take and dispose it as I have need. About that time began the confederates of the ATHENIAN'S to be weary of the wars against the barbarous people, defiring thenceforth to line quietly, and to have ley fure to manure and husband their grounds, and to trafficke alfo, confidering that they had driven their enemics out of their countrey, and that now they did them no more hurt; by reason whereof they payed the mony they were sessed at, but they would furnish nomoe mennor ships as they had done before. But the other Captaines of the ATHENIANS compelled them to it by all the meanes they could, and profecuted law against them that failed paiment, condemning them in great fines, and that fo cruelly, that they made the feigniorie and dominion of the ATHENIAN'S hatefull vnto their confederates. Howbeit Cimen tooke a contrary courfeto them: for he compelled no man, but was content to take mony and void ships of them that would not, or could not ferue in their persons, being very glad to suffer them to become flouthfull mongrels in their houses, by too much rest, and to transpose themselues from good soldiers which they had bene, to labourers, merchants, & farmers, altogether altered from The benefit armes and wars, through the beaftly flothfull defire they had to live pleafantly at home. And fernice; and cotrarily, causing a great number of the ATHENIANS one after another to serve in gallies, he so the discom. acquainted them with continuall pains in his voyages, that he made them in short space become modifie of lords & masters ouer them that gaue them pay & entertainment. For they began by litle & litle idlentife.

to flatter and feare the Athenians, whom they faw trained continually in the wars, euer bearing armour, and carrying their weapons in their hands, becoming expert fouldiers at their charge, by reason of the pay they gaue them: so that in the end, they became subjects and contributaries as it were vnto them, where before they were their friends and companions. So as there neuer was GRECIAN Captaine that bridled more the cruelty and power of that mighty PERSIAN king, then Cimon did: for after he had driven him out of all GRECE, he left him not fo. but following him foote-hote, as we commonly fay, before the barbarous people could take breath, or give wife and direct order for their doings, he made so great speed, that he took some of their cities from them by force, and other some by practife, causing them to rebell against the king, and turne to the GRECIANS fide: infomuch as there was not a man of warre left for the king of Persia in al Asia, from the country of Ionia, directly downe to Pamphylia. And furthermore, being aducrtifed that the kings Captaines were vpon the coast of PAMPHYLIA. with a great army by fea, because he would feare them in such fort, that they should not dare any more to flew themselves you the sea, on this side of the Iles of the CHELIDONIANS: he departed from the Ile of GNIDOS, and from the city of TRIOPIVM, with two hundred galleys. the which at the first had bene excellently well made and denised by Themistottes, as well for fivift failing, as for easie turning. Howbeit Gimon made them to be enlarged, to the end they might carrie the greater number of men of warre in battell, to affault the enemies. And fowent firlt against the Phase Lites (who were Grecians borne, and yet notwithstanding would neither take the GRECIANS part, nor receive their army into their haues) landed there, defiroy. ed all the country, and then came and camped with his armichard at their walles. But the men Chio an Ils. of Chio being ancient friends of the Phaselites, and in Cimons army at that journey, did fomewhat pacifie his anger, and gave aduertifement to them of the city of their doings, by letters, which they tyed to their arrowes, and flot over the walles. So as in the end they procured their peace, with condition, that the Phase Lites should pay tentalents for a fine; and further-Cimen wan more should also follow the armie of the Grecians, and from thenceforth fight with them. and for them, against the barbarous people. Now Ephorus faith, that the PERSIAN captaine that had charge of the army by fea, was called Tithranftes, and the Captaine of the army by land, phe. rendates. But Callifthenes writeth, that Ariomandes, the fon of Gobrias, was the kings Lieutenant, having chiefe authority over the whole army that lay at anker before the river of Eurymedon. & had no defire to fight, because they looked for a new supply of tourescore sayle of the Phon. NICIANS, that should come to them from Cypris. But Cimon contrarily, sought to fight beof his whole fore these galleys of the Phoenicians came to loyne, with them, and put his galleys in order of battell, determining to give a charge, and compell them to fight, would they, or would they not: which the barbarous people perceiuing, drew nearer into the mouth of the riner Eurymedon, because they should not compasse them in behind, nor force them to come to battel against their wils. Which notwithstanding, when they faw the Athenians come to set you them where they lay, they made out against them a fleete of fixe hundred sayle, as Phanodemus declareth:or as Ephorus writeth, three hundred and fiftie faile onely. But they did nothing worthic of Elory of the fo great a power, at the least touching the fight by sea, but turned their proces straight to the both by fea river: where fuch as could recover the mouth thereof in time faued them selves, flying to their army by land, which was not farre from that place, fet also in order of battell. But the rest that were taken tardie by the way, they were flaine, and their gallies funke or taken; whereby we may know that there were a great number of them for many were faucd, as it is likely, and many also were splitted to peeces, and yet the Athenians tooke two hundred of them prisoners. In the meane feafon, their armie by land came neare to the fea fide: which Cimon perceiving, floodin fome doubt, whether he should land his men or not, because it seemed a hard and dangerous of Europe thing vnto him, to land in spite of his enemics; and to put forth the GRECIANS already wearied with the first battell against the barbarous people, who were altogether whole, fresh, and lustie, and withall many innumber against one. Neuerthelesse, perceiving that his men trusted in their force, besides the courage which the first victory gaue them, and that they defired none other thing but to fight with the enemies: he put them on land while they were hot yet with the first battel. And fo with great furie and loud criesthey ranne immediatly against the barbarous people, who flood fill and ftirred not, & received their first charge very valiantly: by reason wherof, the battell grew sharpe and bloudy, infomuch as there were slaine all the greatest personages and men of best account of all the ATHENIANS army. But the other fought it out fovaliantly, Circum that in the end they wanne the field, and with maruellous difficulty made the barbarous people Guercame flie, whereof they flue a great number in the place, and tooke the rest prisoners, with all their the basself tents and pauillions, which were full of all forts of riches. Thus Cimen like a valiant champion of of the barthe holy games, having in one felfe day wonne two victories, and having greatled by hearth party. the holy games, having in one felfe day wonne two victories, and having excelled the battell pleafely by sea also which the Grecians had wonne within the channell of Salamina, with that land. which he wanne then vpon the land: and the battell which the GRECIANS wan by land before the citie of Plat ÆEs, with that which he wanne the day before on the sea: yet washenot contented with all this. For after two fo famous victories obtained, he would once againe fight for the honour of the tokens of triumph: and being aduertised that the sources fayle of the PHOENICIANS (comming too late to be present at the first battell by sea) were arrused at the head of Hydra, he fayled thither with all possible speede. Now the Captaines of this sleete knew nocertainty of the ouerthrow of their chiefest armie, but stood in doubt of it, and would not be perswaded that it was ouerthrowne in that sort: and therefore were they so much the more affraid, when they descried a farre off the victorious armie of Cimon. To conclude, they lost all their shippes, and the greatest part of their men, which were either drowned or slaine. This viflory against the Persians did so daunt and plucke downe the pride and loftie minde of the barbarous Persian king, as he made that condition of peace fo much spoken of in ancient his flories, in the which he promised and sware, that his armies thencefoorth should come no nea- king of Perrerto the GRECIAN sea, then the cariere of a horse; and that he would sayle no farther forward save condithen the Isles Chelidonians, and Cyaneans, with any galleys or other shippes of warre. Howbeit the Historiographer Callisthenes writeth, that it was no part of any article comprised within the condition of peace, but that the king kept it for the feare he had of this fo great an ouerthrow: and that afterwards he kept so farre from the GRECIAN sea, that Pericles with fiftie fayle, and Ephialtes with thirtie onely, did faile beyond the Isles CHELIDONIA, and no barbarous fleete euer came against them. Yet notwithstanding all this, amongst the common actes of Athens, which Craterus hath gathered together, the articles of this peace are found writtenat large, as a thing that was true indeede. And it is faid, that for this occasion the ATHENT- calling feet ans built an alter of peace, and that they did Callias great honour, for that he was fent Ambasta- ambastadour vnto the king of Persia to take his oath for confirmation of this peace. So when all thefe take the spoyles of the enemies were fold to them that would give most, there was such store of gold and eath of the fluer in the sparing coffers of their treasurie, that there was enough to serue their turne for any king of Parfruice they would employ it to; and besides that, they had sufficient to build up the side of the wallof the castell which looketh towards the South, this voyage and great spoyle did so enrich them. And it is said moreover, that the building of the long wals that io yne to the city, with the hauen, which they call the legs, was built and finished afterwards; how beit the first foundations thereof were built with the money Cimon gaue towards it, for that the worke met with moorish & watery places, by meane whereof they were driven to fill vp the marishes with force of sints comen and great loss which they three years the bottome. It was be also that first did be a wife and so which they three years the bottome. and great logs, which they threw vnto the bottome. It was he also that first did beautifie and set sharge of forth the city of ATHENS, with places of liberall exercise & honest pastime, which shortly after certains were much effected. For he caused plane trees to be set in the market place; and the Academic buildings. which before was very drie and naked, he made it now a pleafant groue, and full of goodly fprings which he brought into it, and made fine couered arbours to walke in, and goodly long fmooth alleys to runne a good courfe in. On a time he had news brought him, that certain Perstans dwelling in Cherrone sys(to fay a demie Ile of the country of Thracia) would not begotten out, but sent to the people of high Thracia, to pray their aide to defend themselues against Cimon: of whom they made but little account, because he was departed from ATHENS with a very few ships, who set vpon them only with four galleys, and took thirteene of theirs. drawe the And so having driven the Persians out of Cherronesvs, and subdued the Thracians, Persians he conquered all the countrey of CHERRONESVS, from THRACIA vnto his owne countrey. out of thra. Anddeparting from thence, went against them of the Ile of Thasos, that had rebelled against 614. the ATHENIANS: and having ouercome them in battell by sea, he wanthree and thirtie of their ships, and besides that tooke their city by siege, and wanne the mines of gold lying beyond the same to the Athenians, with all the lands that belonged vnto them. This conquest made his way open into MACEDON, and gaue him great oportunitie to have taken the best part thereof at that present time. But because he let it alone, and followed not that oportunity, he was suspected to have taken money, and to have bene bribed by presents of king Alexander: whereupon cujed and discharged, his secret enemies laid their heads together, and accused him. But Cimon to cleare himself before the Judges of this acculation, faid vnto them: I have practifed friendship neither with the Ioni-ANS, nor yet with the THESSALIANS, both which are very rich and wealthy people: neither haue I taken their matters in hand, as some other haue done, to receive both honour and profit by them. But indeed I am a friend to the LACED EMONTANS; for I confesse I loue them, and defire to follow their fobriety and temperance of life, the which I preferre and effeeme about any riches or treasure: although I am very glad not with standing to enrich our state and commowealth with the spoiles of our enemies. Stefimbrotus reporteth this accusation, and saith, that his fifter Elpinice went to Pericles house, (who was the sharpest and straightest accuser of his) to prav him not to deale so extreamely with her brother: & that Pericles laughing on her, said: Alas, thou art too old, Elpinice, thou, now to ouercome these matters. Yet for all that, when cimons cause came to hearing he was a more gentle aduerfarie then any other of his accusers, and rose vpbut once to speake against him, and that for manners sake onely: so that Cimen thereby escaped, and was cleared of this accusation. And furthermore, so long as he was present in ATHENS, healwaies kept the seditious people in obedience, who would euer crosse and thwart the authority of the Nobility because they would have all the sway and rule in their owne hands. Bur when Cimon was fent abroad any whither to the warres, then the common people having no body to gainefay them, turned and altered the government of the city top he turney, and confounded all the ancient lawes and custome which they had observed of long time, and that by the procurement and fetting on of Ephialtes. For they tooke away all hearing of causes in manner from the court of * Areopagus, and put all authority of matters indiciall into the hands of the people. and brought the state of the city into a pure Democratia, to say, a common weale ruled by the fole and absolute power of the people, Pericles being then in great credit, who altogether fauoured the peoples faction. Wherefore Cimon at his returne, finding the authority of the Senate and councell so shamefully defaced and troden vnder foot, was maruellously offended withalls and fought to restore the ancient state of judgement againe as it was before, and set up the gouernment of the Nobility (called Optimatia) that was established in the time of clisthenes. But then began his enemies againe with open mouth to crie out vpon him, reuiuing the old former naughty rumor that ranne of him before, that he kept his own fifter: and furthermore accusing him, that he did favour the LACED EMONIANS. And amongst other things, there ranne in the peoples mouthes the verses of the Poet Eupolis, which were made against Cimen:

No wicked man he was, but very negligent, And therewithall to wine much more, then unto mony bent. He stole sometimes away at Sparta for to sleepe:

And left poore Elpinice his wife at home alone to weepe. And if it be fo, that being thus negligent and given to wine, he have gotten fo many cities, and wonne such fundrie great battels: it is out of doubt then, that if he had bene sober and carefull. there had never bene before him nor fince, any GRECIAN captaine that had passed him inglory of the wars. Indeed it is true, that from the beginning he euer loued the manner of the LACED #-MONIANS: for of two twins which he had by his wife Clitoria, he named the one of them Lacedemonius, and the other Eleus, as Stefimbrotus writeth, faying, that for that cause Pericles did ever twitthem in the teeth with their mothers stocke. Howbeit Diodorus the Geographer writeth, that both these two, and another third called Thessaus, were borne of Isodice, the daughter of Euryptolemus, the sonne of Megacles. Howsocuer it was, it is certaine that Cimons credit grewthe the greater, by the fauour and countenance which the LACED EMONIANS gaue him, who had hated Themistocles of long time, and for the malice they bare him, were glad that Cimon being but a young man, did beare more sway in Athens then he: which the Athensans perceiued well enough, and were not offended withall at the beginning, because the good will of the LACED EMONIANS towards him, did bring them great commodity. For whethe ATHENIANS began to grow of great power, and to practife fecretly, that the confederates of the GRECIANS should for fake the Laced & monians to joyne with them: the Laced & monians were not angry withall, for the honour and loue they bare vnto Cimon, who did alone in manner manage all the affaires of GRECE at that time, because he was very courteous vnto the confederates,& alfothankfull vnto the LACED EMONIANS. But afterwards when the ATHENIANS were aloft. and of great power, and that they faw Cimon stucke not for a little matter with the LACED EMO-NIANS, but loued them more then they would have had him: they began then to enuie him, because in all his matters he had to doc, he cuer highly praised and extolled the LAGED EMONI-ANS before them. But specially, when he would reproue them of any fault they had committed, or that he would perswade them to do any thing: The LACED EMONIANS (faid he) I warrant ye do not fo. That, as Stefimbrotus faith, made him maruelloufly to be maliced of the people. But the chiefest thing they accused him of, and that most did hurt him, fell out you this occasion. The fourth yeare of the reigne of Archidamus, the fonne of Zeuxidamus king of Sparta, there fortuned the wonderfullest and most fearefull earth-quake in the city of LACED EMON, and Amaruelthereabouts, that euer was heard of. For the earth in many places of the countrey opened, and low great fellas into a bottomlesse pit. The mountaine Taygetum shooke so terribly, that points of rocks earth quake fell downe from it. All the city was layed on the ground and overthrowne, five houses only excepted, the reft being wholly deftroyed. And it is faid also, that a little before this earth-quake Tayetum came, the young men of that city were playing with the young boyes, exercifing themselues mon. flarke naked under a great gallerie couered ouer; and as they were sporting together; there started vp a Hare hard by them. The young men spying her ranne after the Hare starke naked and oyled as they were with great laughter. They were no fooner gone thence, but the top of the gallery fell downe vponthe boyes that were left, and squashed them all to death. And in memorie of the fame, the tombe where they were afterwards buried, is called vnto this day Sifmatias, as much to fay, as the tombe of those which the earth-quake had flaine. But king Archidamus foreseeing straight upon the sodaine, the danger that was to come, by that he saw present, perceining his citizens buffe in fauing their houshold stuffe, and that they were running out of their houses, made the trumpeters to found a hote alarme ypon it, as if their enemies had come stealingly vpon them to take the city to the end that all the inhabitants should presently repaire vnto him (fetting all businesse apart) with armour and weapon. That sodaine alarmedoubtlesse sa- mussodaine ued the city of SPARTA at that time: for the ILOT A, which are their flaues and bond-men in the medite city. country of LACONIA, and the country clownes of little villages thereabouts, came running armed out of all parts, to spoile and rob them vpon the sodaine that were escaped from this earth- and bond. quake. But when they found them well armed in order of battell, they rethrned backe againe Lareds moas they came: and then beganne afterwards to make open warres vpon them, when they had mians, drawne certaine of their neighbours vnto their confederacie, and specially the Messent-ANS, who made hote warres upon the Spartans. Whereupon the LACED EMONIANS fent Periclidas vnto ATHENS, to demaund aide: of whom Aristophanes the Poet in mockage, faid:

With visage pale and wanne he on the altar saie, In fearlet gowne requiring aide, to succour their estate.

Against whom Ephialtes also spake very much, protesting that they should not aide nor relieue a city that was an enemy vnto ATHENS, but rather suffer it to fall to the ground, and to spurne § pride and arrogancy of Sparta under their feete. But Cimon (as Critica faith) being more care. full for the benefit of Sparta, then for the enlarging and increasing of his countrey, brought it to passe by his perswassion, that the Athenians sent him thither with a great power to helpe cimon prothem. And furthermore, In rehearseth the very selfe words that Cimon spake to move the peo- cared aids ple to grant his request. For he besought them that they would not suffer GRECE to halt, as if sedemond. LACED EM ON had bene one of her feete, and ATHENS the other: nor to suffer their cirie to ans. lose another city their friend, and subject to the yoke and defence of GRECE. Having therefore obtained aide to lead vnto the Laced Amonians, he went with his army through the Corin-THIAN'S COUNTRY: wherewith Lachartus a Captaine of Corinth was maruellously offended, faying, that he should not have entred into their countrey with an army before he had asked licence of them of the city. For (faid he) when one knocketh at a mans doore or gate, yet he commeth not in before the mafter of the house commandeth him. But ye CORINTHIANS (faid Cimon to him againe) have not knocked at the gates of the CLEON ÆIANS, nor of the MEGARIANS, to come in, but have broken them open, and entred by force of armes, thinking that all should be open vnto them that are the stronger. Thus did Cimon stoutly answer the Co-RINTHIAN captaine againe, because it stood him vpon, and so went on with his army through the countrey of Corinth. Afterwards the Laced & Monians fent againe vnto the Athenia

ANS, to require aide against the MESSINIANS and the ILOTES, (which are their slaues) who had won the city of ITHOME. But when the ATHENIANS were come, the LACED EMONIANS were afraid of the great power they had brought, and of their boldnesse besides: wherefore they fent them back againe, and would not employ them of all other their confederates that came to their fuccour, because they knew them to be men very tickle, desiring change and alterations. The ATHENIAN'S returned home, misliking much that they were sent backe againe, infomuch as cuer after they hated them that fauoured the LACED EMONIANS in any thing. And for the LACEDEMONIANS fake therefore, taking a finall occasion of offence against Cimon, they banished him out of their countrey for ten yeares: which was the full terme appointed and limited vnto them that were banished with the Offracismon banishment. Now within the terme of these ten yeares, the Laged Emonians fortuned to undertake the delivery of § city of DEL-PHES, from the feruitude and bondage of the Phociaus, and to put them from the cuftodie and keeping of the temple of Apollo, which is in the faid city. Where for eto obtaine their defire and purpose, they came to plant their campe neare vnto the city of TANAGRE in PHOCIDE. wherethe ATHENIANS went to fight with them. Cimon understanding this, although he was in exile, came to the Athenians campe armed, with intent to doe his duty to fight with his countreymen against the LACED EMONIANS, and so went into the bands of the tribe Oeneide. of the which he was himselfe. But his owne countrey enemies cried out against him, and faid that he was come to none other end, but to trouble the order of their battell, of intent that he might afterwards bring them to the city felfe of ATHBNS. Whereupon the great councel of the flue hundred men were afraide, and fent to the Captaines to command them they should not receive him into the battell: fo that Cimon was compelled to depart the campe. But before he went the prayed Euthippus Anaphlystian, and his other friends that were suspected as him. felfe was to favour the LACED EMONIANS doings: that they should do their best endeaourto fight valiantly against their enemies, to the intent their good service at that battell might purge their innocencie towards their countrymen: and so they did. For the ATHENIANS keeping the fouldiers Cimon had brought with him, which were an hundred in all, they fer them apart by them felues in a foundron, who fought it fo valiantly and desperately that they were flaine curry man of them in the field, leaving the ATHENIANS maruellous forie for them, and repenting them that they had so vniustly mistrusted them astraitors to their country. Wherfore they kept not their malice long against Cimon, partly as I am perswaded, because they called his former good feruice to mind which he had done to their country aforetime, and partly alfo, because the necessity of the time so required it. For Y ATHENIAN'S having lost a great battel before TANA-GRE, looked for no other about the spring of the yeare, but that the PELOPON NESTANS Would inuade them with a great power; wherefore they reuoked Cimons banishment by decree, whereof Pericles selfe was the only author and procurer. So civill and temperate were mens enmitted at that time, regarding the common benefit of their publike state and weale: and so much did their ambition (being the most vehement passion of all other, and that most troubleth mens minds) gine place, and yeeld to the necessities and affaires of the common-weale. Now when Cimon was againe returned to ATHENS, he straight pacified the warre, and reconciled both cities together. And when he faw that the ATHENIANS could not live in peace, but would be doing still, and enlarge their dominions by warre, for lucres sake: to preuent them that they should not fall out with any of the GRECIANS, nor by scouring and coasting vp and downethe countrey of Peloponnesv s, and the Iles of Grece, with fo great a natic, should mote occafion of civill warres among ft the GRECIANS, or of complaints vnto their confederates against them: he rigged and armed out two hundred galleys to go againe to make warre in Cyprus, and in ÆGYPT, because he would acquaint the ATHENIANS with the wars of the barbarous people, and thereby make them lawfull gainers by the spoyles of those their naturall borneenemies. But when all things were in readineffe to depart, and the armie prest to ship and salle away, > Come hardily, spare not, for if thou come by me, My whelpes and I which do here stand will quickly welcome thee,

Cimon dreaming in the night had this vision: It seemed unto him that he saw a birch angrie with him, and barking carneftly at him; and that in the middeft of her barking, she spake with a mans voice, and faid vnto him:

This vision being very hard to interprete, Aftyphilus borne in the city of Postbonia, a man expert in such coniectures, and Cimons familiar friend, told him that this vision did betoken his death, expounding it in this fort: The dogge commonly is an enemy to him he barketh at. A. of the gaine, nothing gladdeth more our enemy, then to heare of our death. Furthermore, the mingling of a mans voice with the barking of a bitch, fignifieth nothing else but an enemie of the death prigdeath, and the state of the death prigdeath prig-MEDEs: because the army of the MEDEs is mingled with the barbarous people and the GRE most is mingled with the barbarous people and the great people and the great people and the great people and the great peopl CIANS together. Besides this vision, as he did sacrifice to the god Bacchus, the Priest opening the beaft after it was facrificed, about the bloud that fell to the ground, there affembled a Twarine of Ants, which caried the congealed bloud offfrom the ground by little and little, and layd itall about Cimons great toe, a great while together before any man marked it: Cimon at the last spied it by chance; and as he was looking on them to marke what they did, the minister of the facrificebrought the beafts liver that was facrificed, to shew him, whereof the biggest end that they call the head was lacking, and this they judged for a very ill token. Notwithstanding, having all things ready for preparation of this journey, fo as he could not well go backe, he launched into the lea, and hoised saile, and sending threescore of his gallies into Ægypt, sayled with the rest vpon y coast of PAMPHILIA, where he wan a battell by sea of the king of PERSIA, ouercoming the gallies of the Phoenicians & the Cilicians, and conquered all thecities thereabouts, making the way very open to enter into ÆGYPT. For he had no small thoughts in his mind, but reached to high enterprises, and determined vtterly to destroy the whole Empire of the mighty king of Persia, and specially for that he understood Themistocles was in maruellous credite and reputation amongst the barbarous people, because he had promised the king of Persia to leade his armie for him, and to do him notable feruice when soeuer he should have occasion to war with the GRECIANS. It is thought this was the chiefe cause that made Themistocles poys on himselfe, because he despaired that he could not performe that service against GRECE which he steller wile had promifed: affuring himselfe that it was no easie matter to vanquish Cimons courage and hing death. good fortune, who lay at that time with his army all along ft the Ile of CYPRV's, promifing himfelfe great matters at that instant. But in the meane season, Cimon sent certaine of his men vnto the oracle of lupiter Ammon, to ask him some secret question; for no man ever knew neither then nor fince, for what cause he had fent them thither, neither did they also bring backe any answer. For they were no fooner come thither, but the oracle commanded them ftraight to returne: faying vnto them, that Gimon was then comming to him. So Gimons men receiving this answer, left the oracle, and tooke their journey backe to the feawards. Now when they were come againcto the GRECIANS campe, which at that present lay in AGYPT, they heard that Cimon was The death departed this world: and reckening the daies fince his death, with the instant of their answer receited from the oracle, that Cimon was then comming vnto him, they knew straight that darkly he had fignified his death vnto them, and that at that very time he was with the gods. He died atthe siege of the city of CITIVM in CYPRVs, as some report, or else of a hurt he received at a skirmish, as other hold opinion. When he died, he commanded them that were vnder his charge, to returne into their countrey againe, and in no case to publish his death: which commandement was fo wifely and cunningly handled, that they all came home fafe, and not an enemic, nor any of their confederates that once understood any thing of it. So was the armie of the Garage and led by Cimen though himselfour dead the fines of thirty days as GRECIAN'S gouerned and led by Cimon, though himselfe was dead the space of thirty dayes, as Phanodemus Writeth. But after his death, there was no GRECIAN Captaine that did any notable No famous thing worthy of fame against the barbarous people, because the Orators and governours of the actions by chiefest civile of Command the action of the and Greek and Gre chiefest cities of GRECE stirred them vp one against another, and there was no manthat would an to the once steppe in as a mediator to make peace between them. And thus the GRECIANS now barbarous did one destroy and spoile another by civill warre amongst themselves, which happily gauethe cimens king of PERSIA leyfure and time to restore himselfe againe, and contrarily was cause of such vt- death. terruine and destruction of the whole power and force of GRECE, as no tongue can wellexpresse. Indeede along time after, king Agesilaus came with anarmie of the GRECIANS into Asia, and beganne a small warre against the Lieutenants of the king of Persiaes gouernours of the lower countries of As 1 A: but before he could do any notable exploit, he was called homeagaine by occasion of new troubles and civill warres rising among the GRECIANS, and compelled to returne into his countrey, leauing the treasurers of the king of Persia raising of subsidies and taxes upon the ciries of the Grecians in Asia, although they were confede-

Whereas in the time that Cimon gouerned, they never faw and of the kings Sergeants at armes, or Commissioner, that brought any letters patents or commandement from the king, or any fouldier that durst come neare the sea, by forty furlongs. The tombes which they call vnto this prefent day Cimonia, do witnesse that his ashes and bones were brought vnto Athens. Neuerthelesse, they of the city of Citiv M do honour a certaine tombe, which they fay is Cimons tombe: because that in a great dearth and barrennesse of the earth, they had an oracle that commanded them, not to neglect Cimen, as the Orator Rausicrates writeth it, but to honour and reverence him as a god. S for Lucullus, his grandfather was a Confull, and so was Metellus (surnamed Numidicus, because of his conquest of NVMIDIA) his vncleby the mothers fide. His father notwithstanding was convict of fellonie, for robbing the treasure of the State whilest he was officer: and Cacilis his mother was reported to have led an vnchaste life. But for Lucullus selfe before nebare office or rule in matters of State, the first thing he touched and tooke in hand for the cause of his countrey, was the accufation of Serudius the foothfayer (who before had accused his father) for that he also had dealt falsely in his office, and deceived the commonwealth. And this the Ro-MAINES thought very well handled of him, infomuch as a prety while after there was no other talke in Rome but of that matter, as though it had bene a notable valiant act done by him. For otherwise, though privatly they had no instruction, yet they thought it a noble deedeto accuse the wicked, and it pleased them as much to see the young men put law-breakers in sute, as to see a notable good course of a dogge at a hare. Howbeit there followed such stirre and banding vpon this fute, that some were very fore hurt, and other slaine in the market place; but in fine, Serulius was cleared and quite difiniffed. Lucullus was very eloquent, well spoken, and excellently well learned in the Greeke and Latine tongues: infomuch as Sylla dedicated vnto him the commentaries of all his doings which he himselfe had collected, as to one that could better frame a whole historie thereof, and couch it more eloquently together in writing. For he had not onely a readie tongue to vtter that he would speake and pleade his matters with great eloquence, as other be seene to do having matters of sute or open audience;

Their eloquence lies then in dike, and they them sclues be still. For Lucullus had studied humanity from his youth, and was well learned in all the liberall sciences: but when he came to elder yeares, to refresh his wit (after great troubles) he fell to the studie of Philosophie, which quickened the contemplative part of his soule, and mortified, or at Luculus. the least betimes bridled the ambitious & active part, specially after the diffention betwixt him Philosophia and Pompey. But to acquaint you better with his learning yet, it is faid, that when he was a yong inhibitation man, he layed a great wager with Hortenfius the Orator, and Sistenna the Historiographer (in time. ieast as it were at the first, but afterwards it fell to good earnest) that he would write the breuiarie of the Mars san warres in verse or prose, in the Latine or Greeke tongue, which soeuer fell to his lot and I thinke his hap was to do it in prose in the Greeke tongue, because we find a little Greeke storie extant of the warres of the ROMAINES against the MARSIANS. He dearely loued his brother M. Lucullus, as appeared by many manifest proofes; but the chiefest and most noted war of the proofeamong the Romaines was this. Himselfe was elder then his brother Marcus, and yet Marsians for all that would neuer fue to beare office in the commonwealth, nor accept any before his brother, but taried alwaies till he should be chosen, and let his owne time passe ouer, This great cur- loue to his tefie to his brother fo wanne the peoples hearts, as Lucius being absent, they chosehim Ædilis, and his brother Marcus with him for his fake. He was in the flower of his youth in the time of Luin and the Mars I AN warres, wherein he did many wife and valiant deeds. The cause not withstanding Marcus that moved Syllato make choice of him, was rather for his conftancie and good courteous nature, then for any other respect. For when Sylla had once won him, he euer after employed him #dules. continually in his most weighty causes: as in commission specially, he gaue to him to coine money. For indeed part of the mony that Sylla spent in the warres against king Mithridates, was coi- syllague ned by Lucullus comandement, within the country of PELOPONNESVS: Whereupon they were Lucullus called Lucullian pecces, and were currant a long time amongst the fouldiers, to buy such things to come me, as they stood in neede of, and neuer refused by any. Sylla being afterwards at ATHENS, the nein Poles stronger by land, but the weaker by sea, so as his enemies cut off his victuals from him, sent Luz ponnesses. cullus into Ægypr and Lybia, to bring him fuch ships as he found in those parts. It was in the deepe of winter, and yethe spared notto faile with three brigantines of GRECE, and as many galliots of the Rnodians, putting himfelfe not onely to the danger of the sea in so long a voyage, but of his enemies in like manner: who knowing themselues to be the stronger, went sailing euery where with a great nauie. But for all thefe dangers, he first arrived in the Ile of CRETA,& wantheir good wils. From thence went to the city of Cyrene, where he found the inhabitants turmoyled with civil warres, and continuall oppressions of tyrants: from which troubles he deliuered them, and gaue them laws to establish gouernment among them, putting them in remembrance of Platoes words spoken to their ancestors in old time, in the spirit of a prophecie. For lawes to the when they prayed Plato to write them lawes, and to appoint them fome forme of government eyemans. for their commonwealth, he made them answer: It was a hard thing to give lawes to fo rich and Anotable fortunate a people as they were. For to fay truly, as nothing is harder to be ruled then a rich man; saving of so contrarily, nothing readier to receive counsell and government then a man in adversitie. This lesson framed the Cyrenians at that time to be more civill and obedient to the lawes Lucullus gaue them. When he departed thence, he coasted towards ÆGYPT, where he lost the more part of his shippes by pirates: but for his own person, scaping their hands, he was very honorably received in the city of ALEXANDRIA. For all the kings armie came to meete him at sea, gallandy trimmed and appointed, as they were wont to welcome home the king when he retur- to AEgypt ned from any voyage by fea: and king Ptolomic himselfe being very young at that time, gaue him as honourable entertainment as he possible could. For amongst other honours that he did him, he lodged him in his Court, and defrayed his ordinarie diet, where neuer strange Captaine was lodged before : and did not onely found the ordinary allowance in feathing of him which hee vsed vnto others, but commanded fouretimes as much provision more to be made as he had before. Notwithstanding, Lucullus tooke no more then was reasonable for his person: nor yet would he receive any maner of gift, although the king had fent him presents to the value of Fourescoretalents. And which more is, would not so much as go see the city of MEMPHIS nor any other of the famous monuments and wonderfull fights in ÆGYPT, saying, that it was for a man that trauelled up and downe for his pleasure, and had ley sure withall, to see such things, but not for him that had left his Captaine in the field, at the fiege of the walles of his enemies. To conclude, this young king Ptolomie would in no case fall in friendship with Sylla, fearing left he should thereby put himselfe into warres, but gaue him men and shippes to bring him into Cr. PRVs. And as he was readie to imbark, the king bidding him farewell; and embracing him, gaue rald given him a goodly rich Emerald fet in gold, which Lucullus at the first refused, vntill the king shewed him his picture grauen in it: and then he accepted the gift, fearing lest the vtter refusall might cause the king thinke he went away discontented, and should perhaps therefore lay an ambush by fea for him. Thus having gotten a certaine number of ships together of the port townes thereabouts, ouer and befides fuch as the pirates and fea-rouers had hidden, being part of their spoiles, and bestowed with their receitors, went on with them into Cyprvs, where he vnderstood that his enemies lay close in certaine creekes under the foreland, watching to boord him as he failed by. Whereupon he vnrigged and bestowed his ships in dockes, and fent word to all the port townes thereabouts, that he was determined to winter there and therefore willed them to prouide him victuals and other necessarie munition to be in readingsse against the Spring, Bur in the meane while, when he faw time convenient, he put his whole fleete agains to the fea with all possible speede, went himselfe away, and in the day time carried a low saile, but in the night packt on all the cloath he could for life: fo that by this crafty fetch he wante Rhodes and loft not one ship. The RHODIANS they also furnished him with ships: and besides them, he so perfwaded the GNIDIANS and the inhabitants of the Ile of Co, that they for looke king Mithrida. tes, & went to make wars with him against them of the Ile of Samos. But Licully himselfalone draue king Mithridates men out of CHIO restored the COLOPHONIANS against to libertie, and tooke Epigorus the tyrant prisoner, who had kept them in bondage. Now about that time. Mithridates was compelled to for fake the city of Per GAMV's, and to retire to the city PITANE within the which Fimbria kept him befieged very straightly by land. Wherefore Mithridates bauing the sea open vpon him, fent for his force and nauie out of all parts, not daring to hazard battell against Fimbria, who was very valiant, of a venturous nature, and at that time moreouer was himselfe a conquerour. Fimbria perceiuing what Mithridates meant, and hauing no power by fea of his owne, fent straight to Lucullus, to request him to come with his nauie into those parts to his aide, for the our comming of this king, the greatest & most cruell enemiethat CUCT the ROMAINE people had. Because that so notable a prey, which they followed with such danger and trouble, should not escape the Romaines, while they had him in their hands, and was come himselfe within their danger: and that therefore he should so much the more hearken vnto it, because that if it fortuned Mithridates to be taken, no man should winne more honour and glory by his taking, then he that had stopped his passage, and layed hands on him, even as he thought to have fled. And thereby should the praise of this noble victory runne in equalitic between ethem both: the one that had driven him from land, and the other that had stopped his passage by sea. And furthermore, that the ROMAINE'S would nothing regard all the famous battels and victories of Sylla in GRECE, which he had wonne before the cities of CHOERONEA and Or CHOMENE, in comparison of taking the king. This was the effect of Fimbriaes message fent vnto Lucullus, wherein there was nothing, in the which there was not great likelihood. For there is no man that can doubt of it, but if Lucullus would have believed him at that time (and have gone thither with his ships to stop the havens mouth of the city, in the which Mithridates was befreged, confidering also that he was so neare at hand) this warre had taken end there, and the worldbesides had then benedeliuered of infinite troubles which fell out afterwards. But whether Lucullus preferred the confideration and respect he had vnto Sylla, whose Lieutenant he was, before all other due regard of private or common benefit: or that he detefted and abhorred Fimbria as a curfed perion, who not long before had through his wicked ambition embrued his hands in the bloud of his Captaine: or elfe, that it was through the secret prouidence and permission of the gods, that he spared Mithridates at that time, to the end he might be referred as a worthy enemy, against whom he might afterwards shew his valour. Howsoeuer it was, it so fell out that he hearkened not vnto Fimbriaes message, but gaue Mithridates time and leyfurcto flie, and finally to fcorne all Fimbriaes force and power. But Lucullus felfcalone afterwards ouercame the kings armie by sea, once neare vnto the head of Lectum, which is on the coast of TROADE : and another time neare vnto the Ile of TENEDOS, where Weoptolemus, Mooptole Mithridates Lieutenant by sea, lay in waite for him with a farre greater number of shippes then mushing he had. Andyet so soone as Lucullus had descried him, he failed before all his nauie, being Admirall, in agalley of RHODES, at five oares to a banke, whereof one Demagoras was mafter, tes Lieutes aman well affected to the service of the Romaines, and very skilfull in battell by sea. And when Neoptolemus on the other fide rowed against him with great force, commanding his pylor that he should so order his galley, that he might stemme him right in the prowe: Demagoras fearing the full meeting of the kings galley, which was very strong and heavie, and furthermore wellarmed with points and spurres of brasse before, durst not encounter her with his prowe, but nimbly made his galley to winde about, and turned his poupe towards him. Whereby the galley being low at the end, received the blow without hurt, confidering that they hit vpon the dead workes, and those parts which are alwaies aboue water. In the meane time Lucullus other shippes were come, who commanding his master to turne the beake-head of his galley forward, did many famous acts: fo that he made his enemies flie, and draue Neoptolemus away, Reoptole And departing from thence, went to feeke out Sylla euen as he was ready to passe ouer the seas, thridates about Cherronesvs: holpe him to wast his armie, and so passed him ouer with safetie. Af- Lieutenaus terwards when peace was concluded, and that king Mithridates was come into his realme and by sea. countries againe, which lie vpon the fea Maior, sylla condemned the province of Asia to pay the summe of twenty thousand talents for a fine by reason of their rebellion. And for leauying of his fine, he left Lucullus there with commission to coine money: which was a great comfort and hearts ease vnto the cities of Asia, considering the extremity that Syllahad vsed towards them. For in fo grieuous and odious a commission vnto them all, as that was, Lucullus did not onely behaue himselfe vprightly and instly, but also very fauourably and courteously. For, as touching the MITYLENIANS that were openly in armes against him, he was very willing they should know their fault, and that for farisfaction of the offence they had committed taking Ma. rius part, they should suffer some light punishment. And seeing that they were furiously bent to continue in their naughtinesse, he went against them, and having ouercome them in battell, compelled them to keepe within their wals, and laid fiege vnto their city, where he vsed this policy with them. At noone dayes he lanched into the fea, in the view of all the MITYLENIANS, and Lucullas fayled towards the city of Erea: howbeit in the night time fecretly returned backe, and making at the farge no noise, layed an ambush neare vnto the city. The MITYLENIANS mistrusting nothing, went of the MITYLENIANS on the next morning very rashly without order, & without any maner watch or ward, to spoile solutions. the campe of the ROMAINES, supposing enery man had bene gone: but Lucullus comming suddenly vpon them, tooke a great number prisoners, flue about fine hundred such as resisted, and wanne fixe thousand slaves, with an infinite quantity of other spoile. Now did the gods happily preserve Luculus, that he was no partaker at that time of the wonderfull miseries and troubles which Sylla and Marius made poore ITALIE suffer, cuen then when he was occupied in the warres of As 1A: and yet notwithstanding his absence, he was in as good credite and fauour with Sylla, as any of his friends about him. For, as we have faid before, he dedicated his Commenta. Luculus ries vnto him, for the good will he bare him, and by his last wil and testament appointed him tutor vnto his fonne, leaving Pompey out: which feemeth to be the first occasion of the quarrell and The first occ grudge that fell out afterwards betweene them, because they were both young men, and vehe- sason of mently desirous of honour. Shortly after the death of Sylla, Lucullus was chosen Consull with twist Ports. Wherfore, when the Confuls came to draw M. Cotta lots what provinces they should take charge of, Lucullus was maruellous sorie that the province Confuls. of GAVLE, lying betweene the Alpes & ITALY, fell to his lot, because he thought it no country wherein any great exploits were to be done; and againe, the glory of Pompey grieued him greatly, whose honourdaily increased by the famous battels he wan in SPAINE. So that it was most certaine, that fo foone as Pompey had ended the wars there, they would have chosen him General in the wars against Mithridates. Wherfore, when Pompey sent to Rome in earnest maner, to require money to make pay to his fouldiers, writing to the Senate, that if they did not fend him money the sooner, he would leave both Servorius and SPAINE behind him, and bring his army backe in-X x 3 to ITALIE: Lucullus made all the meanes he could to have it quickly fent him, fearing left he should returne into ITALIE vpon any occasion, whilehe was Confull. For he thought that if he returned againe to Rome with fo great an armie, he would eafily do what he lift: and the ceibegus a rather, because that Cethegus and he could not agree, who at that time bare all the sway and rule at Rome, because he spake and did al that pleased the common people, being a vicious liver, and diffolutely giuen, for which cause Lucullus hated him. But there was another common Oratour among the people, called Lucius Quintius, and he would have had all Syllnes doings revoked and broken: a matter to alter euen the whole state of the commonwealth, and to turmoile the citie of Rome againe with civill diffention, which then lived quietly and in good peace. This Lucius Quintius Lucullus talked withall apart, to perswade him, and openly reproued him with such words, that he was diffwaded from his euill purpole, & by reason ruled his rash ambition, handling it both wifely and cunningly as he could possible (for the safety of the common-wealth) because it was the beginning of a disease, from whence infinite troubles were like to grow. While thefe things were thus in hand, newes came that Octavius the Gouernour of CILICIA was dead. Straight whereupon many put forward themselves to sue for this charge, and to court Cethegus, as the onely man who aboue all other might make any man officer whom he though good. Now for Lucullus, he made no great reckening of the government of CILICIA in refpect of the country, but because CAPPADOCIA was hard adioyning to it; and perswading himselfe that if he could obtain the government thereof, they would give none other (but himfelfe)the authority to make wars with Mithridates, he determined to procure althe meanes he could that none should have it but himselfe. And having proved fundry waies, was compelled in theend against his owne nature, to practife a meaneneither comely nor honest, and yet the readiest way he could possibly deuise to obtaine his defire. There was a woman in Rome at that time called Pracia, very famous for her passing beauty, and also for her pleasant grace in talke and discourse. howbeit otherwise vnchast after curtisan maner. But because she employed the credit and fauor of them that frequented her company, to the benefit and feruice of the commonwealth, and of them that loued her: she wanthe report (besides her other excellent commendable graces) to be a very louing woman, and ready to fauour and further any good enterprife, and it wanne her great fame and reputation. But after she had once wonne Cethegus, (who ruled all the common. wealth at his pleasure) and brought him to be so farre in fancy with her, that he could not be out of her fight: then had the all the whole power and authority of Rome in her hands, for the prople did nothing but Cethegus preferred it, and Cethegus did what euer Precia wold will him to do. Thus Lucullus fought to come in fauour with her, fending her many prefents, and vfing all other courtefies he could offer vnto her; befides that it feemed a great reward for so proud and ambitious a woman as she, to be fued vnto by such a man as Lucullus was, who by this meanes cameto haue Cethegus at his commandement. For Cethegus did nothing but commend Lucallus in all affemblies of the people, to procure him the gouernment of CILICIA: who after it was once giáted him, had then no need of the help neither of Pracia, nor yet of Cethegus. For the people wholy of themselves with one consent did grant him the charge to make war with Mithridates, because he knew better how to ouercome him then any other Captaine, and because that Pompey was in the warres with Sertorius in Spains, and Metellus also growne too old, both which two were the only menthat could descruedly have cotended for this office with him. Neuertheles, Marcus Cotta his fellow Confull, made fuch fute to the Senate, that they fent him alfo with an army by sca, to keepe the coasts of Proportide, & to defend the country of BITHYNIA. Thus Lucullus having this commission, went into As 1 A with one legion onely, the which heleaued anew at Rome: and when he was come thither, he tooke the rest of the strength he found there, which were men marred and corrupted altogether of long time, through conerousnesses and delicacy of the country. For amongst others, were the bands which they called § Fimbrian bands, in difficulties men giuen ouer to felfe-will, and very ill to be ruled by martiall diffcipline, because they hadliucd a long time at their owne liberty, without all obedience to any man. They were those selfe fouldiers that together with Fimbria, fluetheir general Flaceus, Conful of the Romains people, and that afterwards betrayed Fimbria himselfe, and forsooke him, leaving him vnto Sylla, being mutiners, traitours, and wicked people, howbeit otherwise very valiant, well trained, and painefull fouldiers. Notwithstanding, Lucullus in short time bridled their boldnesse meetly well and reformed the others also, who before had never proved (in my opinion) what the value of a good Captaine and Generall meant, that knew how to command: but werevsed to flattering leaders, that commanded the fouldiers no more then they themselues liked of Now concerning the state of the enemies, thus it was with them. Mithridates that in the beginning was very braue and bold (as these flourishing Sophisters commonly are) vndertaking warre against the Romaines, with a vaine unprofitable armie, but passing fresh and sumptuous to the Mibrida. eye: after he was once foyled and ouercome, with no leffe shame then losse, when he came teranny ato make his second warre, he cut off all superfluous pompe, and brought his atmicinto a conuenient furniture to serue for warres at all assayes. For he put by the confused multitude of fundry nations, the fierce threatnings of the barbarous people in fo many fundry tongues, and clearely banisht also the rich grauen armours with goldimiths worke, and set with precious stones, as things that more enriched the enemics that wan them, then gaue firength or courage to those that ware them. And contrariwise, caused long stiffe swords to be made after the ROMAINE fathat ware theath and countries, can be field a maruellous number of horse, more ready thion, and great heavy shields, & brought to the field a maruellous number of horse, more ready for service, then rich in furniture. Then he joyned fixescore thousand sootemen together, appointed and fer in order like vnto the battell of the Romaines, with fixteene thousand horse of feruice, befides those that drew his armed carts with fithes about, which were in all to the number of an hundred. And besides all this land preparation, he brought also a great number of ships and galleys together, which were not decked with goodly golden paulions, as at the first, neither with stoucs nor bathes, nor with chambers and cabbons, curiously hanged for Ladies and Gentlewomen: but furnished full of armour, artilerie, and slings, and with money also to paythe fouldiers. With all this army and preparation, he went first to inuade BITHYNIA, where the cities receited him very gladly, and not those onely, but all the other cities of Asia wholly: the which were fallen againe into their former miseries and diseases, by the crueltic of the Romains farmers and vources, who raising taxes and imposts vpon them, made missis by thein abide vntollerable things. It is true that Lucullus draue them away afterwards, like the the Remails Harpy., which tooke the meate out of the poore mens mouthes: how beit at that time he did "Jureri. no more, but brought them to be more reasonable by the perswasions he vsed vnto them, and qualified a little the inclination of the people vnto rebellion, being enery one of them in manier willing to renolt. Now Lucullus being busic about these matters, Marcus Cotta the other Contains Confull (and his companion) supposing that the absence of Lucullus was a fit occasion offeredhim to do notable service, prepared to fight with Mithridates. And although he had newes Mithridates brought him from fundry places, that Lucullus was with his armie in Phrygra, and comming towards him . ver por with flouding investigate that he beginned to the beautiful of the land of towards him : yet notwithstanding, imagining that he had the honour of triumph assured alreadic in his hands, and because Lucultus should be no partaker of it, he advanced forwards to give bartel. But Mithridates overcame him both by fea and land: fo that Cotta by fea loft threefeore of his ships with all the men in them, foure thousand footmen by land, and was after with shame shut vp and besieged in the citie of Chalcedon, remaining there hopelesses to escape, but by Lucullus onely aide and meanes. Howbeit there were in Lucullus campe, that were very earnest with him to leaue Cotta; and to goe further, affuring him that he should finde the Realme of Mithridates both without men of warre, or any defence at all: fo that he might cafily be Lord of the whole. And these were the words of the souldiers that spited Cotta, because his foolish rashnesse and fond imagination had not onely brought those men to the shambles to be slaine and castaway, whom he had the leading of: but had let them also, that they could not ouercome him, and end this warre without blowes, for that they were driven to goto his helpe. Howbeit Lucullus making an oration vnto them, answered, that he had rather The godly faue the life of one Romaine citizen, then winne all that his enemies had in their power. And Luculus when Archelaus (who had bene Mithridates Licutenant in Bobotta in the first warres against forthe fa-Sylla, and now in the second warre tooke part with the Romaines) assured him that so soone ming of a sthey say him in the Realmoof Pourse, they would all rise against Mitheidates, and would stiffen. as they faw him in the Realme of Pontvs, they would all rife against Mithridates, and yeeld themselues vnto him: Lucullus answered him thus, that he would not shew himselfe more fearefull then the good hunters, which neuer fuffer the beaft to recouer his denne. And when Lucultus he had fo faid, he marched with his armie towards Mithridates, having in all his campe army. thirty thousand footmen, and two thousand fine hundred horse. When he came so neare vnto his enemies, that he might easily at eye discerne all their host, he wondered at the great multitude of fouldiers that were in their campe, and was in mind to give battell, supposing fire fell betweene both ment.

Luculles politicke confiderafeither the

yet that the better way was to prolong time and draw these warres out in length. But one Ma. rius a ROMAINE captaine, whom sertorius had fent out of SPAINE Unto Mithridates with a certaine number of fouldiers, came forwards, and prouoked him to battell. Luculus for his part did put his men also in readinesse to fight: but even as both battels were prepared to joyne, the element opened upon the fudden, without any shew of change of weather discerned before and they plainely faw a great flake of fire fall betweene both armies, in forme and fhape much like to a tunne, and of the colour of molten filuer. This celeftiall figne put both the armies in fuch a feare, as they both retired, and fought not a stroake: and this wonderfull fight fortuned (as they fay) in a place of PHRYGIA, called Otryes. Now Lucullus afterwards confidering with himselfe, that there was no riches nor provision so great in the world, that could suffice to victuall fo many thousands of people as Mithridates had in his campe any long time together, having his enemies campe fo lying before them: willed that one of the prisoners should be brought into his tent, and first of all he enquired of him, how many of them lay together in a cabbin, then what come he had left in their cabbin. And when the prisoner had answered to all his demands, he returned him to prison, and sent for another: then for a third, and questioned with them all as he had done with the first. Then comparing the store of their corne, and other proportion of victuals they had, with the number of menthe fame should maintaine: he found that all would be spent in three or foure daies at the vttermost. Whereupon he relied on his first determination to delay time without hazard of battel. So he caused a maruellous deale of wheat to be brought into his campe out of every quarter, that the fame being throughly victualled he might eafily tarry the occasion which his enemies necessity should offer him. Mithridates in the meane time, fought which way he might take the city of the CYZICENIANS, who had bene Ouerthrowne before with Cotta at the battell of CHALCEDON, where they had loft three thoufand men, and ten of their ships. And because that Lucullus should not vnderstand of his enterprise, Mithridates stole away by night after supper, taking the opportunity of a dark rainie night, and marched thitherwards with fuch speed, that he was before the city of Cyzievs by breake of day, and pitched his campe, where the temple of the goddesse Adrastria standeth, which is the goddeffe of fatall destinies. Lucullus receiving intelligence of Mithridates departure from his campe, followed him straight way es step by step, and being glad that he was not met withall of his enemies in diforder, lodged his army in a village call THRACIA, in aplaceof great advantage for him, and commodiously seated also you the high wayes, and throughfare of the neighbours thereabouts, by the which they must come of necessitie to victuall Mithridates campe. Wherefore Lucuttus wifely foreseeing what would follow, wouldnot keepe his purpose secret from his souldiers, but after he had wel trenched & fortified his camp, called them to counfell, and there making an oration vnto them, told them openly by manifest demonstration of affured hope, that ere many dayes passed, he would give victorie into their hands, and that with out losse of one drop of bloud. In the meane season, Mithridates environned the GRECIAN'S round about by land, having devided his armie into ten campes, and sopped vp the mouth of the arme of the fea, which deuided the city from firme land, with his ships from one fide to another. Now the CYZICENIAN'S were valiant men, and determined to abide all extremitie for the Romaine's fakes: but one thing onely troubled them much, that they knew not what was become of Lucullus, neither could they heare any newes of him, though his campe flood in fuch a place, wherethey might eafily differne it from the city. But Mithridates fouldiers deceived them; for flewing them the ROMAINES campethat lay aboue hard by them, they faid vnto them: do ye fee yonder campe there: They are the ME DE s, and the AR-MENIANS, Whom Tigranes hath fent to the aide of Mithridates. These words put the Cyli-CENIANS in a maruellous feare, feeing fuch amultitude of enemies differfed round about them: that when Lucullus should come to their aide, he could not well tell which way to passe. Yet at the length they heard of Lucullus approach, by one called Demonax, whom Archelaus fent vnto them, but they would not beleeve him at the first, taking it for a tale, onely tomake them to be of good courage, and valiantly abide the furie of the fiege: vntill fuch time as a little boy of theirs, escaped from the enemies that before had taken him prisoner, was come againe vnto them. Of whom they inquired where Lucullus was: the boy laughed at them, thinking they iested to aske that question of him. But when he saw they were in good earnest, he shewed them the Romaines campe with his finger: then they beleeved it indeed, and were couragious couragious againe. There is a lake neare vnto the citie of Cyzrevs called Dafcylitide, and it is nauigable with convenient bigge boates. Lucullus tooke one of the greatest of them, put it in a cart, and to caried it to the fea, and there put as many fouldiers in her as she could welcarry, who by night entred into the citie, the skoure of the enemies neuer descrying them. This small suppliedid maruelloudly comfort the befreged CYZICENIANS: and it feemeth that the gods, delighting to feetheir noble courage, would further increase and assure the same, by many manifest tokens which they sent from heaven, and specially by one, which was this. The day of the feast of Proservina was at hand, and the citizens had neuer a blacke cow to offer in solemne sacrifice, as their ancient ceremonies required: fo they made one of paste, and brought it hard vn. to the altar. Now, the cow that was vowed to this facrifice, & which they reared vp of purpose to serve for that day, was feeding amongst the heard of the city in the fields, on the other side of thearme of the sea. But that day she kept alone from all the rest of the heard, and swam ouer the state of the arme of the sea, and came into the city: where she went of her selfevneothe place of the sacrifice. Furthermore, the goddeffe Proferpina her felf appeared vnto Ariffagorax in his dreame, Secretary of the state and commonwealth of the Cyzicenians, and said vnto him : I am come hither to be series to bring the flute of Lybia against the trumpet of Pont, and therefore tell the citizens from find. me, that I will them to be of good courage. The next morning when the Secretarie had told tax wifen. them this vision, the Cyzicenians maruelled much at the goddesses words, and could not imagine whatthey meant. Howbeit at the breake of day there arose a great whistling wind, that made the sca billowes rise very high; and the kings engines of batterie which were brought to the walles of the city to plucke them downe (being wonderfull workes that one Niconides a THESSALIAN enginer had made and denifed) began to make such a noise, and to breake in peeces by the roughnesse of the winde, that a man might easily judge what would follow vpon it. Then all at one instant, the Southwind was become so vehement bigge, that in a moment it burst all these engines as funder, & specially a tower of wood of the height of an hundred cubits, which the wind shooke so vehemently, that it ouerthrew it to the ground. And it is sayd fur. thermore, that in the city of ILIVM the goddesse Mineraa appeared vinto diverse in their sleepe, all in a sweat, and shewing part of her veile torne, as if she had bene newly returned from giving aidevnto the Cyzicenians: in confirmation whereof, the inhabitants of ILIVM haue 2 pillar yet vnto this day, whereupon this matter is written for a perpetuall memorie. Now was Mithridates maruellous sorric for the breaking and losse of his engines, by meanes whereof, the CYZICENIAN'S had escaped the danger of affault, and of the fiege in like manner, vntill he truly vnderstood of the great famine that was in his campe, and the extreme dearth to be such, Extreme as the fouldiers were compelled to eate mans flesh, which (his Captaines abusing him) had for same in a time kept secret from his knowledge. But when he was enformed of the troth indeed, he left to this was enformed of the troth indeed, he left to the second to the troth indeed, he left to the second to the troth indeed, he left to the second to the troth indeed, he left to the second to the troth indeed, he left to the second to the troth indeed, he left to the second to the troth indeed, he left to the second to the troth indeed, he left to the second to the troth indeed, he left to the second to the troth indeed, he left to the second to the troth indeed, he left to the second to the troth indeed, he left to the second to the troth indeed, he left to the second to the troth indeed, he left to the second off his vaine ambition obstinately to continue siege: knowing well that Lucultus made not wars Proutebe with threats and brauery, but (as the common prouer be faith) leapt on his bellie with both his his belly his belly his belly feete, that is to fay, he did what he could possible to cut off all the victuals from him. And there with both foreone day when Lucullus was gone to affault a castle that troubled him, very neare vnto his bis sense. campe, Mithridates because he would not lose that oportunity, sent the most part of his horsemen to get victuals in Bithynia, with all the carts, and beafts of carriage, and his most vnprofitable footmen. Lucullus hearing thereof, returned againe the selfe same night vnto his campe, and the next morning betimes being in the winter scason, followed them by the tracke with ten enfignes of footemen onely, and all his horsethen. But the snow was so deepe, the cold so terrible sharpe, and the weather so rough, that many of his souldiers not being able to abide it, died by the way. For all that, he marched on still, till he ouertooke his enemies about the river of Rindacus, where he gaue them fuch an ouerthrow, that the very women came out of the Rindacus R. city of Apollonia, and went to steale the victuals they had loden, and to strip the dead, which were a maruellous great number as a man may judge in such a case: and neuerthelesse there were taken fixe thousand horse of service, an infinite number of beasts for carriage, and Lucullus ffteenethousand men besides, all which spoyle he brought to his campe, and passed hard werthers by the campe of his enemies. But I wonder much at the Historiographer Salust, who writing of the hosse. this matter faith, that here was the first time that ever the Romains saw any camels. Methinks men. it strange how he should thinke so, that they who long before had ouercome Antiochus the Great under Scipio, and the others that a little before had fought against Archelaus, neare unto the cities of ORCHOMENE and CHERONEA, should not have seene camels. But to returne as gaine to our matter. Mithridates being feared with this ouerthrow, resoluted with himselfe immediatly to flie, with all the speed he could possibly make; and to entertaine and stay Lucullus for atime behind him, he determined to fend Ariflonicus his Admirall with his armie by fea, into the fea of GRECE. But as Ariflonicus was readic to hoife faile, his owne men betrayed him, and deliuered him into the hands of Lucullus, with ten thousand crownes which he caried with him, to corrupt (if he could) part of the Romain's army. Mithridates hearing of this, fled by fea, leaving the rest of his army by land in the hands of his captaines, to be brought away by them as well as Granicus ft they could. Lucullus followed vnto the river of Granicus, where he fet vponthem, & after he had flaine twenty thousand of them, tooke an infinite number prisoners. And they say there died in observations that wars, what fouldiers, what flaues, what lackeis, & other stragglers that followed the camp. about the number of three hundred thou fand people. This done, Lucullus returned to the city of Cyzicvs, whereafter he had spent some daies, enjoying the glory due vnto him, and receiued the honorable entertainment of the CYZICENIAN s: he went to vifit the coast of Helles PONT, to get ships together, and to prepare an army by sea. And passing by TROADE, they prepared his lodging within the temple of Venus: where, as he flept in the night, it feemed to him he faw the goddeffe appeare before him, which faid thefe verfes vnto him:

O lyon fierce and fout why fleepest thou so sound? Since at thy hand so faire a prey, is readie to be found.

Herewith he rose incontinently out of his bed, being yet darke night, and calling his friends to him, told them the vision he had in his dreame: and about that very time also there came some vnto him from the city of ILIVM, that brought him newes of fifteene galleys of king Mithrida. tes, having five oares to every banke, that were seene in the haven of the Achaians, and that failed towards the Ile of Lemnos. Whereupon Lucullus tooke ship straight, went and tooke them every one: for at his first comming he slue the captaine called Isidorus, and went afterwards to the other mariners that lay at anker on the coast side, who seeing him come, drew towards land with their ships, in purpose to runne them all ashore, and fighting aboue hatches, hurtmany of Lucullus fouldiers, because they could not compasse them in behinde, and for that also the place where they had laied their ships was such, as there was no way to force them before, their galleys floting in the fea as they did, and the others being fastned to the land as they were. Lucullus with much ado all this notwith standing, found meanes in the end to put ashore certaine of the best fouldiers he had about him, in a place of the Ile where they might easily land. These fouldiers went straight and fet upon the enemies behind, flue some of them cuen at their first comming, and compelled the rest to cut a funder the cables that fastned the galleys to the banks. But when they thought to flie from land, the galleys brused and broke one another: and that worst of all was, ranne vpon the points and spurres of Lucullus galleys: and so many of themas flood about hatches were flaine, the refitaken prisoners: amongst whom, Marius the Romains captaine was brought vnto Lucullus, whom Sertorius had fent out of Spaine vnto Michidates. He had but one eye, and Lucullus had commanded his men before they fought, not to kill any of his enemies that had but one eye, because Marius should not die so happie a death, as to be flaine, but that he should die some shamefull death, and be condemned by order of law. That done, Lucullus went in person with all the speed he could possible to follow Mithridates, hoping to find him yet vpon the coast of BITHYNIA, where Vocanius should have stayed him: for he had fent this Voconius before with a great number of his ships vnto the city of NICOMEDIA, to ftop him from flying. But he taried to long in the Ile of Samothracia facrificing to the gods of the same, and to be received into the fraternitie of their religion, that he could never after come neare Mithridates to stop him from flying: having alreadie made faile with all the whole fleete, and hafting with all possible speed to recouer the Realme of Pontvs, before Lucullus could return from whence he went. But in failing thitherwards, he met with fuch a terrible storme, that carried part of his ships so away, that they ranne straggling to seeke their fortune, and part of them splitted and drowned outright: so that all the coastes and rivers thereabouts, for many daies after, were full of dead bodies and shipwrackes cast ashore by waves of tes in great the sea. Now for Mithredates owne person, he was in a ship of great burthen, the which for her greatnesse could not faile neare the shore, nor recouer land, she was also very euill to be guided by the pilots in so boisterous a storme: the marriners besides were put out of all their skill and knowledge knowledge: and the ship her selfe moreover tooke in such store of water, and was so heavily charged withall, that they durst no more put her out to the sea. By reason whereof Mithridates was compelled to go aboord a little pinnace of pirats, and to put himselfe and his life into their hands, by whose helpe in the end (beyond all expectation, but not without great danger) he got to land, and recourred the city of Heraclea in the Realme of Pontys. Now here is to benoted, that the great brauerie Lucullus shewed vnto the Senate of Rome, fell out according to his imagination by the fauour of the gods. For when the Scnate had appointed for ending of these warres, to prepare a great natic of ships, and therewithall had given order also for three thousand talents: Lucullus stayed them by letters, that they should not do it, writing brauely vnto them, that without all this charge and great preparation he would be ftrong inough to drive Mithridates from the fea, with the onely ships he would borrow of their friends and confederates. And indeed, through the speciall favour of the gods, he brought it Lucullus fotopasse: for they say, that this terrible storme that destroyed the armie of Mithridages was commended. raised vp by Diana, being offended with the men of the Realme of Pontvs, because they had bie. destroyed her temple in the city of PriAPos, and had caried away her image. Now there were diuerse that counselled Lucallus to deferre the rest of this warre vntill another season: but notwithstanding all their perswasions, he went through the countrey of GALATIA and BITHYNIA to inuade the Realme of Mithridates. In the which voyage, at the first beginning he lacked vichuals, so that there were thirty thousand men of GALATIA following his campe, that caried e- Lucullus uery one of them a bushell of wheate on their shoulders: howbeit entring farther into the countrey, and conquering the whole, there was fuch exceeding plenty of all things, that an oxe was fold in his campe but for a Drachma, and a flaue at foure times as much. And of all other spoyle bought for there was fuch great store, that either they made no reckoning of it, or else they made hauock of it, because there was no man to sell it vnto, every man having so much of his owne. For they ran ouerall the countrey vnto the city of THEMTSYRA; and to the valleys that lay vpontheriuer of Thermodon, and stayed no where longer then they were a spoyling. Therupon the souldiers began to murmure at Lucullus, because he affured all the cities vpon composition, & neuer took any of Lucullus of them by force, nor gaue them any meanes to enrich themselues by spoyle: and yet said they, saidiers. he would make vs now go farther, & leave Amisvs a great rich city which we might eafily take by force, if it were but a little straightly besieged; and leade vs into the deserts of the TIBARE-NIANS and the CHALD EIANS to fight against Mithridates. Lucullus passed ouer all these complaints, and made no reckoning of them, because he would neuer haue thought that they would haue fallen into fuch mutinie and furie, as afterward they did: and contravily excused himselfe the more carefully to them that blamed and reproued him, for his long tarying vpon townes and willages that were not worth the reckoning, & fuffering Mithridates in the meane time to gather anewforce & army cogether at his pleasure. For find he that is the mealer I do not get the realisment. a new force & army together at his pleasure. For, said he, that is the marke I shootat, & that ma- except to keth me linger time vp and downe as I do, wishing nothing more, then that he might once again bis soldiers make himselfe strong, and bring a second armie to the field, that might embolden him to come effloones to fight with vs, and runne away no more. Doyou not see, said he, that at his backe hehathan infinite number of defert countries, where it is vnpaffable euer to follow him by the tracke: and hard by him alfo the mount Caucasus, and many other vnpassible places, which are fufficient not onely to hide him alone, but infinite number of other princes and kings besides that would fliebattell, and not come to fight? Furthermore, it is but a little way from the countrey of the Cabir enians vnto the realme of Armenia, where Tigranes the king of kings inhabiteth, whose power is so great, that he driueth the PARTHIANS out of Asia, and carieth whole townes and cities of Grece vnto the Realme of Media, and hath all Syria and Pa-LESTINE in his hands, and hath flaine and rooted out the kings and fuccelfours of the great Seleucus, and hath carried away their wives and daughters prisoners by force. This great and beteucus, and hath carried away their wives and daughters prinoners by force. I his great and mighty king is allied vnto Mithridates, for he married Mithridates daughter; and it is not like- wing of dr. ly that when Mithridates shall come and intreate him to helpe him in his distresse, that Tigra-menis, man nes will refuse him, but rather we must thinke certainely that he will make warres vpon vs in red Miliis defence. And thus, in making haste to drive out Mithridates, we shall bring our selves into dingher, great danger, to prouoke a new enemic, euen Tigranes against vs, who of long time hathlurked " for a just occasion to make warres with vs. and he can have no honester cause to take armes, then to defend and keepe a king his neighbour, and so neare a kinsman, from vtter destruction, and « onethat is compelled to feeke vnto him for fuccour. What need we then to provoke him to procure it, & teach Mithridates (which he purpofeth not) to whom he should repaire for aide.to make warres against our selues: and pricke him forward, or to say better, put him with our owne hands into the way to go seeke aide of Tigranes, which of himselfe he will neuer do (thinking it a dishonor vnto him) vnlesse we drive him to it for very necessity? Is it not better for vs to give him leisure and time, to gather a second force againe of himselfe, and his owne people, that we might rather fight with the Colchians, TIBARENIANS, CAPPADOCIANS, & with fuch other people whom we have so many times overcome: then with the MEDES and ARMENIANS! With this determinatio Lucullus taried a great while before the city of Amisvs, continuing this fiege of purpose, without distressing them at all. Afterwards when winter was past, he less Minrena there to continue the fiege, and himselfe with the rest of his army went to meete Mithrida. Mubrida- des: who had planted his campe neare vnto the city of CABIRA, determining to tarrie the Ro. MAINEs comming having gathered together againe a new army of forty thousand footemen and foure thousand horsemen, in the which he put his most confidence and trust, so that he pass fed ouer the river of Lycus, and went and presented battell to the Romaine's in the plaine field. There the horsemen skirmished, and the ROMAINS had the worse: for there was one Pomponius a ROMAINE taken, of great estimation, who was brought vnto king Mithridates hurt as he was. Mithridates asked him, if in faning his life, and healing his wounds, he would become his fernant & friend. Straight replied Pomponius, With all my heart, quoth he, so that thou make peace with the ROMAINES: if not, I will cuer be thine enemie. The king efteemed his courage much, and would do him no hurt. And as for Lucullus he was afraid to come into the plaine, because hise. nemy was the stronger of horsemen: & he doubted also on the other side to take his way by the mountaine, because it was very high, vneasie to clime, and full of woods and forrests. But ashe stood thus doubtfull, they tooke certaine GRECIANS by chance that were fled, and hidden in a caue hard by among the which there was an old man called Artemidorus, who promised Lucullus if he would beleeue and follow him, he would bring him into a fure strong place to lodge his campe, where was a castle about the city of CABIRA. Lucallus beleeved the old mans words, wherefore so soone as night came, he raised great fires in the campe, and went his way and after they had passed certaine straight and dangerous waies of the mountaines, he came in themorning vnto the place where Artemidorus had promised to bring him. Now the enemies were maruclloufly amazed when day light came, to fee him there over them, in a place where if he lift to fight, he might come vpon them with advantage: and if he liked not to stirre, it was vnpossible to compell him. For he stood indifferent then to hazard battell, or not. But in the meane season, they fay certaine of the kings campe by chance were a hunting the Hart. The Romaines perceiuing that, fell vpon them to cut them off by the way: and they began by this meane one to charge another in such sort (relief growing still on either side) as Mithridates men grew the stroger. But the Romain es seeing their men flie from the trenches of their campe aboue, werein fuch a rage, that they all ran in a choler to Lucullus to pray him he would leade them to battell, and give them a fignall to fight. Lucullus, because he would show them by experience how much the presence and eye of a good wife captaine in time of need was worth; commanded them they should not once stirre, and he himselfe in person went downe into the valley, where he commanded the first of his men he met withall flying, to stay, and returne to the fight againe with him. Which they presently did, and all the other in like case: and thus gathering them together againe, did cafily make their enemies returne, that before had them in chafe, and draue them backe, fighting with them euen hard to their owne fort. Afterwards vpon this returne againe to his campe, he fet his fouldiers that fled, vnto a certaine peece of worke to flame them withall, which the Romaines are wont to vie in fuch a case: and that is, that he made them digge a dirch of twelue foote long, being in their shirts, all vntrussed, and their other companions present seeing them do it. Now there was in king Mithridates campe, one Olthacus, prince of the DARDARIANS (which are certaine barbarous people dwelling vponthe marishes of The Darda- Mæotin) a noble gentleman of his perfon, valiant, and skilfull in warres, and a man of very good indgement to do any great enterprife, as any that was in all the armie, and furthermore a prince of great good grace and entertainement in company, knowing how to fashion himselfe with all men. This prince, being alwaies at strife with other Lords of the countrey, and contending who should have the first place of honor and favour about the king: went vnto Mithridates, and promifed promifed him that he would do him notable feruice, and that was, that he would kill Lucullus, The king was very glad of this promife, and praifed him maruelloufly in fecret howbeit openly of purpose he did him many injuries, because he might have some colour to counterfeit anger and displeasure, and to give way for him to go yeeld himselfe vnto Lucullus, as he did. Lucullus was maruellous glad of him, because he was one of the chiefest men of name in all his campe; Lucullus and to proue him withall, gaue him charge immediately: in the which he behaued himselfe so well, that Lucullus greatly effected his wifdome, and commended his diligence, in fuch fort, conference, that he did him this honour, to call him fometimes vnto the Councell, and make him fit at his boord. One day when this DARDARIAN prince Olthacus thought to have found fit, occasion others roexecute his enterprise, hee commaunded his fotemen to be readie with his horse out of the prince of the Dardan trenches of the campe: and at noone daies when the fouldiers tooke reft, and flept here and there in the campe, he went vnto Lucullus tent, thinking to have found no body there to !:ed him from comming in, confidering the familiarity Lucullus shewed him, saying also he had matters of great importance to talke with him of; and fure he had gone in immediatly vnto him, if sleepe that casteth away so many other Capraines, had not then preserved and saved Lucullus that flept. For one of the groomes of his chamber called Menedemus, who by good fortune life land kept the doore of the tent, told him that he came in very ill time, because Lucullus being wearied by supp, with trauell and lack of fleepe, was but then newly layed downe to reft. Olthacus, whatfoeuer the other faid to him, would not be so answered, but told him, he would come in whether he would or not, for he must needs speake with him in a matter of great importance. Menedemus answered him againe, that nothing could be of greater importance, nor more necessaries then the preferuation of his mafters life and health, who had need to take reft: and with these words hethrust him backe with both his hands. Olthacus was afraid then, and withdrew himselfe secretly out of the trenches of the campe, tooke his horse backe, and rode straight to Mithridates campe without his purpose he came for, which was to kill Lucullus. And thus it plainely appeareth, that occasion, and opportunity of time, even in great matters delivereth meanes to fave or destroy the life of man, like as drugges and medicines given vnto the ficke and diseased perfons. Shortly after, Lucullus fent one of his Captaines, called Sornatius, to get victuals, with ten enfignes of footmen. Whereof Mithridates being aduertised, sent presently at his taile one of his Captaines also, called Menander, vnto whom Sornatius gaue battell, and flue him, with great flaughter of his men beside. And afterward Lucullus sent another of his Lieutenants, called Adrianus, with a great company of fouldiers, to get victuals into his campe more then he should need. Mithridates did not let slip this occasion, but sent after him two of his Captaines alfo, called Menemachus and Myron, with a great number of men, as well footemen as horsemen: Lucallus all which were flaine, two onely excepted, that brought newes backe to Mithridates campe: melens of the which he fought to falue as well as he could, faying that the loffe was much leffe then it was Muhrida. thought for, and that it fortuned through the ignorance and raffinesse of his Licutenants. But tes captains Adrianus at his returne passed by Mithridates campe with great pompe and maiestic, carrying ahuge number of carts loaden with corne and spoyles he had wonne: which draue Mithridates selfe into so great a despaire, and all his people into such a feare and trouble, that he presently determined to remove thence. Whereupon, the Nobility and fuch as had place of credite a- Milbrida. bout him, began to fend before, and fecretly to conucy their stuffe out of the campe, but veterly men and prohibiting others to do the same. The rest of the souldiers seeing the stoutnesse of the Kings familiars, minions, began to set vpon them with open force, not suffering them on the other side once cause of to iffue out of the campe. This mutiniegrew to fuch a fury, that they ouerthrew their carriages and fumpter moyles, and flue them prefently. Amongst others there was slaine Dorylaus, of bin while one of the chiefest Captaines of all their campe, who had nothing about him but a purple army. gowne, for the which they killed him: and Hermaus the Priest of the facrifices was troden vnderfoote, and smothered at the campe gate, by reason of the multitude of those that fled in fo great disorder. The King himselfe amongst others fled; but having neuer a one of his guard about him, nor any of the fquires of his stableto bring him a horse, Ptolomie, one of the groomes of his chamber, perceiving him in the company of them that fled, lighted off his owne horse, and gaue him the King, but cuen in manner too late. For the Romaines that followed him Counterfree were then even hard at his taile: and it was not for lacke of speed they missed the taking of him, throw ef for they were very neare him; but the couctoufnesse of the souldiers was the losse of the prey souldiers.

they had so long sought for with so great paine and hazard of battels, and deprined Lucullus of the honour and reward of all his victories. For they were fo neare vnto him, that if they had but followed Mithridates neuer so little further, they had out of doubt ouertaken him, and his horse that caried him away. But one of the moyles that caried his gold and filuer (whether by chance. or of pretended policie of Mithridates, as a matter purposely abandoned to them that pursued him) was found in the middest of the high way betwirt him that fled, and the Romaines that followed, who stayed there to rob the gold and filuer, fighting about it, that Mithridates by that meanes wan ground so farre before them, as they could neuer after come neare him againe. And this losse was not all which the couctosnesse of the souldiers made Lucullus to lose. For one of the chiefest Secretaries of the King being taken, called Callistratus, whom Lucullus commanded to be brought vnto him to his campe: they that had the charge of him, hearing tell that he had fine hundred crownes in a girdle about him, for greedinesse of them, slue him by the way; and yet notwithstanding Lucullus suffered them to spoyle and destroy the whole campe of their enemies. After Mithridates flight, Lucullus tooke the city of CAEIRA, and many other castels and strong places, where he found great treasure, and the prisons full of poore prisoners of the Gar-Class, and many Princes a kinne vnto the king himfelfe, which were thought to be dead lone before; and then feeing themselue's deliuered from this miserable bondage, by the grace and benefite of Lucullus, thought with themselves they were not onely taken out of prison, but reviued & turned againe vnto a second life. There was also taken one of king Mithridates sisters called Niffa, whole taking fell out profitable for her: because all Mithridates other wines and fisters whom they placed farthest off, as out of all danger (& sent into a country of greatest safety, neare VINO the city of PHARNACIA) died pitifully, and were miserably slaine. For Mithridates sentone of the groomes of his prinie chamber vnto them, called Bacchides, to bring them word that they must al dic. Amongs many other noble Ladies, there were two of the kings sisters, called Roxane and Statira, which were forty yeares old apecce, and yet had never bene married; and two of his wives also whom he had maried, both of the country of Ionia, the one called Berenice, borne in the Ile of Chio, and the other Monime, in the city of Miletvin. Monime, the was very famous amongst the Grecians: for notwithstanding king Mithridates importunate dealing being far in loue with her, in fo much as he fent her fifteene thousand crownes at one time, yet she would neuer giue care vnto his fuite, vntill fuch time as the mariage was agreed vpon betweene them.& that he had fent her his Diademe or royall band, and called her by the name and title of Queene. This poore lady after the mariage of this barbarous king, had long lined a wofull life, bewailing continually her accurfed beauty, that in flead of a husband, had procured her a master. & in stead of the matrimonial company which a noble woman should enjoy, had gotten her a gard & garrison of barbarous men, that kept her as a prisoner, farrefrom the sweete country of GRECEIN change whereof, she had but a dreame and shadow of the hoped goods she looked for, having vnfortunately left them within her owne country she happily enjoyed before. Now when this Bacchides was come vntothem, and had commanded them from the king to chuse what manner The courage of death they would, and which every one of them thought most easie, and least paincfull: Ale of Monime, nime pluckt off the royall band from her head, and tying it on a knot about her necke, hung her felfe, but the band not being ftrong enough, brake incontinently. Whereupon she cryed out O curfed and wicked tiffue, wilt thou not yet ferue me to end my forrowfull dayes? And speaking Monime her these words, cast it on the ground, and spit vpon it, & held out her throate to Eachides to be cut asunder. The other, Berenice, she took a cup full of poyso, her mother being present, who prayed her to let her haue halfe, the which she did, and they dranke it off betweene them. The force of the poylon was strong enough to kill the old mother weake with age, but not so quickly to deffroy the daughter, because shee had not taken that proportion which would have served her turne, but drew out the paines of her death in length, vntill fuch time as Bacchides hasting to difpatch her, she in the end did strangle her selfe. As for the Kings two sisters, Roxane and Statira, which were virgins yet vnmaried, they fay, that one of them also dranke poyson, cursing and detesting the cruelty of her brother: howbeit Statira gaue neuer an ill word, nor was faint harted of Stating, or forrowfull to die but cotrarily did commend & thank her brother highly that seeing himself in danger, had not yet forgotten them, but was carefull to cause them die, before they should fall as flaues into the hands of their enemies, and before they could come to dishonour them, or do them villanic. These pitifull misfortunes went to Lucullus heart, who was courteous and gentle of nature; neuerthelesse he went on farther, still following Mithridates at the heeles; vnto the citic of TALAVRA. And there understanding that he was fled foure dayes before unto Tieranes in Armenia, returned backe againe, having first subdued the Chaldeans, and the Tiba-RENIANS, taken ARMENIA the leffe, and brought the cities, castles and strong places vnto his obedience. That done, he sent Appius Clodius vnto king Tigranes to summon him to deliuer Appius Clodius Atthridates vnto him: and himselfe tooke his journey towards the city of Amisvs, which diusent rate Tigra. was yet belieged. The cause why this siege continued so long, was the sufficiency & great expe-nession rience of the Captaine that kept it for the king, called Callimachus, who vnderstood to well how Callimathus all forts of engines of batterie were to bevsed, and was so subtill besides in all inventions that governor of might serue to desenda place besieged, as he troubled the Romaines much in this attempt; amuse. but afterwards he was not onely met withall, and payed home for all his labour, but also outreached by Lucullus for all his finenesse. For where before he had alwaies vied to found the retreate at a certaine houre, and to call his men backe from the affault to rest them: one day he brake that order on the fudden, and comming to affault the wall, at the first charge wanne a wan down pecce of it, beforethose within could come in time to resist them. Callimachus seeing that, and fus. knowing it was now vnpossible to keepe the city any longer, forsooke it. But before his departing he set thecity on fire, either for malice to the Romaines, because he would not they calling. should enrich themselves with the sacke of so great a city: or else for a policie of warre to have the special to the special the more leisure to fauchimselse, and slie. For no man gaue eye to them that sled by sea, be- dmiss. cause the slame was so great, that it dispersed it selfe even to the very wals, and the ROMAINE & finish fouldiers, they onely prepared to spoyle. Lucullus seeing the fire without, had compassion of Lucullus the city within, and would gladly have holpen it, and for the purpose prayed the souldiers quickly to quench it: but not a man would hearken to him, every one gaping after the spoile, wardsthe making great noyfe with clashing of harnesse, and being very loude besides otherwise, till at wife. the length enforced thereunto, he gaue the city wholly to spoyle, hoping thereby to faue the houses from fire, but it fell out cleane contrarie. For the fouldiers themselues in seeking all about with torches and linkes lighted, to fee if any thing were hidden, they fet a number of houfes on fire. So as Lucullus comming into the city the next morning, and feeing the great defolationthe fire had made, fella-weeping, faying vnto his familiar friends about him: he had oftentimes before thought Sylla happie, how beit he neuer wondred more at his good fortune, then that day had a for sylla field be defined as for the first syllage. that day he did. For, sylla faid he, defired to faue the city of ATHENS, the gods granted him that fauour that he might do it; but I that would faine follow him therein, and faue this city, fortune thwarting my defire, hath brought me to the reputation of Mummius, that caused Corint to be burnt. Neuertheleffe he did his best indeuour at that time to helpe the poore city again. For touching the fire, euen immediatly after it was taken, by Gods prouidence there fell a shower of raine as it was newly kindled, that quenched it: and twenthus felfe before he left the city made agreat number of the houses which were spoyled by fire, to be built vp againe, and courteously received all the inhabitants that were fled, befides them he placed other GRECIANS there alfo, that were willing to dwell amongst them, and increased the bounds and confines of the city which he gaue them, one hundred and twenty furlongs in the countrey. This city was a colonic of the Athenians, who had built and founded it, in the time that their Empire flourifled, and that they ruled the seas: by reason whereof, many flying the tyrannie of Aristian. went to dwell there, and were made free of the city, as the naturall inhabitants of the same. This good hap fell vponthem, that for faking their owne goods, they went to possesse and enjoy the goods of other men: but the very citizens of Athens it selfe that had escaped from this great desolation, Lucullus clothed them well, and gaue them two hundred Drachmas apeece, Tyrannien and fent them againe into their countrey. Tyrannion the Grammarian was taken at that time, the grange whom Murena begged of Lucullus: and Lucullus having granted him vnto him, he made him marian ta free, wherein he dealt very discourteously, and did much abuse Lucullus liberality and gift vnto him. For inbestowing this prisoner vpon him, who was a famous learned man, he did not meane Murana should take him for a bondman, whereby he should need afterwards to make him free. For seeming to make him free, and restore him to liberty, was no more then to take that freedome and libertie from him, which he had from his birth. But in many other things, and not in that onely, Murena laid himselse open to the world, that he had not all the parts a worthy Captaine should have in him. When Lucullus departed from Amrsvs, he went to visite the cities of Asia, to the end that whilest he was not now occupied with warres, they might haue fome refreshing of lawes and instice. For, by reason that law was not executed of long time in Asia, the poore country was fo afflicted and oppressed with so many cuils and miseries. as no man liuing would feant beleeue, nor any tongue can well declare. For, the extreme and horrible couctousnesse of the farmers, customers, and Romaine vsurers, did not only denoure it, but also kept it in such bondage and thraldome, that particularly the poore fathers were driuen to fell their goodly yong fonnes and daughters in mariage, to pay the interest and vsurie of the money which they had borrowed to discharge their fines withall; and publikely the tables dedicated vinto the temples, the statues of their gods, and other church iewels; and yet in the end, they themselves were also to be judged bondmen and saues to their cruell creditors, to weare out their bodies in miserable servitude. And yet the worst of all was, the paine they put them to before they were so condemned for they imprisoned them, set them on the racke, tor. mented them upon a little brasen horse, set them in the stockes, made them stand naked in the greatest heate of sommer, and on the ice in the deepest of winter, so as that bondage seemed you to them are liefe of their miseries, and a rest of their torments. Lucultus found the cities of Asia full of such oppressions, but in a short time after he deliuered them all that were wrongfully tormented. For first he tooke order, they should account for the viurie that was payed monethly. the hundred part of the principall debt onely, and no more. Secondly, he cut off all viuries that passed the principall. Thirdly, which was the greatest matter of all, he ordained that the creditor and yourer should enjoy the fourth part of the profits and reuenues of his debter. And hether ioyned vsurie with the principall, that is to fay, tooke vsurie vpon vsury, should lose the whole. So that by this order, all debes were payed in lesse then four eyeares, and the owners lands and revenues fet cleare of all maner payments. This furcharge of viviries, came of the twenty thou. fand talents, wherein Sylla had condemned the country of Asia: the which fummethey had payed twife before vnto the farmers and collectors of the Romains, who had raifed it, still heaping vfurie vpon vfurie to the fumme of fixfcore thousand talants. Wherefore these collectors and farmers ranne to Rome, and cryed out vpon Lucullus, faying, that he did them the greatest twrong that could be: & by meanes of mony, they procured certaine of the comon counfellors to speake against him: which they might easily do because they had divers of their names in their books that dealt in the affaires of the comonwealth of Rom B. But Lucullus was not only beloued of those countries whom he did good vnto, but was wished for and defired also of others, who thought the countries happie that might have fuch a governour. Now for Appius Clodius, whom Lucullus had fent before from TALAVRA Unto king Tigranes in ARMENIA, & whose fifter atthat time was Lucullus wife: he first tooke certaine of the kings men for guides, who of very malice guided him through the high courty, making him fetch a great compasse about, by many daies iourneys spent in vaine: vntill such time as one of his infranchized bondmen that was borne in Syria, taught him the right way. Whereupon he discharged these barbarous guides, and leauing the wrong wayes they had led him, within few dayes past ouer the river of Euphrates, and arrived in the city of Antioch, furnamed Eridaphne. Where he had commandement to abide Tigranes returne, who was then in the country of Phoenicia, where he fubdued certaine cities, and had some other yet to conquer. Appius in the meane time wan secretly divers of the princes & noble men, that obeyed this ARMENIAN king but for feare, by force, & against their wils, amongst whom was Zarbienus, king of the prouince of Gordiana; and promised the aide of Lucullus also to many of the cities that fent vnto him (which had not long before bene fubdued and brought into bondage) to whom neuerthelesse he gaue in expresse charge, that for the time they should not once stirre, nor alter any thing. For the rule of these ARMENIANS was intollerable to the Grecians, and specially the pride and arrogancie of the king. Who, by reason of his great prosperity, was growne to such pride and presumption, that what souer men did commonly effecte best, and make most reckoning of, he would not onely haue it, and vie it as his owne but also tooke it that all was made for himselfe whatsoener; and this great our weening grew, by reason of fortunes speciall grace and fauour towards him. For at the beginning he had but verie little, and yet with this little (which few made reckoning of) he conquered many great nations, and plucked downethe power of the Persians as much as any man that ever was before him. He replenished the countrey of Mesopotamia with Grecian inhabitants, which he brought by force out of Ciricia and Cappadecia, compelling them to inhabite there. He made the Arrabian's change their maner of living, who are otherwife called the Scenifes, as much to fay, as tent dwellers, because they are vagrant people that dwell in no other houses but tents, which they euer vse to carrie with them; and brought them out of their naturall countrey, and made them follow him, vsing them for his commoditie in trade of merchandize. There were euer many kings in his court that waited on him: but amongst others, he had foure kings that waited continually on his person as his footemen: for when he rode abroade any whither, they ranne by his stirrop in their shirts. And when he was fet in his chaire of state to give audience, they stood on their feete about his chaire holding their hands together, which countenance shewed the most manifest confession and tokens of bondage that they could doe vnto him: as if they had shewed thereby that they resigned all their liberty, and offered their bodies vnto their Lord and master, more ready to soften, when their liberty, and offered their bodies vnto their Lord and master, more ready to suffer, then proceedany thing to do. Notwithstanding, Appius Clodius being nothing abashed nor feared with all this tracical popular when and inner was given him told king Tigrange holdly to his fore Ambassa. this tragicall pompe, when audience was given him, told king Tigranes boldly to his face, dour rate that he was come to carry king Mithridates away with him, who was due to the triumph of Lis. Tigrans. cullus: and therefore did fummon him to deliuer that king into his hands, or elfe that he proclaimed warres vpon himselfe. They that were present at this summons, knew well inough that Tigranes (although he fet a good countenance on the matter openly with a faint counterfeit laughing) yet hearing these words so boldly and gallantly spoken out of this young mans mouth, was galled to the quicke, and hit at the heart. For Tigranes having reigned (or to fay better, tyrannically gouerned) fine and twentie yeares space, had neuer heardany bold or franke speech but that. Notwithtlanding, he answered Appins, that he would not deliver Mithridates, and if the Romaines made warres with him, that he would defend himfelfe. And being greatly offended that Lucullus in his letters gaue him not the title, King of kings, but onely king simply in the letters he wrote backe to Lucullus againe, he did not so much as vouchsafe to call him Capcaine onely. But when Appius tooke his leaue, he fent him goodly rich presents, which he refused. Whereupon the king fent others againe vnto him, of the which Appius Appius abtooke a cup onely, because the king should not thinke he refused ought of anger, or ill will: from the and so freeding all the restraction was him medianted before the sound of the sound and so fending all the rest againe vnto him, made great haste to returne to his Captaine Lucul. king of gifts lus. Now Tigranes before that time would not once see king Mathridates his so neare kinseman, who by fortune of warres had loft fo puiffant and great a kingdome, but proudly kept him vnder, in fennie, marish and vnwholesome grounds, without any honour giuen vnto him, asifhe had bene a very prisoner indeed: how beit then he sent for him honourably, and received him with great courtefie. When they were neare together in the kings pallace, they talked femm with great courtene. When they were neare together in the kings parace, they tarked tecretly one with another, and excusing themselves, clearing all suspicious conceiued betweene and Mithelater them, to the great hurt of their feruants and friends, whom they burthened with all the occasion meeting. of vnkindnesse betweene them: amongst which number Metrodorus the Scepsian was one, a man excellently well learned, eloquent in speech, and one whom Mithridates so much loued and Metrodoesteemed, that they called him the kings father. Mithridates at the beginning of his wars had sent and death. him Ambassadour vnto Tigranes, to pray aide of him against the ROMAINES. At which time Tigranes faid vnto him: but what fayest thouto it Metrodorus: what advice wilt thou give me? Metrodorus either because he had regard vnto Tigranes profite, or else because he was loth Mithridates should escape, answered him againe: As Ambassadour, ô King, I would wish you should do it: but as a Counsellour, that you should not doe it. Tigranes now reported this speech vnto Mishridates, not thinking he would have hurt Metrodorus for it, though indeed he presently put him to death vpon it. Whereat Tigranes was heartily sorie, and repented him greatly to hauctold him so much, although he was not altogether the occasion of his casting away, having but onely revived Mithridates evill will before conceived against him: for he had bornehim dilpleasure of a long time, as appeared amongst his secret papers and writings that Amphira. were taken from him, where he had ordained that Metrodorus should be put to death: but in reter an Orator of Acompence thereof Tigranes buried his body honourably, sparing no cost at all vnto the dead body of him, whom living he had betrayed. There died in King Tigranes Court also an Orator mking called Amphicrates, if he deserve that mention should be made of him, for the city of ATHENS court. fake wherin he was borne: for it is faid, that when he was banished out of his country, he fled into the city of Selevila, which standeth vponthe river of Tigris. When the inhabitants of the ding fame praied him to teach them the Art of Eloquence in their country, he wold not youch fafe it, Tigris, leane the wars, because he would make himselfe great with the cost and perill of the commonwealth. These crying counsellers in the end obtained their purpose, which was: to call home

From thence he went vnto Cleopatra, Mithridates daughter, and king Tigranes wife, where he was quickly suspected and accused: so that he was forbidden to frequent the GRECIANS company any more, which grieued him so much that he famished himselfe to death, and would eate no meate. And that man was also very honourably buried by the Queene Cleopatra, neare vnto a place called Sapha, as they call it in that countrey. Now when Lucallus had quieted all things in Asia, and had established good lawes among them, he was not carelesse also of games and pleasant pastimes, but while he was at leisure in the city of Ephesvs, he made many games, feasts, wrestlings, and fence-playes at the sharpe for ioy of his victory, delighting all the cities of Asia with them; the which in recompence thereof did institute a solemne teast also in the honour of him, which they called Lucullea, and did celebrate it with great ioy, shewing a true and no fained friendship and good will towards him, which pleafed him better, and was more to his contentation, then all the honour they could deuise to give him. But after that Appius Clodeus was returned from his Ambassade, and had told Lucullus that he must make warres with Tigranes: Lucullus went back againe vnto the realme of Pontvs, where he tooke his army which he had left in garrison, and brought it before the city of Sinope to lay fiege vnto it, or rather to befiege certaine City CIANS that were gotten into the city in the behalfe of Mitbridates. But when they faw Lucullus come against them, they slue a great number of the citizens, and setting fire on the city, sled their way by night, Lucullus being aducrtifed of it, entred the city, put eight thousand of the Cilirope in Po- cians to the fword which he found there, and restored the natural citizens and inhabitants thereof to all that was theirs. But the originall cause that made him to be carefull to preserue the city, was this vision he had. He thought in his nights dreame that one came to him, and faid: goe a little farther Lucullus, for Autolyeus commeth, who is desirous to speake with thee. This dreame awaked him, but being awake could not imagine what the vision meant. It was the felf fameday on the which he tooke the citie of SINOPE, where following the CILICIANS that escapedby flying, he found an image lying on the ground vpon the sea side; which the CILICIAN'S would haue carried away: but they were taken and followed fo neare, that they had no leifure to flinit. This flatue (as it is reported) was one of the good lieft and notableft workes of Sthenis the image grauer. And some say it was the image of Autolyous, who founded the city of SINOPE. For Autolyeus was one of the princes that went out of Thessalle with Hercules to go against the AMAZONE s, and he was the some of Deimachus. And they report that at the returne from this voyage, the ship in the which Autolycus was imbarked, with Demoleon and Phlogius, made shipwracke vpon arocke of the coast of Cherronesvs, where she was cast away: howbeitthat he and his men scaping with all their furniture, came to the city of Sinope, which he took from who fo cal. certaine Syrians, who came (as they fay) of one Syria the fonne of Apollo, and of the nymph led.

Lucullus vnderstanding this matter, called a faying of Sylla to minde. which he wrote in his commentaries: that nothing is more certaine, nor that we may give more credite vnto, then that which is fignified to vs by dreames. In the meane feafon he was aduertised that Tigranes and Mithridates were ready to come downe into LYCAONIA and CI-LICIA, because they might first enter As IA. Lucullus maruelled much at Tigranes counsell, that fithence he was minded to war with the Romaines, he did not vie Mithridates aid in his wars at fuch time, as when he was in his best strength & force: and that he did not then loyne his power with Mithridates, rather then fuffer him to be destroyed and overthrowne, and afterwards with a cold hope go now to begin a new warre, hazarding himselfe with those that could not helpe themselues. While these things passed in this fort, Machares king Mithridates sonne, that kept the realme of Bosphorys, sent a crowne of gold vnto Lucullus, of the weight of a thousand crownes, praying him that he would name him a friend and confederate of the Romaines. Whereupon Lucullus thought he was then at the very last end of his first warre, and leaving Sornatius with fixe thousand mento keepe the realme of Pontvs, he departed with twelve thousand footmen, and lesse then three thousand horsemen, to goe to the second warre. And herein all the world condemned him, and thought it too rash and light a part of him, to goe with fo fmall a company to fight with fo many warlike nations, and to put himselfe vnto the hazard of so many thousands of horsemen, in a maruellous large countrey, and of a wonderfull

There were a great number of the Armenians flaine in this ouer throw, and motaken. Those things having this successe, Lucullus went to the city of TIGRANGE RTA, the which he befieged round. In that city were a maruellous number of GRECIANS that had bin brought thither by force out of CILICIA, and many of the barbarous people also whom they had vied inthe like forcible manner, as they had done the ADIAD ENIANS, the ASSYRIANS, the GOR-DIÆNIANS, and the CAPPADOCIANS, whose townes and cities Tigranes had destroyed, and compelled them to come and inhabite there. By reason whereof, this city of TIGRANOCERTA was full of gold and filuer, of mettals, statues, tables and pictures, because every man (as well priuate, as Princes and Lords) studied to please the king, to enrich and beautifie this city, with all kinds of furniture and ornaments fit for the same. And hereupon Lucullus straighted the siege as much as he could, perswading himselfe that Tigranes would never suffer that it should be taken, but(though he had otherwise determined) yet for very anger would present him battell, therby to enforce him to raise his siege. And surely he gessed right, had it not bene that Mithridates had diffwaded him by expresse letters and messengers that he should inno case hazard battell, and perswaded him rather to cut off the victuals on al sides from the Romains with his horsemen. The felfe fame counfell and aduice did Taxiles (the Captaine whom Mithridates sent) gine him in his campe, and prayed him very earnestly, that he would not proue the inuincible force of the Romaines patiently hearkened to their reasons at the first; but when the Ar-MENIANS Were come, and all the force of the countrey befide, and the Gordianians, and that the kings of the MEDEs and of the ADIABENIANS were come also with all their power, and that on the other fide there came a maruellous great host of the Arabians that dwell vpon the sea of Babylon, and a multitude of the Albanian's from the Caspian sea, and of the In ERIANS their neighbours, besides a great company of free people living without a king, that dwell by the river of Araxes, some coming freely to do him pleasure, other for their pensions and pay which he gaue them: then was there none other talke neither at his table, nor in councell, but of affured hope of victory, and of great brags and barbarous threatnings, fo that Taxiles was in great danger of himfelfe, because he was against the determination taken in councell for giuing of the battell. Now was it thought that Mithridates did enuie the glorie of king Tigranes, and therefore did thus diffwade him from battell. For which respect Tigranes would not formuch as tarrie for him, and because also Mithridates should have no part of the honour of his victory but went into the field with all his great army vanting amongst his familiars as they report, that nothing grieued him but one, that he should fight with Lucallus alone, and not with all other ROMAINE Captaines.' Now this brauerie was not fo fond, nor fo farre out of square, but that there was great likelihood of it when he saw so many sundry nations about him, so many kings that followed him, fo many battels of armed footemen, and fo many thousands of horsemen. For he had in his armie of bow-men and slings onely, twenty thousand: fine and fif- Tigrates ty thousand horsemen, whereof seuenteene thousand men of armes, armed from top to toe; as whole ar-Lucullus himselfe wrote vnto the Senate: and an hundred & fifty thousand armed footmen, deuidedby enfignes and squadrons: of pyoners, carpenters, masons, and such other kind of handi-threses crafts men, to plaine waics, to make bridges to palle ouer riners, to flop freames, to cut wood, men, and to make such kind of workes, of this fort of people, the number of flue and thirty thousand, who followed in battel ray in the rereward of the army, making their campe seeme far greater, and by so much the more stronger. When Tigranes shewed on the top of mount Taurus, and that the y might plainely see his whole army from the city, and that himselfealso might easily difeerne Lucullus armie that besieged TIGRANOCERTA: the barbarous people that were within the city were lo glad of this fight, that they made wonderfull shouts of ioy, and great clapping ofhands, threatning the Romaines from their wals, and shewing them the army of the An-MENIANS. Lucullus in the meane time fate in councell to confider what was to be done: wherein some were of opinion that he should raise his siege, and go with his whole army vndeuided Lung. against Tigranes. But others liked northat he should leave so great a number of enemies at his gainst is backe, neither that he should raise his siege.. Lucullus made them answer, that neither of them grands both did counsell him well, but both together did counsell right. Whereupon he deuided his army, and left Murana at the fiege of Tigranocerta with fixe thousand men: and he with fourcand twenty cohorts (in the which were not about ten thousand armed footmen) and all his horsemen, with a thousand bowinen and slings, or thereabouts, went towards Tigranes, and camped in a goodly broad field by the rivers fide. The ROMAINES feemed but a handfull to Tigranes campe, so that for a while Tigranes parasites made but a May-game of them to sport withall. For some laughed them to scorne, other drew lots, and played away their part of the spoyles, as if they had already wonne the field : and every one of the kings and Captaines came and offered themselues to Tigranes, and besought him enery man for himselfe, that he would give him the honor alone to leade this battell, & that it would please him to sie by in some place to fee the sport. Tigranes then, because he would shew that he could be as pleasant as the rest, spake a thing knowne to enery man: If they come as Ambassadors (quoth he) they are very many: but if they come as enemies, they be but few. And thus they played vponthe Romaines, and tooke their pleasure of them at that time: but the next morning by breake of day, Lucullus brought all his men armed into the field, and put them in order of battel. Now the campe of the barbarous people lay on the other side of the river toward the East, and by chance the streame of the riner turned fodainly towards the West, where there was a better foord to passe ouer. Wherefore Lucullus marching with his army by the rivers fide, following the freame to meete with some foord, casting to get ouer, Tigranes thought he had marched away, & called for Taxiles, and said vnto him, laughing: Doest thou see Taxiles those goodly Romaine legions, whom thou praisest to be men so inuincible, how they slieaway now? Taxiles answered the king again: I would your good fortune (O king) might worke some miracle this day: for doubtlesse it were astrange thing that the Romaine's should flie. They are not wont to weare their braue coates and furniture vpontheir armour, when they meane onely but to march in the fields: neither do they carrie their shields and targets vncased, nor their burganets bare on their heads, as they doe at this present, having throwne away their seather cases and coverings. But out of doubt, this goodly furniture we fee to bright & glistring in our faces, is a manifest signe that they intend to fight, and that they march towards vs. Taxiles had no sooner spoken these words, but Lucullus in theview of his enemies, made his enfigne-bearer turne fodainely that caried the first Eagle, and the bands tooke their places to passe the river in order of battel. Then Tigranes secretly come to himselfe, as out of drunkennesse, cryed out aloud twise or thrise, come they then to vs. But then was there no small stirre and tumult, to put such a world of people in battell. The king Tigranes himselfevndertook to leade the middle battel, gaue the left wing vnto the king of the Adiab E- The order. NIANS, and the right vnto the king of the MEDES: in the which were the most part of the com- grand bar. pleate armed men, who made the first front of all the battell. But as Lucullus was ready to passe y tall. river, there were certaine of his Captaines that came vnto him, to wish him to take heede that he fought not that day, because it was one of those which the Romaines thought unfortunate, or rasein. and call them Atri, as to say, blacke: for upon one of those dayes, one Capio was overthrown in a material said.

fer battell with all his army by the CIMBRES. But Lucullus gaue them a prety answer againe. which is not forgotten to this day: I will make this a happy day (faid he) for the Romaines. It was the fixteenth day of the month of October. And so with those words encouraging his men, passed ouer the river, and went himselfethe foremost man, and marched directly towards his enemie, armed with an anima of fteele, made with scallop shels, shining like the Sunne, and vpon that an arming coate fringed round about, holding his fword drawne in his hand:to let his men vnderstand, that they must fodainly joyne with their enemies, and fight at the swords point that were not acquainted to fight but a farre off with shot and slings, and that he would so quick. ly winnethe distance of ground they had to march ere they could joyne, that they should have no ley sure to shoot. And furthermore, perceiuing that the strength of their men of armes (wher. of they made fo great account) was ranged in battell vnder a hill, the toppe whereof was very plaine and cuen, and the way vp the hill not passing foure furlongs trauell, & not very hardnor freepe to clime: he fent thither certaine horsemen of the THRACIANS and GAVLES which he had in pay, and commanded them to give a charge on the flancke to diforder them, and affav to cut their launces with their fwords. For all the strength of these men of armes consisteth in their launces, and they can do nothing of themselves, nor against their enemies, they are so heauily armed and loden: fo as it seemeth they are locked vp in their armour, as in an iron prison. And he himself therewithall taking two enfignes of footmen, strone also to gaine the top of the hill, his fouldiers following him hard at the heeles with a notable courage, because they saw him the foremost man trauelling on soote, and digging against the height of the hill. When he had gotten vp to the top, he stayed a little in the highest place he could finde, and cryed out with a loud voice: O companions, the victory is ours. And as he spakethose words, he led themagainst these men of armes, commanding them they should not meddle with throwing of their darts, but taking their fwords in their hands they should strike at their thighes and legs, because they have no other parts of their bodies naked. Howbeit, there was no neede of such fight, for they taried not the Romaines, but with great crying out turned their horse heads immediatly. and ran cowardly (themselues and their horses, heavie armed as they were) through the midst of the bands of their footmen, before they had striken one stroke. And thus were so many thoufands of men broken without any ftroke ftriken, or any man hurt, or one droppe of bloud feene to be spilt. But the great flaughter was when they began to flie, or (to say better) when they Tigranes. thought to flie; for they could not flie, they ranne fo one vpon anothers necke, by reason of the maruellous length & breadth of their battels. Tigranes, amongst the rest was one of the first that diflodged with a small company, and seeing his sonne running the same fortune, flying as himfelre did, tooke off his diademe or royall band from his head, and gaue it him weeping, comdiadem ta manding him to fauc himselfe as wel as he could by some other way. But the yong Princedurst ken by I.11not put it on his head, but gaue it to one of his trusty servants to keepe, who by chance was taken and brought vnto Lucullus: so that amongst the other spoyle and prisoners, there was taken Tigranes diadem. It is thought that there were flaine at this ouerthrow, aboue an hundred thoufand footmen, and very few of all the horsemen saued. On the ROMAINES side, there were about an hundred hurt, & fine flaine. Antiochus the Philosopher speaking of this battell in a treatise he made of the gods, writeth that the Sunne neuer saw the like ouerthrow. And strabe another Philosopher in a certaine abridgement he made of stories, said, that the Romaines were ashamed and laughed at themselues, that they had drawne their swords against such dastardly flaues. And Titus Liuius declarethalfo, that the ROMAINES were neuer in any battell with fo small a number of fighting men, against so great a multitude of enemies: for the conquerors were not in al the world thetwentieth part (nothing like) of those that were ouercome. Wherfore the oldest and best experienced Captaines of the Romain's did highly commend Lucullus, because he had ouercome two of the greatest & most mighty Princes of the world, by two fundry contrary meanes: the one by tract and delay, and the other by speed and swiftnesse. For he vndermined and confumed Mithridates by holding backe and delaying, at that time when all his strength was whole; and to the contrary he destroyed Tigranes with great speed and hast. And thus did he that which few Captaines could euer do that is, vsed delay of time to execute, and valiant expedition to winnethe victory. This was the cause why Mithridates made no hastero come to the battell, thinking still that Lucullus had vsed his wonted policie, to delay and give backe alwaies: and therefore he came by small journeyes vnto Tigranes campe. But meeting at the first with a few of the ARMENIAN sthat sled as he came on his way, like men that had bene frayed, he straight mistrusted the ouerthrow; but afterwards meeting greater troups of them naked, and fore wounded, then he knew how the matter went. So he went to fecke out Tigranes, whom he found alone, for faken of his men, and in very poore estate, yet did not he requite 71granes in adverfity with that pride and disdaine he had vsed him before in his misery: but lighted off his horse, to bewaile with him their common misfortune, and gaue him all his officers, and traine of a Kings court, that followed him to ferue him, comforting him, and exhorting him to pluck vp his heart again, and to be couragious thencefoorth. Hereupon they both leavied afreshthe whole force and power they could from all the parts of their dominion. In the meane feason, there fell out great sedition in the city of TIGRANOCERTA, betweenethe GRECIANS and the barbarous people: for the GRECIANS, they would have yeelded up the towne into Lu- Luculus cullus hands. Whereupon Lucullus gining an affault to the city at that very instant, wonne it, and tooke Tifeized vpon the kings treasure there, leaving al the rest to the spoile of the souldiers in the which, besides all other riches, there was eight thousand talents in ready money. And yet besides all that, he gaue of the spoyle that was wonne vpon the enemies, eight hundred Drachmaes vnto enery fouldier. And vnderstanding that there were diners musicians, common players, minstrels, and fuch kinde of people meete for feafts and sport, whom Tigranes had sent for thither from all parts, to dedicate the Theater he had made in this citie: he caused all them to serue at the sports and feasts of this victory. After the folemnization whereof, he sent the Grecians home againevnto their country, and gaue them money to defray their charges by the way, and the barbarous people also that were brought thither by force from their natiue coutries. And so it fortuned, that by the defolation and destruction of a city for faken, many others were built againe, and stored with people: because those cities had thereby recoursed their naturall inhabitants againe, who ener after did loue and honour Lucullus, as their benefactour and founder. All other things prospered also according to his vertue & merits. For Luculus liked better the praise that came of bounty, of iuftice, and of elemency, then that that came by force of martial proweffe & influence chiualry. For in deeds of armes, he faid his army partly deferued praife, and fortune also caried the helt part away burthe praise of the other was called the helt part away burthe praise of the other was called the helt part away burthe praise of the other was called the helt part away burthe praise of the other was called the helt part away burthe praise of the other was called the helt part away burthe praise of the other was called the helt part away burthe praise of the other was called the helt part away burthe praise of the other was called the helt part away burthe praise of the other was called the helt part away burther praise of the other was called the helt part away burther praise of the other was called the helt part away burther praise of the other was called the helt part away burther praise of the other was called the helt part away burther praise of the other was called the helt part away burther praise of the other was called the helt part away burther praise of the other was called the helt part away burther praise of the other was called the helt part away burther praise of the other was called the helt part away burther praise of the other was called the helt part away burther praise of the other was called the helt part away burther praise of the other was called the helt part away burther was called the helt part awa the best part away: but the praise of the other, was only due vnto himselfe. Whereby he shewed the valure of an excellent good man, well taught and trained vp in vertue; and so reaped the fruit of his worthy deferts. For by those good parts, he wan y hearts of the barbarous people in such fort, that the Kings of the ARABIANS came of good will to put themselves and their goods into his hands. So did the natio of the Sophenian salfo yeeld themselves vnto him. The Gordia-NIANS, in like manner, they liked Lucullus fo well, that they would willingly haue for faken their cities, houses and country, to follow him with their wives and children, vpon this occasion: Zarbienus King of these Gordi Enians, as we have recited before, had privily entred amiric with Lucullus, by meanes of Appius Clodius, who could no longer away with the tyrannie of Tigranes. This practise was bewrayed vnto Tigranes, who put Zarbienus, his wife & children to death, be- zarbienus forethe Romaine's mainearmy came into the courty of Armenia. Howbeit Lucullus did not king of the forget it but possing through this Realma cause him years would finance be beginned to b forget it, but passing through this Realme, gaue him very royall funerals: for having heaped vpa ans staine huge pile of wood, sumptuously set out with cloth of gold and filuer, and other rich spoiles of by Tigrants Tigranes: he himselfe in person would needes set it on fire, and made the funerall effusions and accustomed sprinklings at funerals, with his friends & kinsmen, doing him this honor, as to call him friend and confederate of the ROMAINE people, & appointed also a great fumme of mony besides to creet a sumptuous tombe for him. For they found great store of gold & silver in the Kings castell, and there was plenty of prouision also of 300000. bushels of wheate: the which did enrich his fouldiers maruelloufly, and made Lucullus to be wondred at, that having received not one Drachma from the sparing coffers at Rome, he had notwithstanding made the war entertaine it selfe. About the selfe same time also, the king of the PARTHIANS sent Ambassadors vnto him, to offer him friendship and alliance: which Lucullus willingly accepted, and sent Ambaffadours to him also of acceptation, who made report to Lucullus at their returne, that the King of the PARTHIANS stood doubtfull how to resolute which part he should take, and that secreily he fent vinto Tigranes, to aske the Realme of ME sopotamia for his reward to aide him against the Romaines. Lucullus being truly enformed of the king of Parthiaes double dealing, determined to leaue Tigranes & Mithridates, as two enemies wearied and ouercome, & a litleto proue the force and power of the PARTHIANS by making warres upon them, thinking it great honour vnto him, if he might discomfit and ouerthrow three so mighty kings, one after another, like a valiant conquerour that had ouercome three famous Captaines together, and had passed through the countries of three of the greatest Princes vnder the Sunne, alwaies a conquerour, and neuer conquered. Hereupon he wrote immediatly vnto Sornatius, and other of his Captaines which he had left to keepe the realme of Pontvs, that they should repaire to him with all speed with the bands they had under their charge, for that he was determined to depart out of the countrey of Gordi Ena, togo against the Parthians: howbeit his purpose alteredby oc. casion. For his Lieutenants that had many times before found their souldiers mutinous, and rebelling at their commandements, knew plainely then their cankred stomackes, and incorrigible disobedience. For they could not possibly get them from thence, by any compulsion or perfwafions they could vse: but contrarily they cried out, and told him plainely, that they would no longer tarrie where they were, but would go home to their countrey, and leave the Realme of Pontvs without guard or garrison at al. And farther, that worst of al was, when these newes were brought to Lucullus campe, they gaue a full example of boldnesse to his fouldiers there, to mutine in like fort, having good will and disposition thereunto of themselves before. For their purses being full, and they acquainted with finenesse, were become so dull and lazie, that they could endure no paines nor hardnesse of warres, but desired to line in all idlenesse and ease. And hearing the report of their fellowes floutnes, called them luftie laddes, faying, they must needs take the like course, and do as they taught them, vanting of their good service of long time done. which well deserved leave now to depart home with safety, and thenceforth take their rest. Lu. cullus hearing of this their talke, and many other their words, worse and fuller of sedition then these, brake off his enterprise against the PARTHIANS, and went againe in the midst of Sommer to meet with Tigranes. But when he was come to the top of mount Taurus, it grieued him to fee the fields to full of wheate yet flanding, which came by the feafon of the yeare, and coldnesse of the ayre, being so flacke & flow in all those parts. Neuerthelesse, he came down einto the vally, & at two or three skirmishes ouerthrew the ARMENIANS, that ventured to abide his comming downe: and ranne ouer all the valley, and destroyed the whole country without let or stoppe of any man, taking away the prouision of come that was made for Tigranes campe; whereby he ftraighted his enemics vnto that neede and necessity of victuals which himselfe feared, and yet ceassed not to prouoke them (by all other meanes) to come to battell: sometime inclosing their campe with trenches about, as if he meant to famish them: sometime againe destroying and spoiling the whole countrey before their face. But because they had so oft bene discomfited, they would no more stirre, nor once moue against him. Lucullus perceiving that, in the end raised his campe, and went and laid fiege vnto ARTAXATA, the chiefe city of the kingdome of ARMENIA, in the which were Tigranes lawfull wines and young children, hoping that Tigranes would rather hazard another battel, the suffer that city to be lost. It is said, that Hannibal of Carthage (after king Antiochus was ouerthrowne in battell by the Romain Es) went vnto king Artaxes, whom he taught many necessarie and profitable things for his Realme, & amongst others, considering that one of the goodliest & pleasantest places of all his kingdome lay waste, and no reckoning made of it, drew a plot of acity, brought the king thither, and caused it to be built and inhabited. The king liked his deuice maruellous well, and prayed him to take the charge vpon him to see the work finished. And thus was this noble & famous city built, and called after the kings name, ARTAXATA: and held euer after the reputation of the chiefest place of the whole realme of ARMENIA. Tigranes being aduertised that Lucullus went to lay siege therunto, could not endure it, but went with all his armie to follow the Romaines, and the fourth day came and camped Arfanias fi. hard by them: infomuch as there was but the river of Arfanias betweene them, which the Ro-MAINES of necessity must passe ouer to go to ARTAXATA. Lucullus hauing first sacrificed vnto the gods, affuring himselfe of the victory, as if he had it alreadie in his hands, made/his armic passe ouer in order of battell, putting twelue cohorts in the front, and the other behind, fearing lest the enemies having a great number of men of armes should environ them at their backes. They had against them also the Mardian bowmen on horseback, & the IBERIANS with their lances, in whom Tigranes trusted more then in any other, as in the best fouldiers he hadin pay: & yet for all that they did no notable feruice. For when they had skirmished but a litle with the horsemen of the Romaines, they durst not tarie the legionaries or sootbands that came behind them, but dispersed themselves, some slying one way, some another, which enticed the Ro-

MAINE horseme to follow the chase. But when the men of armes that were about Tigranes perfon, faw the horsemen so scattered abroad, they began straight to breake vpon the footmen. Lucullus feeing the great multitude of them, and how passingly they were armed and appointed, being somewhat afraid therof: sent in hast to call in his horsemen that followed the chase, and in the meane time himselfe marched foremost, against these Lords and Satrapes, which were in the this place, front before him with all the nobility of their hoaft, whom he put in fuch a feare, that before he against the could come to hand strokes, they all turned taile and fled. There were three kings ranged in battell one hardby another, howbeit of the three, he that fled most shamefully and cowardly, was are people Mithridates king of Pontys, who had not the heart so much as to abide the cries of the Ro-MAINES. The chafe was very long: for it continued all night, vntill fuch time as the Romaines were wearied with killing taking of prisoners, & packing vp of all kinds of spoiles. Titus Linius baned. faith, that there were flaine moe men in the first battell, but greater personages in the second: & Lucullus maketh Tithe chiefe of the enemies were all taken. After this battell Lucullus heart being bigge, and fea-granes file ring nothing, determined to go farther into the country, even vtterly to destroy this barbarous egaine. king. But in the time of the equinoctiall autumne (when the weather waxed more bitter then any man would in that season haue thought) there sell out so great a cold, that for the most part, it did nothing but fnow: and if the element did any thing cleare, then froze it so hard, that the horsecould come by no water, the rivers were so extremely congealed with ice. And there could no man passe ouer by foord: for they did not so soone enter, but the ice brake and cut the veines and finewes of the horse legs afunder, they were so hard and thicke withall. And furthermore the countrey being full of trees, woods and forests, and the waies very narrow, not being able to passe by the fields, they were through wet with snow that fel vponthem; and when they came to their lodging, then it was worfe, for there they were constrained to lye in softand moist places. And therefore the foldiers had followed but few daies after this battell, but they refufed to go any further. And first they sent their Colonels and Captaines to intreate Lucullus to leane offthis journey. Afterwards they gathered together more boldly in troupes, and in the night time began to murmure and groine in their tents (which is a certaine figne and token of a mutinous armic, that hath a mind to rebell against their Generall) although that Lucullus vied all gentleperswassions to win them with patience to abide this journey, at the least, till time they might takethecity of CARTHAGE in ARMENIA: to the end they might there destroy the worke and memory of the greatest enemy that ever the ROMAINES had in the world, meaning Hannibal. But when he faw all this would not prevaile, he brought them back againe, & paffed ouer mount Taurus another way, and came downe into the country called My GDON 1A, a very hot and fertilefoile, where there is a great city, and maruelloufly replenished with inhabitants: who call it dovid NISIBIS, and the GRECIANS call it ANTIOCH OF MYGDONIA. In that city Gouras was Go- Ruffly, nernor, who was Tigranes ownebrother: but for experience in engines of battery, and for fufficiencic and skill in fuch matters, there was Callimachus alfo, he that io maruelloufly troubled Lacing of sing. cullus before at the fiege of the city of AMISVS. Lucullus placing his campe before this city befieged the same by alfuch meanes as might enforce it, & that so valiantly, that in very short time Lucultus he tooke it by affault. And as for Gouras, who submitted himselfe to Lucullus mercy, he was very taketh Wittenfly intreated. But for Calling thus he would not once heare him speake no with Ganding fibit by ascurteoully intreated. But for Callimachus, he would not once heare him speake, not with standing faith. that he promised, if they would sauc his life, he would tell them of coffers full of great treasure hidden, which no man knew but himselfe onely. But Lucullus commanded them to bring him with gyues to receive the punishment he had instly deserved, for setting the city of Amisvs on consudid fire, and taking from him the meane to show the GRECIANS his goodnes, affection & liberality feetherity towards them. Vntill this present time, it might be truly said, that good fortune cuer sauoured & of smiles followed Lucullus in all his enterprifes and affaires: but from that time forwards, it was quickly feene that the fauourable blast of fortune failed him, he did all his things with so great paine, and The altera all that he did, fell out contrary vnto him, and to very ill purpose, Indeed he dideuer shew the valiancie parience & great courage that should be in a valiant General or Lineapone of an author culturgood liancie, patience, & great courage that should be in a valiant Generall, or Lieutenant of an army. fortune. But his exploits and doings had neuer after, that easie grace, nor shining glory they were wont to haue:but to the contrary, he was like to haue lost all that he had won before, through the misfortunes that fell vpon him, and for the bralles and vaine contention he had with his people to no Lucullus purpose. But the worst was, that they made himselfethe onely author of all these easies as because becould not or would not entertaine the goodwill of the multimade of his souldiers a chinting he could not, or would not entertaine the goodwill of the multitude of his fouldiers: thinking time that what socuera Generall, or any other officer of state or calling doth to please and content them he harli vinder his charge, is to dishonour himselfe, and to give cause vinto his souldiers to despise his authority. But that which made most against him was this: that he gaue no estimarion to gentlemen, and men of like quality to himselfe, but disdained them, and thought them vnworthy to be equall with him. For these they say were his faults and imperfections, but otherwife that he wanted no vertues, nor generall gifts and good conditions that could be poffible wished for or defired. For he was a tall gentleman, of goodly presence, well spoken, wife and difcreete, as well in matters of gouernement, as in warres: and as well to perswade the people in peace, as to encourage his fouldiers in warre. Saluft writeth of him, that his fouldiers beganto mislike with him, even from the first entrie into these warres, because he made them lie out two winters together in the field, one after another: the one before the city of C121cvs, & the other before the city of AMISVS. And cuen as much did the other winters following vexe and trou. ble them: for either they lay in their enemies countrey, or else if they lay in their friends, yethe made them campe abroad in the field, and shrowd themselves in their tents: for Lucullus never entred with his army into any city or confederate towne of GRECE. Now if the fouldiers of themselves misliked Lucullus, the Oratours at Rome that were his enemies, and enuied his prof. er jammer, perity and glory, gaue them yet greater occasions to mutine against him. For they continually accused him to the people in their orations, that he drew out his war in length, purposely because he would alwaics have occasion to rule, and means to get, having in his hands in manerall CILICIA, ASIA, BITHYNIA, PAPHLAGONIA, GALATIA, PONTVS, ARMENIA, and all the provinces and regions as farre as to the river of Phasis: and yet he had not long before spoiled the princely houses of Tigranes, as if he had bene sent thither only to sacke and spoile, and note destroy and ouercome those kings. And they say that it was Lucius Quintius, one of the Prators that spake these words. It was he also that most moued the people to take order that Lucullus should be called home, and other fent to succeed him in the charge and government of the countries he had subdued. By the selfe same meane it was also ordained, that divers which were under his charge, should be dispenced with all for their oathes, and licenced to leaue the warres when they thought good. But befides these & such like great causes, there was yet another moredan. gerous plague, and that most ouerthrew Lucullus proceedings, passing all the other euils being put together: and that was Publim Clodius, a wicked, licencious, and a harebrained man. He was Lucullus wives brother, and she was so light of her body, that Clodius her brother was accused of incontinencie with her. This Glodius being at that time in Lucullus camp, caried not that estima. tion and credit he thought himselfe worthy of. For he tooke himselfe equal with the best, and would needes have bene holden for chiefe: when indeed there were many of far better defert, he being noted both for a vicious and ill disposed person. Whereupon he began for spiteto fuborne the band called FIMERIANS, and to stirre them vp against Lucallus, lowing sweet and plea fant words among ft the foldiers, which being wonted thereunto, looked fil to be flattered. For they were those whom Fimbria had procured to kill the Consull Flaceus, and chusehim in his ftead for their Captaine. By reason wherof they gaue good care to Clodius words, and called him a noble captaine, and a louer of fouldiers. For when he spake vnto them, he made as though he had pitied them, for that they should neuer see an end of their great paines and warres, but should miserably consume their daies in fighting continually, sometime with one nation, and formetime with another: and that they wandred through all the countries of the world, receiuing no worthy rewardof fo long and painefull feruice, feruing onely to guard Lucullus carts & cammels loden with plate and veffels of gold and filuer, and other precious stones. Wherethe fouldiers that had ferued under Pompey, took now their ease at home in their country with their wines and children, and were landed men, dwelling in goodly faire cities, as rich burgesses and wealthy citizens; and yet they had not driven Mithridates and Tigranes out of their kingdomes, into descriplaces vnhabitable, nor had destroyed the Princely houses of Asia, but only made a little warre in Spaine against those that were banished, and in Italie against fugitive slaves. Shall we then, said he, carie harnesse on our backes all the dayes of our life? Is it not better that we which are escaped vntill this present, reserve our sclues, our bodies and lives for that noble Captaine, who effeemeth the greatest honour and glory he can atchieue vnto, is to make his soldiers rich that serue vnder him? Lucullus army was so seduced and corrupted with these mutinous and seditious accusations, that the souldiers would no longer follow him, neither against

Tigranes, nor against Mithridates: who went presently out of ARMENTA into his realme of Pon-TVS, and began to conquer it again, whileft the ROMAINE fouldiers mutining against their General, remained idle in the province of Gordian, excusing themselves by the winter season, and tarying vntill Pompey or some other captaine should quickly come to raise the siege, and succeed Lucullus. Notwithstanding, when they understood that Mithridates had ouerthrowne Fabius, one of Lucullus Lieutenants, and that he went against Sornatius and Triarius: they were then assamed of themselues, and became contented to be led by Lucullus. But Triarius in a brauery, when he heard that Lucullus drew neare, made hast to win the victory, as if it had bin cockfive before Lucullus came and was him fulf event become in a contract to the victory as if it had bin cockof Lucullus fure before Lucullus came, and was himfelf ouerthrowne in a great battell, where some fay there Lieutensis. died aboue seuen thousand Romaines, amongst the which were a hundred and fiftie Centurions, and 24 Captaines or Colonels of a thousand men apeece, and yet besides, Mithridates took their campe alfo. Shortly after this ouerthrow, Lucullus came thither, who hid Triarius, whom came Tria. the fouldiers fought in their anger by all the meanes they could to kill. Now when Lucullus was the Luculcome, he proued fundry meanes to procure Mithridates to battell: but Mithridates would not tains. once flirre abroad, because he looked for Tigranes that came downe with a mighty power. Whereupon he determined againe to go against Tigranes to fight with him, before Mithridates and he joyned forces together. But as he was in his journey towards him, the Fimbrian bands The Fimbegan to rebell anew, and would not follow his enfignes, faying, and alledging for themselues, brian some that by decree of the people they had leaue to depart, and were discharged from their outh; and diers for furthermore that Lucullus had no more to do to command them, confidering that the gouerne- sulus. ment of the provinces which he had, was given vnto others. Lucullus perceiving this, did fo humble himselfe vnto them, supposing that way to winthem, as there was no kind of vncomely forced to humility, but he submitted himselfe vnto it:insomuch as he went into their tents to pray and intreate them one after another, with water in his eyes, & with fo great low line stee another with water in his eyes, & with so great low line stee another with water in his eyes, & with so great low line stee another with water in his eyes, & with so great low line stee another with water in his eyes, & with so great low line stee another with water in his eyes, & with so great low line stee another with water in his eyes, & with so great low line stee another with water in his eyes, & with so great low line stee another with so great low line stee and so great low line stee another with so great lo hands with them. But they fiercely reiected all his courtefies and faire intreaties, casting their non foolds pennilesse purses before him, and angrily bad him fight with his enemies alone, fince he had with the spoile of them all so well enriched himselfe alone. Neuerthelesse, at the intercession and earnest request of the other souldiers, these Fimerian bands were compelled to promise, that they would yet tary all that fommer, so that if no man in the meane time offered them battell, at the end of the terme they might go where they would. Lucullus was forced to accept this condition, or else to remaine alone, and consequently to forsake the countrey of the barbarous people. With much ado thus he kept them together, but in fuch fort, as he durft no more venture to dientarie compell them to come to battell, contenting himselfe that they were willing onely to stay with him, being forced to suffer Tigranes in the meane time to destroy and ouerrunne the countrey of conductor Cappa Docia, & Mithridates also to brag again, of whom he had before written to the Senate to depart that he had vtterly ouercome him: infomuch as there came commissioners and deputies from the benefits the ben Rome by his owne procurement, to order the state of the Realme of Pontvs with him, as of a done. kingdome alreadic won to the Romaine Empire. But when they were come, they found him not master of himselse, and that his owne souldiers stouted him, and did him all the spite and iniury they could. For they were so vnruly towards their Capraine, and did so much disdaine him, that when the end of the sommer was come, they armed themselves with armour and weapon, and drawing out their fwords in mockery, challenged their enemies to battell which were gone out of the field: and after they had made the noise and cries accustomed when they io yned battell, and made as though they fought, hurling & fwinging their fwords in their aire, they went from the campe, declaring openly that their time was expired, which they promifed Lucullus to Pompey, tarrie. On the other fide, Pompey had written unto the other fouldiers that were yet in campe, to come upon him for through the peoples for our at Bourse different decreases of the people for in comevnto him: for through the peoples fauour at Rom B, the practifes and flatteries of the common counsellers there, he was substituted Generall in Lucullus place: which much misliked the Senate and Nobility: for they thought Lucullus greatly wronged to have a successor sent, not to fucceed him introubles and dangers, but in glory and honor of triumph. And that they should compell him not onely to refigne vp the office of a General to another, but (for the good feruice helong time had done) the reward of his honor due for the same: & this also more misliked the that were then about him. That fo foone as Pompey was arrived in As 1A, he tooke all power and Initiation authority from Lucullus, to punish or reward any man for good or il feruice done to the comon-fered Lucullus ha wealth in those warres; and did moreouer prohibite by publike billes set vp in enery common Pamper.

place; that they should no more repaire vnto him, nor obey ought that he, or any of the ten Commissioners sent to dispose of the state of the provinces wonne by him, should commaind or ordaine: and because Pompey came with a greater power and armie then his, he was in some feare of him. Their friends thought good neuertheleffe they should meete together; and so they did incontinently, in a village of GALAFTIA, where at the first meeting they saluted each other very courteoufly, reioveing together of the noble victories that either had wonne. Lucullus was theelder man, but Pompey of greater dignity, because he had bene Generall of the Romaine people in many warres, and had already triumphed twife. The bundels of roddes which the Sergeats caried before them, were wreathed about with Laurell branches for the victories they had both atchieued: but Pompeys bundels were withered away, because they had come a long iourney through hot and drie countries. Lucullus officers feeing theirs withered, courteoufly gaue them of theirs fresh and new gathered: which Pompeyes friends tooke for a figne of good lucke. For to fay truly, the things that Lucullus did in the time of his charge, were cause of the honour that Pompey afterwards wan. Howbeit in the end, for all their talk, they were no whitthe better friends: but departed the one from the other more strange then they met. For Pomper by a plaine Edict, brak, renoked & difannulled all Lucullus ordinances, and taking from him all his other fouldiers, left him but onely fixteene hundred to accompanie his triumph, and yet they followed him with vnwilling minds: fuch was Lucullus imperfection and mainic, either by nature or frowardnesse of fortune, that he lacked the chiefest thing a Generall should have, which was to be beloued of his fouldiers. For if he had attained to that perfection, among st many o. ther his excellent vertues, magnanimity and wildome, judgement and inflice, the river of Enphrates had not bene the vttermost confines of the Empire of Rome on Asia side, but it hadexrended as far as the fea Hyrcane, yea euen vnto the vtmost part of the world. For king Tigranes had already conquered the other nations that lie beyond that, fauing the country of PARTHIA. which then was not fo great nor ftrong, as it appeared afterwards in Craffus time: nor fo joyned and knit together, but (what through civill diffentions amongst them at home, and forraine warres of their neighbours abroad) was fo weake, that with great difficulty they could defend themselves from the Armenians, that continually harried them out of their skins. But to take things rightly as they be indeed, methinkes that Lucallus did more hurt vnto his country by other, then he did benefit the same by himselfe. For the tokens of triumph and victories which he wan in Armenia foncare vnto the Parthians, the cities of Tigranocerta and of Nisiві s., which he had facked & fpoyled, the great treasure that he brought to Rome, and the Diademealfo of Tigrames, which was shewed in triumph as a prisoner with the rest: moued crassus with fuch a manuellous defire to passe into Asia, as if althe barbarous people had bene nothing but an affured spoile, and a prey exposed vnto all those that would come to take them. But Crasfus farre otherwise finding himselfe gauled and troubled with the arrowes of the Parthians, knew then by proofe, that Lucullus had not fo much ouercome his enemies for that they wanted skill, or were a cowardly people, as he had done through his wisedome and valiantnesse. But that shall be seene hereafter. Furthermore, Lucullus being now returned to Rome, found first of all his brother Marcus accused by one Gaius Memmius, for that he had done in his office of Treasurer in Syllaes time, and by his commandement, whereof he was cleared by sentence of the Judges. But Memmius of spite turned his anger against Lucullus selfe, stirring up the people against him, and letting them understand that Lucullus had kept backe and robbed much part of the treasure, which should have come to the common-wealth; and that to worke his feate the better, he had prolonged these warres as he did: wherefore he perswaded them flatly to denie him the honour of his triumph. And truly Lucullus was in great danger to hauelost it veterly, but that the Noblemen of the city, and they that were of greatest authority, intermedled themselnes with the tribes when they came to passe it by voices of the people; whom they intreated fo much through sute and perswasion, that in the end, with much ado, the people suffered him to enter the city in triumph. So Lucullus made a triumphant entrie, not terrible nor troublesome for the long shew or fight thereof, nor for the multitude of things that he brought thither with him, as many other Captaines had done before him. For he caused the fhew-place (which they call Circus Flaminius at Rome) to be fet out and furnished chiefly with armour and weapons of the enemies to a maruellous number: and with the kings engines & inuentions of battering peeces, which was a pleafant fight to behold. And in this fhew, there was a certaine number of his men of armes brauely armed, ten carts of warre armed with fythes that passed by, and threescore of the chiefest friends and Captaines of the two Kings that were led prisoners through the citic. And there were also drawne after them, an hundred and tengallies al armed in the prores with strong spurres of copper, and a statue of Mithridates all of cleane gold, fixe foot high, with a rich target fet with precious stones. Besides all that, there were twenty cupboids as full of filuer plate as could be, and thirty cupbords full also of golden vessell, armour and coine of gold, caried vpon mens shoulders. After them followed eight mules laden with golden beds, and fixe and fiftie other mules that carried filuer bullion, and a hundred and feuen other mules that caried filter coine, amounting to the fumme of two hundred threefcore and ten thouland Sestertios. Furthermore, there were bookes of account caried also, wherein were particularly written the fummes of money which Lucullus had deliuered before vnto Pompey for the warre against pirats on the sea, and vnto the treasurers & high treasurers, to put into the sparing coffers of the common wealth at Roma. And afterwards in an article by it selfe, that he had given nine hundred and fiftie Drachmaes to every fouldier by the polle. After the shew of this triumph was ended, he made a generall feast, in the which he feasted all the city and villages therabouts, which the Romaines call Vicos. And afterwards for fook his wife Clodia for Lucultus her vnchast and wanton life, and maried Servilia, Catoes sister: howbeit he wan norhing by the forsates cooking of the forsates sister in the forsates in the first sister in the first exchange; for he fped as cuill with the fecond as he did with the first. For, sauing that she was marieth not flandered with the incest of her owne brethren, otherwise she was as dishonest and vnchaste services (also but at the length grown against another states) as Clodis: and yet he bare withall a while for her brothers fake, but at the length grew wearie of for, as you her, & put her away as he had done Clodia. Now when he had filld the Senate with a maruellous chaft as hope and expectation of him (who thought they had now got one to encounter and withftand Pompeys tyrannie, and to vphold and maintaine the authority of the nobility and Senate against the people, for that by his noble deeds he had archieued fo great fame and reputation) he suddenly gaue ouer al dealings in the affaires of the common wealth either because he saw it so best being a hard thing now to keepe it front ruine; or else (as other faid) for that he felt himselfe surf gireth our guerning of the surface of ficiently furnished with honour and wealth, and therefore determined from thenceforth to line ment of the quietly al at his case, after so great paines, trauels and troubles, the end whereof fell not out ouer fortunately. And furth some were of his mind, and liked his area of his mind. fortunately. And furely some were of his mind, and liked this great change of his maruellous well, because he did not as Marius did, neither happened on the ill successe and end that Marius had. For Marins after the notable victories which he brought from the CIMERES, & after his valiantacts in warres which had won him great honor, yet would henot so leaue off, when he might haue bene chronicled to his wonderfull glory: but of an vnsatiable mind, and ambitious defire to rule and beare fway, (being withall a very old man) went and forted himfelfeamong ft yong men desirous of gouernment, who brought him not onely to commitmany outrages, but made himselfealso to suffer greater cruelties. It is thought also that Cicero had ended his aged course more happily, if after he had quenched Catilines conspiracie, he had then taken his ease. And so had Scipio in like case, if when he had ionned Nymantia vnto Carthage, he would then have quieted himselfe. And therefore, some say, that there is a certaine renolution and time appointed, beyond the which no wife ma should meddle any more with the affaires of the commonwealth:no more then a man whose youth and strength is gone and decayed, is any more sit to inft, wraftle, or enter into fuch exercises of the body. But contrarily, Crassus and Pampey mocked Lucullus, because he gaue himself so much to pleasure and pastime as if to line pleasantly and delicately did not worse become his age, thento command anarmy, or to gouerne the affaires of a commonweale. And for my part, reading Lucullus life, me thinks that I reade an anciet Comedie, the beginning whereof is tedious, and the latter end joy full. For at the beginning of his life, you find notable exploits, done by him in wars, and great good gouernment also in peace: but in the end they all turned into feasts & banquets, and lacking litle of maskes & mummeries, dancing withtorches, and all other fuch delighs fit for yong men. For I bring within the compaffe and reckening of his finenesse and pleasures, his sumptuous buildings, his stately walks and galleries, his hot-houses and stones, his tables and pictures, his statues also, and the great workmanship and curiosity he had besides of all other arts by him gotten together out of all parts, to his infinite charge: abusing therein the world of goods and treasure gotten and wonne in the warres, in time of his charge and office of Generall, and other wife. Infomuch, that not with standing excesse and superfluity hath ever since increased untill this present time, yet they reken the gardens Lucallus made, to be the most sumptious and delicatest places that the Emperors have And therfore Tuberothe Stoicke Philosopher, having seene these stately workes which Luculled had caused to be made neare vnto NAPLES, by the sea side (where there are mountaines cur through, light as day, and hanged vpon vaults) and great ditches cast by force, to makethesca passe and run through his houses, to keepe sish therein; and lodgings also that he built in the sea it felfe:he called Lucullus, Xernes the gowneman, as if he would have faid, Xernes the Romaine. For euen so did Xerxes in old time cause the mountaine Athoto be cut in sunder, and a channell to be digged there to passe his ships through. He had also many other pleasant places within the territories of Rome neare vnto Thyscylvm, where there were great large halles fet vpontarraffes to fee round about far off in the day time. And Pompey going thither sometime to fee him. reproued him greatly, telling him that he had built a maruellous faire fommer house, but not to be dwelt in in the winter feason. Lucullus laughing, answered him: Do ye thinke me to have lesse wit and reason then Storkes or Cranes, that I cannot shift houses according to the season? And another time there was a Prætor of Rome, that making playes to shew the people pastime, sent Vnto Lucullus to borrow certaine purple clokes to set foorth his players: Lucullus made himanfwer, that he would cause his folkes to looke if he had any. And the next morning demanding of him how many he should neede; the other answered, that a hundred would serue his turne. Whereupon Lucullus told him againe, he would furnish him with two hundred, if his case so required. And therfore the Poet Horace writing this story, addeth to a notable exclamation against fuperfluity, faying that men think that a poore house where there is no more riches then need fary, and where there is not more then appeareth in fight, and that the master knoweth of. He was a vaine man in his ordinary feruiceat his boord, not onely in that his beds whereon he fed, were conered with rich carpets of purple, and himselfe served in gold and silver vessell set with precious stones; and that there was dancing, musicke, playes, and other such like pastimes of ordinary: but also for that he was continually served with all sorts of fine dainty dishes, with works of pastry, banquetting dishes, and fruit curiously wrought and prepared, which onely made him meater and to be wondred at of men of fimple vnderstanding and meane condition. Therefore was Pompey maruelloufly efteemed, and specially for a word he spake one day when he was sicke, and that the Phisitian had willed him to cate of a Thrush. For when his servants told him, they were hard to come by in sommer, but at Lucullus house, where they brought them vp all the yeare through: he would in no wife they should aske any of him, but said vnto his Phisitian: What, if Lucuilus were not given to pleasure, could not Pompey line ? And so willed them to get him some other fuch thing, as they might more cafily come by. Cato was Lucullus friend & kinfman both, & yet he fo much misliked his maner of living & ordinary expence, that one day a yong man making a long and tedious oration in open Senate (out of time, & to no purpole) touching meane diet, fobriety, and temperance of life; cato could no longer abide him, but rofe vp, and faid vnto him: What, wilt thou not leave babling to vsal day; thou that art rich as Craffus, that livest as Lucullus, and speakest as Cato? Other affirme that these words were spoken thus, but that it was not Cato that spake them neuerthelesse it is certaine, by the noble sayings they have gathered of Lucullus, he did not onely delight to line fo delicately, but also he gloried in it. Some write that he feasted certain GRECIANS many daies together in his house, that were come out of GRECE to Rome: and that they being men brought vp with the fobriety and simplicity of GRECE, after they had bene feasted there divers times, were ashamed, and refused to go thither any more, being afterwards intreated to come to Lucullus, supposing that he had made the this great cheare for their owne fakes. Luculius hearing of it, told them: My Lords, I pray you refuse not to come to me for that; indeede I must needes graunt that there is somewhat more then ordinary to welcomeyou withall; but Itell you truly, the most part is for Lucullus sake. Another time when he supped all alone, and his men had laid but one boord, and prepared but a reasonable supper for him, he was very angry with them, and called for his freward, to know why he was fo ferued: the fleward anfwered him: My lord, because I saw you send for no body, I thought this supper sufficient. What faid he againe, knewest not thou that Lucullus should sup to night with himselfee. In fine, Lucullus fare was fo well knownethrough Rome, that there was notalke but of Lucullus noble housekeeping. Whereupon, Cicero and Pompey being desirous to see the proofe thereof, came one day to him in the market place feeing him at ley fure for Cicero was Lucullus very good friend, and Pompey (though there was some iarre betweene them for matters of warres) did not let for all that to come vnto him, and to speake gently one to another. And cicero after he had faluted him, asked him if he would be contented they should come and see him. Oh, said he, with all my heart : I pray you come to me. Well then, faid Cicero, Pompey and I will come and suppe with you to night, with condition that you prouide no more then your ordinarie: Lucutlus told them againe, they should then fare but badly, and therefore it were better they taried till to morrow. But they would none of that no nor suffer him to speake with his men, for feare he should command them to prouide somewhat more then for himselfe. Neuerthelesse, at his desire they suffered him onely in their presence alowd to tell one of his men, that he would sup that night in Apollo: (for fo was one of the most stately and sumptuous halles of his house called) and with that word onely he finely deceived them both, and they never found him. For every hall had having di-nerfeballes, his certaine fumme and rate appointed for the charge and expence of enery supper they made bad appointed for the charge and expense of enery supper they made bad appointed for the charge and expense of enery supper they made bad appointed for the charge and expense of enery supper they made bad appointed for the charge and expense of enery supper they made bad appointed for the charge and expense of enery supper they made bad appointed for the charge and expense of enery supper they made bad appointed for the charge and expense of enery supper they made bad appointed for the charge and expense of enery supper they made bad appointed for the charge and expense of enery supper they made bad appointed for the charge and expense of energy supper they made bad appointed for the charge and expense of energy supper they made bad appointed for the charge and expense of energy supper they made bad appointed for the charge and expense of energy supper they made bad appointed for the charge and expense of energy supper they made bad appointed for the charge and expense of energy supper the expense of energy supper the ene in them, and the ordinarie furniture and service for the same. So that when his servants had their tea surry ball bis serv watch-word but in what hall he would sup, they knew straight what charge he would be at for taking fale his supper, & what orders should be observed therein. Now Lucullus maner was to spend when of dies he made any feast in the hall of Apollo, fiftie thousand pence, and that selfe day the supper was who I have prepared according to that value: infomuch as Pampey maruelled how it could be possible that a saturfue. supper of so exceeding great charge could be so suddenly prepared. In such things therefore did dollar levislation and riotandly found his goods. Like Spoiles indeed course of the spoiles of the spoiles indeed course of the spoiles Lucullus lauishly and riotously spend his goods, like spoiles indeed gotten of slaues and barbarous people. But that efpecially which he bestowed vpon books, was a very commendable and Insulan lie honest expence. For he had gathered together a great number of notable histories, the vse wherof was more honour vnto him, then the having of them. For his librarie was ever open to all comers, & they suffered the GRECIANS to come into his goodly tarrasses & faire walkes, or other pleasant places thereabouts convenient to fit and reason together, and never shut doore against them: where learned men met commonly, and oftentimes spent the whole day in conference together, as in the house of the Muses; being very glad when other matters were dispatched, they had fo much leisure as but to go thither. And Lucullus selfe would also manie times be amongst them, in those tarasses and pleasant walkes; delighting much to talke with them: and he did euer helpe to dispatch them that had any businesse with him, and granted the thing they requested of him. To conclude, his house was a common receipt for all them that came from GRECE to ROME. He loued all manner of Philosophie, & refused no sect of the same. But from his youth vpward, he cuer loued and esteemed best the Academick E sect, not that which they loved phicall the new ACADEMICKE (although it flourished at that time through Carneades workes, losely). which Philo made such estimatio of) but the old Academicke, which the Philosopher Antothus of the city of Ascalon did defend & maintaine at that time, being an eloquent rhetoritian and well foolen, whom I walke fought to winne by all meanes to make him his friend and as and well spoken, whom Lucullus sought to winne by all meanes, to make him his friend, and to and open and well spoken, whom Lucullus sought to winne by all meanes, to make him his friend, and to haue him in house with him: because he might inney against Philoes hearers and followers, Thatorinane. whose scholer Givero among the rest was, that wrote anotable booke against this old Acade-MICKE fect. And in the same he reciteth Lucullus, maintaining the opinion of the old Acade-MICKES: who hold, that a man may certainly know and comprehend fomething, and called that The opinion Catalepfin: but Cicero defended the contrarie. The booke is intituled Lucullus: for they were defined as we have rehearfed before) very good friends, and had both one false defined as demices. (as we haue rehearfed before) very good friends, and had both one felfe defire for gouernement in the commonwealth. For Lucullus did not fo withdraw himselfe from matters of state, that he would no more meddle at all, nor heare speake of them: but he betimes gauconer all ambition and contention, as a thing of no small danger, and breeding great reprochand dishonour Marcus to Marcus Crassus, and Cato, to be chiefe in authority. And these two were they that defended Crassus. the Senate, and whom they raifed vp to withftand Pompeyes greatnesse, being affraid of him, afterthat Lucullus had refused the chiefe place of authority. But otherwise, Lucullus would be in gainst Pemthe market place at courts and common councels, to pleasure his friends when they requested 19. him : and would goe to the Senate alfo, when there was occasion to breake any new practife, or Luculus to ouerthrow Pompeys ambitious policie, For he ouerthrew all the orders and constitutions gainst Pomthat Pompey had made, after he had ouercome the kings Mithridates and Tigranes: and with Perthe helpe of Cato hindered a distribution of money which Pompey had written for to Rome, Pompey, to help the following the follo to be bestowed amongst his souldiers.. Whereupon Pompey tell in friendship (or to speake far, confir more plainely, in conspiracie (with Crassus and Casar, by whose helpe and affistance, he filled reduces the Rome with arms and fouldiers: and made the people by force to passe and confirme what he fage.

would have done, after he had violently expulsed Lucullus and Cato out of the market place. Whereat the noble men were much offended, and misliking the great wrong they had offered Lucullus and Cato, Pompeyes followers suborned a *BRVTIAN, and said he was taken lying in waite to kill Pompey. Whereupon the faid BRYTIAN being examined by the Senate, named certaine. but when he came before the people, he named Lucullus, faying that he had hired him to kill Pompey. But no man beleeued him: for they perceived openly in the market place, that he was procured by themselues falsely to accuse Lucullus, and Pompeys other adversaries. And this was proued more plainely within few daies after, when they threw the body of this BRYTIAN dead in the middest of the streete, out of the prison: who they said died of himselfe with sicknesse. Howbeitthe markes being plainly seene of the halter wher with they had strangled him, and the ftripes appearing also which they had given him, did plainely shew that they themselves did it. whom after they had suborned to accuse Lucullus, they slew in this manner. This was the cause why Lucullus did more then before absent himselfe from meeting in publicke causes: but after. when he faw that they had so wickedly exiled Cicero, and found meanes also to conucy Cato far inough off, under pretenced colour to fend him with charge into the Ile of Cyprus: thenhe gaue vp altogether. Some write that a litle before his death, he was not perfit in his wits, decaying through age by litle and litle. Howbeit Cornelius Nepos faith, that it was not for age nor ficknesse that his wits did alter, but through poyfon which one of his flaues had given him, whom he had made free, called Callifthenes: who gaue it him, not of any cuill intent, but because his master should love him the more, supposing that this poyson had power to make him love him. But he troubled his wits fo much with this poyfon, that Lucullus while he lived was faine to hauchis brother Marcus to ouerfee his goods. Notwithstanding this, when he was dead, he was as much bewailed and lamented of all the people, as if he had died in his best credite, and greatest proficerity. For all the people ran to honor his funerals, and his body was caried to the place, by the young noble men of the citic. The people would in any cafe haue buried him within the field of Mars as they had before buried sylla. But because no man thought of it before, and also forthat things necessarie were not easily to be prouided for the place: his brother Marcus befought the people they would be content his funerals might be at a towne of his owne, neare vnto the city of Thyseylym, where his tombe was prepared, and he himselfe lived not long time after. For as Lucullus both in age, and honour, had not left him farre behind him:

fo did he not much in his death. For as a brother that had alwaies dearely loued him, he could not then long liue, and furniue him.

THE COMPARISON OF Lucullus with Cimon.

Othing (in my opinion) made Lucullus more happie, then to die when he did, before he faw the change and alteration of the common-weale, which the farall destinies plagued the ROMAINES with- fel. all, with fedition and civill warres: and that he died in his countrey yet enioying her liberty, but beginning then to fall to decay. And in that (about all other things) he was likest vnto Cimon who died whileft the Grecians were in good lone and peace with other, and not in broile of difcord and civill warres. Indeed Cimon died in his campe, being Generall of his countrey, at the fiege of the city of

CITIVM in CYPRVS; not withdrawne to his home, as one wearied, lining idly, or leading a voluptuous life in feafts and banquets, making that the end and reward of his warres, victories and triumphs: but as Plato faid, (when he wifely blamed and reproued orpheus, who promisch perpetuall drunkennesse in the world to come, for reward of their vertue, that lived well in this life) merily. And truly it is a great comfort and contentation of minde, for an old man feebled with age, and compelled by weaknesse, to withdraw himselfe from the world, as well in matters of gouernment in peace, as in warres: and quietly to passe his time in studie, wheredelight is joyned with honest contemplations. But to finish his vertuous deedes, by referring them to pleasure, as vnto their onely end, and moreouer, to grow old by pleasure and vanity, folemnizing Venus feaft all the rest of his life, after he had made such warres, and commanded fuch armies: that me thinkes a thing vnworthie of an honest Academicke. and altogether vnuncete for one professing old Xenocrates doctrine, but sit rather for a mangiuen ouer altogetherto Epicurus discipline. There is a wonderfull thing to be considered of in these two men, that the ones youth was altogether vicious and reprochfull, and the others to the contrarie, honest and vertuous. But he is the better that changeth for the better: and that nature is alwaies more commendable, in whom vice decayeth, and vertue waxeth young; A good gift then that which by continuance of time sheweth still the contrarie. And furthermore, they to decay both grew rich by one felfe meane: but they did not both alike vse their riches. For it were so increase to no purpose to compare the buildings of the wall that standeth South within the castell verue. of ATHERS, which was built with the money Cimen brought thither, with the fine built chambers, and high raifed turrets to gaze afarre, and environed about with conduits of water, which Lucullus erected by NAPLES, with the spoyles of the barbarous people. Neither is Cimons table also of moderate fare and diet, but yet open to every man, comparable to Lucullus boord, which was sumpriously furnished, and shewed the greatnesse of his Lord. For Cimens boord fed many mouthes dayly with a small charge: and Lucullus table exceeded in expence, to feede a few, with superfluous dainties. Villesse they will say, that time caused this difference betweene them. But who can tell, if Cimon had bene at leisure to have withdrawne himselfe to quiet in age from gouernement and armes, he also would not have led a more sumptuous and dissolute life, giuento all pleasure, then Lucullus did? For of his owne nature he loued wine, banquets, and playes, and was also given to women, as we have told you before. But prosperity, and fortunate successe of things doe bring such delight to ambitious men of nature, and borne to great enterprises, that they make them forget to runne after their other voluptuous vaine defires. And therefore had Lucullus died abroad in the warres whileft he commanded armies, there had not bene that liuing man, how curious foeuer he had bene to reproue other mens faults, that could have detected him of any reprochfull vice. And thus much for their manner of life. Now furthermore, touching the state of their warres. no doubt both the one and the other were excellent Captaines, as well by fea as by land. And like as in games of prise and exercises of body which are shewed in GRECE, they that in one felfe day winne the games at wreftling, and weapons both, are called by a strange custome, not conquerours onely, but victours also, to honour them withall: euen so me thinkes that Cimon in like case having in one selfe day crowned GREECE with two notable markes of triumph. for two battels he wanne, the one by fea, and the other by land, deferueth to have fome place and preferment before other Captaines. And moreouer, Lucullus received the authority to command, of his countrey and commonwealth: but Cimon gaue his countrey both authorize and ability to command. Lucullus found his countrey a commanding people to all their friends and confederates: through whose aide he ouercame his enemies. And Cimon contrarily, twixt Cifound his countrey marching vinder anothers enfigne, and through his valiantnesse did sobehaue himselse, that he made his city goe before her confederates, and triumph ouer herenemics: compelling the Persians by force to give them the rule by fea, and perfivading the LACED EMONIANS willingly to give place vnto them by land. Now if the chiefest thing that can be in an excellent Captaine, is to make himselfeto be beloued of his souldiers, that they may delight to obey him; then was Lucullus despised of his souldiers, and Cimon esteemed and wondred at euen of the confederates themselues. For Lucullus was for saken of his owne men: and Gimon was followed by very strangers, for the confederates did ioynetogether with him. Lucullus returned home into his countrey, forfaken of those he caried out with him. Cimonreturned againe, commanding them that were fent out with him to obey others: and had at one time done for his countrey three notable things, and hard for them to have compaffed: to wir, made peace with the enemies, given them authority and rule over their confederates, and joyned friendship with the Laced Emonians. Both of them vndertooke to destroy great Empires, and conquer all Asia: but neither of them both could bring their enterprise to passe. The one by reason of his death, which cut him off on the sudden being Generall, and when his affaires prospered best. The other can hardly be excused, that there was not a great fault in him: either in that he could not, or because he would not satisfie the complaints and griefes of his men, which caused them so much to hate and mislike him. And yet it might be saidalso, that in this fault he was like vnto Cimon: who was oftentimes accused by his citizens, and at the length banished his countrey for the space often yeares, because that in ten yeares space (as Plato faith) they should no more heare him speake. For to fay truly, it seldome times happe-Grave Ma. neth that the grave wits of noble men do pleafe the multitude, neither are they acceptable vnto the common people because they striuing continually to reforme them when they go awrie, do refembled grieue them as much, as furgeons do their patients when they bind vp their fores with bands to cure them. For though by that binding they restore and bring to their naturall places againe the good furbroken bones and members out of ioynt: yet put they the patient to great paine and griefe. And therefore me thinkes neither the one northe other is to be blamed. Furthermore, Lucullus went a great deale farther with his army, then cuer Cimon did. For he was the first Romaine captaine that passed ouer mount Taurus, & the river of Tigris with an army. He tooke and burntalmost in the fight of both the kings, the royallcities of Asia, TIGRANOCERTA, CAPIRA, SINOPE and NICIBIS. Towards the North, he went as farre as the river of Phasis: towards the East, into Media and Southward, even to the red sea, and vnto the Realmes of Arabia, subduing all vnto the ROMAINE Empire. And having overthrowneall the power of these two mighty kings, he tooke from them all, but their persons onely: who fled and hid themselues like wild beaftes, in infinite deserts and unpassable forrests. Wherein is easily discerned the difference betwixt betwist the doings of the one, and of the other. For the PERSIANS, as if they had had no hurt nor ouerthrow at all by Cimon, fought a battell immediatly after against the GRECIANS, and onerthrew the greatest part of their army in AGYPT: where Mithridates and Tigranes, after Lucullus victories, did neuer any notable act. For the one finding himselfe altogether pulled downe on his knees, and broken by the former battels: durst neuer once onely shew his army vnto Pompey, out of the strength of his campe, but fled into the Realme of Bosphorvs, where testing of he died. And Tigranes, he went and humbled himselfe on his knees, vnarmed and without Penns died weapon, vnto Pompey: and taking his diademe off from his head, layed it at his feete, not flat- in the tering him for the victories he had wonne, but for those which Lucullus had triumphed for By Bosphorus. reason whereof he scaped good cheape, and thought himselfe happie, when Pompey gaue him Tigranes onely the marke and title of a king, the which before had bene taken from him. Hetherefore is king of to bethought the more worthy Captaine, and stoutest champion, that leaueth his enemy in submitted weake efface for him that followeth, and shall fight afterwards with him. And furthermore, himselfe to come found the power of the king of Persia over barried, the pride and ficreenesse of the Cimen found the power of the king of Persia ouer harried, the pride and fierceneffe of the Persians layed aground, by many great battels they had loft before unto Themifteeles, king Paulanias, and Leotychides, who had ouerthrowne them: and going now againe to fight afresh with them, it was an eafie thing to ouercome the bodies of those, whose hearts were already vanquished. Where Lucullus to the contrary, assailed Tigranes, that had never bene overcome, but bare a maruellous loftiemind with him, for the many great battels and conquests he had wonne. And for the multitude of enemies, there was no comparison betweene those that Cimon ouerthrew, and those that were ranged in battell against Lucullus. So that all things weighed and confidered, it were hard to judge which of them two proued the worthieft man: for that it seemeth, that the gods did fauour both the one and the other, telling the one what he should doe, and the other what he should not doe. And thus it appeareth by restimony of the gods, they were both good men, and that they both obtained euerlasting glory.

The end of Lucullus life.

THE LIEE OF Nicias.

The praise of Thucydi-

Haue reason (as I thinke) to compare Nicias with Crassus, and thee. uents that happened to the one in Parthia, with those that befell the other in Sicile: yet am Ito pray them that shall happen to reademy writings, not to thinke me in entermedling with those matters (in the describing and reporting whereof, Thucydides hath gone beyondhimfelfe, both for variety and liuelinesse of narration, as also in choice and excellent words) to have the like intent and opinion, that Timeus the historiographer had. Who, hoping by the granitie and life of his words and reports, to darken the glory of Thucydides, and make Philifters (in comparison of himselfe) appeare ignorant, and without any grace of historicall narration: hath in his hiftory of purpole fought occasion to enter into the describing of those battels by fea and by land, and the report of those speeches and narrations, which are deliuered by them with great judgement and eloquence. Wherein he commeth as neare them whom he contends to palle, as doth the footeman to the Lydian coach, as faith Pindarus: and befides sheweth himfelfe fond and of small judgement, or as Diphilus faith:

Tim aus follies.

A lubber laden with Sicilian grease. And in diversplaces he falleth into Xenarchus follies. As where he faith, that he thinkes it was an euill token for the Athenians, that Nicias the Captaine (whose name was deriued of this word Nice, fignifying victory) diffwaded their attempts against Sicile; and that by the throwing downe and mangling of the Hermes (to fay, the images of Mercury) it was foreshewed that they should receive great overthrowes by the Generall of the Syracvsans, called Hermocrates, the sonne of Hermon. And further, that it was not vnlikely that Hercules did fauour the SYRACVSANS by reason of the goddesse Proferpina (protector and defendor of the city of Sy-RACVSA) to requite her for that she gaue him Cerberus the dogge, porter of hell: and that he did malice the ATHENIAN'S befides, because they tooke the ÆGESTÆAN'S parts (who came of the TROTANS, whom he much hated) for breaking their promife and faith with him, whose citie himselfe had ouerthrowne in reuenge of the wrong that Laomedon king of Thor had offered him. Howbeit Timens shewes as much wit and judgement, in delivering vs such toyes in Timeus ve- an history, as he doth in correcting the flyle of Philiftus, or in condemning and railing on Plato and Aristotle. But in my fancic, this ambition and contention to write or to speake more clearely then others, sheweth alwaies a base envious mind, like a scholler full of schoole points.

But when it striueth with things that for their excellencie are past imitation, then is it extreme folly and madnesse. Since therefore I may not passe ouer nor omit certaine things, which Thucydides and Philistus have already set downe, and especially those wherein they lay open Nicias nature and qualities, which the varietie of his successes and fortune did couer: I must lightly touch them, and report fo much as is necessary and convenient, lest men condemne me for floath and negligence. And in the rest I have endeauoured to gather and propound things not commonly marked and knowne, which I have collected as well out of fundry mens workes and ancient records, as out of many old antiquities: and of them all compiled a narration, which will ferue (I doubt not) to decipher the man and his nature. Of Nicias therefore may be fayd that which Aristotle hath written of him, that there were three famous citizens of Arhens, very honest men, and which favoured the communaltie with a naturall fatherly loue: Nicias the sonne of Niceratus, Thueydides the sonne of Milesius, and Theramines the sonne of Agnon. But Nices of the three, this last was of smallest account: for he is flouted as a forreiner borne in the Ile of CEOS, and challenged befides for inconftant and irrefolute in matters of flate and gouernment: and inclining fometimes to one faction, fometimes to another: he was called Cothurnus, a kind ofbuskin indifferently feruing for both legges, and in old time was vied of common players of tragedies. Of the other two, Thueydides being the elder, did many good acts in fauour of the pobility against Pericles, who alwaies tooke part with the inferiour fort. Nicias that was the yonger, had reasonable estimation in Pericles life time for he was joyned captaine with him, and oftentimes also had charge by himself alone without him. After Pericles death, the nobility raised him to great authority, to be as a strong bulwarke for them, against Cleons infolencie and boldnefferand withall he had the love of the people to advance and preferre him. Now this Cleon in troth could do much with the people, hedid fo flatter and dandle them, like an old man, still feeding their humor with gaine: but yet they themselues whom he thus flattered, knowing his extremeconetoulines, impudency and boldnesse, preferred Nicius before him, because his granity was not seuere nor odious, but mingled with a kind of modesty, that he seemed to seare the prefence of the people, which made them thereby the more to loue and efteeme him. For being (as he was) of a fearfull and mistrust full nature & disposition, in wars he cloked his feare with good Wishard 1. fortune, which euer fauored him alike in all his iourneys & exploits that he took in hand where he was captaine. Now being much afraid of accusers, this timorous maner of his proceeding in the citic, was found to be popular, whereby he wan him the goodwill of the people: and by meanes thereofrose dayly more and more, because the people commonly feare those that hate them, and aduance them that feare them. For the greatest honor nobility can do to the communaltie, is to shew that they do not despise them. Now Pericles, who through his perfit vertue only, and force of his great eloquence ruled the whole state and comonwealth of Athens, he needed no counterfeit colour, nor artificiall flattering of the people, to win their fauour and goodwils:but Nicias lacking that, and having wealth inough, fought thereby to creepe into the peoples fauor. And where Gleon would entertaine the ATHENIANS with pleasant toyes and devices and could feed the peoples humour that way: Nicias finding himfelte no fit man to worke by fisch encounter, crept into the peoples fauour with liberalitie, with charges of common playes, beralty and and with fuch like fumptuoufnesse, exceeding in cost and pleasant sports, not onely all those that magnifhad bene before him, but such also as were in his time. There yet remaine monuments of his cence. consecrating vnto the gods, as the image of Pallas in the castel of Athens, the gilt being worne off:and the chappell which is vnder the festivall table of Bacchus: for he many times had the chiefe price in Bacchus dances, & neuer went away without some game. And touching this matter, theregoeth a report, that at certaine playes, whereof Nicias defrayed the charges, one of his men came forth vpon the players stage before the people, apparelled like Bacchus: and being a goodly tall young man, without any haire on his face, the ATHENIANS tooke fuch pleasure to lee him so attired, that they made a clapping of their hands a long time together for ioy. Therewithall Nicias stood vp, and told them, that it were a shame for him to leaue the body of a man in bondage, that openly was efteemed as a god: and thereupon forthwith made this young flaue a free man. Men write also of certaine sumptuous and denout acts he did in the Ile of DELOS, where the dancers and fingers which the cities of GRECE fent thither to fing rimes and verses in the honour of Apollo, were wont before to arrive disorderly: and the cause was, for the numbers of people that ranne to see them, who made them sing straight without any order, and landing in haste out of their ships, they left their apparell, and put on such vestments as they should weare in procession, and their garlands of flowers on their heads, all at one present time. But Nicias being commanded to go thither to present the singers of ATHENS, landed first in the He of Renia, hard adjoyning to the He of Detos, with his fingers, his beafts for facrifice. and with all the rest of his traine, carying a bridge with him, which he had caused to be made at ATHENS, vpon measure taken of the channell, betwixt the one and the other Ile, set out with pictures and tables, with gilding, with no cgayes and garlands of triumph, and with excellent wrought tapiftrie, which in the night he fet vp vpon the channell, being not very broad, and the next morning by breake of the day caused his singers to passe ouer vpon it, singing all the way as they went in his procession so nobly set forth, euen vnto the very temple of Apollo. And when the facrifice, the feast, and games that were to be played were finished, he games goodly palme tree of copper, which he offered up to Apollo, bought lands besides that coff him ten thousand Drachmaes, which he consecrated also vnto the god Patron of the Ile: and ordained, that the profits of the fame should be yearely bestowed vponthe Delians, vpon an open facrifice and feast, in the which they should pray to their god, for the health and profeerity of Nicias: and so caused it to be written and grauen upon a pillar he left in Delos, as a perpetuall monument and keeper of his offering, and foundation. Afterwards, this copper palme tree being broken by winds, it fell vpon the great image of the NAXIANS gift, and threwit downe to the ground. Surely in this ceremonie and act of his, there was a maruellous pompe, and great shew of popular ambition: neuerthelesse, he that shall consider of his life and actions. may eafily perswade himselfe that aboue all, he did it of very pure zeale and denotion, and se.

condly, to give pleasure and pastime to the people. For by Thucydides report of him, he was one that feared the gods with trembling, and was wholly given to religion. We find written in one of the dialogues of Pasiphoon, that Nicias did facrifice dayly to the gods, and kept a soothfayer continually in his house, giving out abroad, that it was to counsell with him what should happen about the affaires of the common wealth: but introth it was to inquire of his owne businesse, and specially of his mines of silver. For he had many great mines about LAVRION fide, that were very profitable to him: but withall they digged with great danger, and hewas driuen continually to keepe a maruellous number of slaues at worke there. The most part of Nicias riches was in readic money, and thereby he had many crauers and hangers on him. whom he gaue mony vnto: for he gaue as well vnto the wicked people that might do mischiese. Misias for as vnto them that descrued reward, and were worthy of his liberalitie. Thus was his feare feare a rent to the wicked, as his liberalitie was also a reuenew to the good: and hereof thecomicall Poets do deliuer vs ancient testimonic. For Teleclides speaking of a certaine informer, faid thus:

Micias fuperflicions

> Caricles did refuse to give one Mina, for to stay The bruiting of his fecret birth, conneyed close away: But Nice the sonne of Nicerate did willingly bestow Abrace of Minas double told, And though I well do know The cause of his so doing, yet I will not him bewray:

For why? the man is my good friend, and wife, I dare well say. And he, whom Eupolis mocketh in his comedic intituled Maricas, bringing a plaine simple man

vpon the stage, doth aske him:

The informer:

How long is it ago since thou didst speakewith Nicias?

The plaine man:

I saw him standing even right now upon the market place.

Theinformer:

This man affirmes he saw him there And wherefore should he say He faw him, but of some intent his lewdnesse to bewray?

Now firs, ye fee how Nicias here is taken in the trip,

For all his walking close in clouds to give the privie flip.

The Author:

O foolish folke, suppose ye that so good a man as he In any fault or shamefull fact will tardje taken be? And Clean threatening in the comedie of Aristophanes, intituled the Knights, fayth thefe words:

The Orators if by the throte Itake.

Then sure I am, that Nicias straight will quake.

Phrynicus selfe telleth vs also glaunfingly, thathe was so timorous and casie to be frayed, when he fayd, speaking of another man:

A good fout man (I know full well) he was.

And not a coward, like to Nicias.

Now Nicias being thus timorous of nature, and fearing to give any litle occasion to the Orators to accuse him, kept himselfe so warily, that he neither durst eate nor drinke with any man in the citie, nor yet put forth himselfe in companie to talke; or passe the time amongst them, but altogether avoided such sports and pleasures. For when he was in office, he would never out of the counfell-house, but still busied himselse in dispatching causes, from morning till night, and was cuer the first that came, and last that went away. And when he had no matter of state in hand, then was he very hardly to be spoken withall, and would suffer no accesse vnto him, but kept close in his house: and some of his friends did euer answer them that came to his gate, and prayed them to pardon him, faying, that he was bufie then about affaires of the commonwealth. Wides the One Hieron, whom Nicias had brought vp in his house, and had himselfe taught him both learning and musicke, was his greatest procurer and instrument to keepe him from speech with any maister. man, and brought him to this reputation of greatnesse and grauity. This Hieron (as it is reported) was the sonne of Dionysius Chalcus, of whom they find certaine Poeticall words at this day: Dionysius who being captaine of a certaine number of men that were fent to dwell in ITALIE, did build founder of there the citie of THVRIES. Hieron I say did serue his turne, and holpe him secretly to enquire the citie of what he would vi derstand of the Soothsayers, and gaue out these words among the people: that Nicias led too miserable and painfulla life, for the ouergreat care he took to serue the commonwealth:infomuch, as though he were in his hot-house to wash him, or at his table at meate, his mind ran still of some matters about the commonwealth, and to serve the state did neglect his owne private affaires: fo that he scant began to sleepe and take rest, when others commonly had slept their first sleepe, and that he looked like no body. Furthermore, that he was growne crabbed and vncourteous, even to such as before had bene his familiar friends: fo that, layd he, he loseth them together with his goods, and all for service of the commonwealth, where others growrich, and winfriends, by the credit they have to be heard of the people, and can make merry among them, and sport with the matters of state which they had in their hands. Now in troth, such was Nicias life, that he might truly say that which Agamemnon spake of himselfe in the tragedic of Euripides, called Ephigenie in Avi IDE.

In outward shew of stately pompe, all others I exceed, And yet the peoples underling I am in very deed.

And Nicios perceiuing that the people in some things did serue their turnes with the experience of them that were eloquent, & wiser then others, although they yet mistrusted their sufficiency, and had a speciall eye to them, plucking downe their courage, by taking their authoritie from them: as for proofe, the condemnation of Pericles, the banishment of Damon, and the miftrust they had of Antiphon RHAMNVSIAN, and moreover by that they did vnto Paches (that tookethe Ileof Lassos) who being brought before the Iudges in open councell to give vpan account of his charge, drew out his fword, and flue himselfe in presence of them all. Nicias, I say remembring these examples, sought euer to slie from those offices which were either too great ortoo small; and when he accepted any, had speciall regard to worke surely, and to venture nothing. Whereby all his enterprises that he tooke in hand, as we may easily coniccture, prospered maruellous well:but yet he imputed nothing to his owne wisdome, nor yet to his vertue and sufficiencie, but thanked fortune euer for all, and praying diligently to the gods, contented himfelfe to leffen his glory, and that onely to avoid envie: as the event of things falling out even in his time do sufficiently witnesse vntovs. For the citie of Athens having sustained many great losses and overthrowes, he was never a partie, nor had ought to do in any of them. As once for example: the Athenians were ouercome in Thracia by the Chalcidonians, how beit it was vnder the leading of calliades and Xenophon, who were their Captaines. Another time, the loffe they had in ATOLIA vnder the charge of Demosthenes. Moreouer, at DELIVM, a citic of Bo E ot 1 A, where they lost a thousand men at one conslict, Hippocrates then being General there. And as touching the plague, the greatest number laid the fault thereof to Pericles, who by reason of warres kept the men that came out of the countrey, within the wals of the citie of ATHENS: and fo by changing of aire, and their wonted manner of life, they fell into it. Now with noncof all these great troubles and misfortunes, was Nicias ever burthened: but contrariwise he being Captaine, tooke the Ile of CYTHERA, which the LACED EMONIANS inhabited, being an excellent place for fituation to moleft and deftroy the countrey of LACONIA. He wan divers cities that had rebelled in Thracia, and brought them once more vnder the obedience of A-THENS. At his first coming, having shut in the MEGARIANS within their wals, hee tooke the He of Mino At and at his departure thence, shortly after wan the hauen of Nise A also. Furthermore, landing in the country of the Corinthians, he ouercame them that offered him bartell, and flew a great number, and among others Lycophron the Captaine. At this battell he chanced to forget to bury two of his men that were flaine, whose bodies could not be found in ga-The law of thering vp of the reft: howbeit, fo foone as he heard of it, he caused all his sleet to stay, and sent an Herauld to the enemies, to pray leaue to fetch away those two bodies. Now, though by law of armes, they that fent to aske leaue to take away their dead to bury them, did thereby loie the honour of their victory, and were barred to fet vp any marke or token of triumph, because it see. med by the fuire, that they which had them in their power were conquerors, and not the petitioners that made request for them, which otherwise needed not to have made demained of them; Wicias not withfranding was contented rather to forfake the honour of his victory, then to leave the bodies of two of his countrimen in the field without buriall. So, after he had deftroyed althe coast of Laconia, and had our come certaine Laced Emonians that came against him in battel, he took the citie of THYREA, which the ÆGINETE'S kept at that time, whom he brought prisoners vnto Athens. And when the Peloponnesians had prepared great armies both by ica and by land to befrege the fort of Pyle, the which Demosthenes the Captaine had fortified: battell being given by fea, it chanced there remained foure hundred natural citizens of Sparta Within the Ile of Spacteria. Now the Athenians thought it anoble exploit of them (as indeed it was to take those four hundred aliue: howbeit the siege was very fore, because they lacked water even in the middeft of former, and were forced to fetch a maruellous compaffeto bring victuals to their campe; which when winter should be once come, would be very dangerous, and almost an impossible thing to do. Whereupon they then became fory, and repented them much that they had fent away the Ambassadors of the Laced Amonians which cameto them to treat of peace, and that they had (through Cleans procurement) suffered them to depart in that fort without refolution taken who was against them altogether onely to do Nicias adefpite, being his enemie, and did earneftly follicite the matter the LACEDZEMONIAN'S requefied. This was the cause why Clean perswaded the ATHENIANS, to result their offer of peace. But when the people faw that this fiege drew out in length, and that their campe suffered grieuous wantsand necessicies, then they fell out with cleon, and he againe burthened Nicias, saying, that through his feare he would let the befieged Spartas s escape, and that if he had bene Captaine, they should not have holden out solong. Thereupon the ATHENIANS saydaloudto Clean: And why doeft not thou go thither then to take them . Moreouer Nicias felfe alforifing vp, openly gaue him his authority to take this Pyle, and bad him leavie as many fouldiers as he would to go thither, and not to bragge with fuch impudent words where was no danger, but to doe fome notable feruice to the commonwealth. Cleon at the first shrunke backe, being amazed withall, little thinking they would have taken him fo fuddenly at his word: but in the end, perceiuing the people vrged him to it, and that Wicias also was importunate with him, ambition To enflamed him, that he not only tooke the charge upon him, but in a brauery fayd, that within twentie dayes after his departure he would either put all the Spartans to the fword, or bring them prisoners vnto Athens. The Athenians hearing Cleon fay so, had more luft to laugh agood, thento beleeue that he spake: for it was their manner euer to laugh at his anger and folly. For it is reported of him, that the people on a time being folemnly affembled in counfell early in the morning, to heare what Cleon wold fay, and having taried long for him, at the length he came with a garland on his head, and prayed the affembly to difmiffe the court till the next morning; for (quoth he) I shall not be at ley sure to day, because I have facrificed, and do feaftalfocertaine ftrangers my friends that are come to fee me. So the people burft out in a laughing, and brake vp the affembly. This notwithstanding, fortune fauoured him at that time, and he handled himselfe so well in this charge with Demosthenes, that he tooke all the Spartans clean vithat they befieged, within the time he had appointed, fauing fuch as were flaine: & hauing made dory of the them yeeld, brought them prisoners to ATHENS. This fell out greatly to Nicias shame and re- Lacedaproach. For it appeared not onely a casting away of his shield, but worse then that, a voluntarie monians. for faking of his prouince vpon a base timorous mind, giving his enemie occasion thereby to do fome noble exploit, deprining himselfe of his honourable charge. Wherefore Aristophanes mocketh him againe, in his comedie of birds, faying:

It is no time to fleepe and linger Still,

As Nicias doth without good cause or skill.

Also in another place of his comedie of plowmen, he faith:

I faine would follow husbandrie. Who lets thee? Marry you. A thousand Drachmas I will give to be discharged now

Of office in the common weale. Content fo shall we have

Two thousand Drachmas insi, with those which Nicias lately gane.

But herein Nicias did great hurt to the common wealth, fuffering Clean in that fort to grow to credit and estimation. For after that victorie, Cleon grew to so haughtie a mind and pride of him- The immofelfe, that he was not to be dealt with al; whereupon fell out the occasion of the great miseries that happened to the citie of ATHENS, which most grieved Nicias of all other. For Clean among to of them. ther things tooke away the modestie and reverence vsed before in publicke orations to the people he of all other was the first that cried out in his orations, that clapped his hand on his thigh, clems lead threw open his gowne, and flung vp and downe the pulpit as he spake. Of which example afterwards followed all licentious nessent and contempt of honestie, the which all the Orators and biprations, in the which all the Orators and biprations, the which all the Orators and biprations. counsellors fell into, that dealt in matters of state and commonwealth, and was in the end the ouerthrow of all together. In that very time began Alcibiades to grow to credit, by practife in the state, who was not altogether so corrupt, neither simply euill, but as they say of the land of Ægypt, that for the fatnesse and lustinesse of the soile:

It bringeth for 1h most wholesome berbes, and also noisome weeds:

Euenso Alcibiades wit excelling either in good or ill, was the cause & beginning of great change and alteration. For, it fell out, that after Nicias was rid of Cleon, he could not yet bring the city Alabiader of Athens againe to peace and quietnesse. For when the common wealth began to grow to divers wit. some rest and reasonable good order, then was it againe brought into warres, through Alcibiades extreame furie of ambition. And thus it beganne. The onely peace-breakers and diffurbers des extreame furie of ambition. And thus it beganne, i ne onery peace-breakers and differences of common quiet generally throughout GRECE, were these two persons, Cleon and Brasidas; Cleon and Brasidas; Brasidas, for warre cloked the wickednesse of the one, and aduanced the valiant nesse of the other, giving the sun to either occasion to do great mischiefe, and also opportunitie to worke many noble exploits. Peace brea-Now Clean and Brafidas being both flaine together at a battell fought by AMPHIPOLIS, Nicias kersener-flaint perceiving the Spannance land long defined peace and the the A fraight perceiuing the Spartans had long defired peace, and that the Athenians were no Green. more so hotly given to warres, but that both the one and the other had their hands full, and were willing to be quiet, denifed what meanes he might vic to bring Sparta and Athens to reconciliation againe, and to rid all the cities of GRECE also from broile and miseric of warre. that thenceforth they might altogether enion a peaceable and happy life. The rich men, the old men, and the husbandmen, he found very willing to hearken to peace and talking privately also with divers others, he had fo perswaded them, that he cooled them for being desirous of warre, Whereupon, putting the Spartans in good hope that all were inclined to peace, if they fought it, the Spartans beleeved him, not onely for that they had found him at other times very fort and courteous, but also because he was carefull to see that their prisoners of Sparta (who had benetaken at the fort of Pyle) were gently intreated, and had made their miserable captivitie more tollerable. So, peace was concluded betweene the Spartans and the Athenians for a Nicias reyeare, during which abstinence, they frequenting one another againe, and beginning to taste the consists sweetnesse and pleasures of peace, and the safety of free accesse one to see anothers friends that the spartage with the sp were strangers, began then to wishthat they might still continue in peace and amitic together, the Albewithout effusion of bloud of either partie; and tooke great delight in their dances, to heare them was. fing fuch fongs:

And let my speare be ouergrowne, with dustie spiders webs.

They did also with great ioy and gladnesseremember him which sayd, that in peace no sound of trumpet, but the crowing of a cockedoth wake them that be afleepe; and on the other fide; they cursed and tooke on with them that said it was predestined, the war should continue thrise nine yeres. And so voon a meeting together to talke of many matters, they made an vniuersalpeace throughout all GRECE. Now most men thought; that surely all their forrows and miseries were come to an end, and there was no talke of any man out of Nicias, faying, that he was a man beloued of the gods, who for his denotion towards them, had this special gift given him, that the greatest bleffing that could come vnto the world, was called after his name. For to confesses troth, enery man was certainly perswaded, that this peace was Nicias worke, as the warre was Pericles procurement, who vpon light causes perswaded the GRECIANS to run headlong into most grieuous calamities: and Nicias on the other side had brought them to become friends. and to forget the greathurts the one had received of the other in former warres. And even to this present day that peace is called Nicium, as who would fay, Nicios peace. The capitulations of the peace were thus agreed upon : that of either fide they should alike deliner up the cities & lands, which each had taken from other in time of wars, together with the prisoners also and that they should first make restitution, whose lot it was to begin. Nicias (according to Theophrastus report) for readic money fecretly bought the lot, that the LACED EMONIANS might be the first that should make restitution. And when the Corinthians and Bosofians that disliked of this peace, fought by the complaints they made, to renew the warre againe, Nicias then perfwaded both the ATHENIANS, and LACED EMONIANS, that they should adde for strength vito their countrey, the alliance and peace offensive and defensive made between them, for a more fure knot of friendship, whereby they might be the better assured the one of the other, and also the more dreadfull to their enemies that should rebell against them. These things went cleaneagainst Alcibiades mind; who besides that he was ill borne for peace, was enemie also vnto the La-CED #MONIANS, for that they lought to Nicias, & made none account of him, but despised him. Here was the occasion that caused Alesbiades to prooue from the beginning what he could do to hinder this peace, wherein he prevailed nothing. Yet shortly after, Alcibiades perceining that the AT HENIANS liked not fo well of the LACED EMONIANS as they did before, and that they thought themselues injured by them, because they had lately made league with the BOE OTIANS without their prinity, and had not wholly rendred up the cities of PANACTUM & AMPHIPOLIS according to the conditions articled betweene them; began then to enlarge and aggrauate the peoples complaints, and to make them offended with enery one of them. And furthermore he procured Ambatladors from the city of Argos to come to Athens, and to handled § matter, that the Athenians made league offensive and desensive with them. While these matters were thus in hand, there came to Athens also Ambassadors from Laced Emon, with full power & authority to fet all things at stay, and to compound all controuersies: who having first spoken with the Senate, propounding things vnto them both very honest and reasonable. Whereupon, Alcibiades being affraid that they letting the people vnderstand so much, should thereby bring them to yeeld to what they defired; he finely deceived the poore Ambassadours by this device. He promifed upon his oath to help them in that they went about, so far forth as they would not confesse themselves to have absolute power from the Ephores making them to beleeve it was the onely way to bring their matters to paffe. The Ambaffadours giving credite to his words, relied vpon him, and so forsooke Nicias. Whereupon Alcibiades brought them before the people, being set in counsell, and there demanded openly of them, whether they had full power and authoritie to accord all matters, yea, or no. Whereunto they make him answere with a loud voyce, that they had not. Thereupon Alcibiades, contrary both to their expectation, and his owne oath and promife made vnto them, began to call the counsell to witnesse, whether they did not in open Senate say the contrary, and so aduised the people not to trust nor give credit vnto such men, as were openly taken with fo manifest a lie, and that in one self matter would one while say one thing, another while another. It boots not to aske whether the Ambaffadours were much amazed to heare Alcibiades words: for Nicias himselfe wist not what to say to the matter, the fuddennesse of the cause did so confuse and grieue him, being a thing he least looked for. Now the people they were so moued besides, that they became indifferent whether to have sent for the Ambassadours of Argos presently to have made league with them, or not but there fell out an earth-quake vpon this matter, that greatly ferued Nicias turne and brake vp the affembly.

The people meeting agains in counfell the next morning, Nicias with all that he could doc or fav. could feant withhold them from making league with the Argives; and to get leauein the meanetime to go to the LACED EMONIANS, promifing he would make all well againe. Therupon, Nicias going to Spanta, was received and honoured there like a nobleman, and wide feet as one whom they thought well affected towards them: but for the rest, he prevailed nothing, dimbesses, as one whom they thought well affected towards them: but for the rest, he prevailed nothing, and being ouercome by these that fauoured the Bosotians, returned agains to Athensas spatia. he departed thence: where he was not only ill welcomed home, and worse effected, but was alfo in danger of his person, through the fury of the people, that at his request and counsell had redelinered fuch men prisoners, and so great a number of them. For indeed, the prisoners which Clean had brought to ATHENS from the fort of Pyle, were all of the chiefest houses of Sparta, and their kinfmen and friends were the noblest men of the citie. Notwithstanding, the people in the end did none other violence to him, faning that they chose Alcibiades their Captaine, and madeleague with the Elians, and Mantineans (which had revolted from the LAGED E. MONIANS) and with the Argives also: and sent pirates to the fort of Pyle, to spoyle the countrey of LACONIA. Vpon these occasions the ATHENIAN'S fell againe into wars. Now when the quarrell and controuerfie was greatest betweene Nicias and Alcibiades, the Ostracismon (to wit, There of the banishment for a time) came in, by the which the people banished for ten years any such the sheet fra of their citizens as they thought either of too great authoritie, or that was most enuied for his cifmon wealthand fub stance. Alcibiades and Ricias, were then not a little perplexed, confidering their present danger, being fure that the one of them two should not faile but be banished by this next banishment. For the people hated Alcibiades life, and were afraid of his valiantnesse: as we hauemore amply declared in the description of his life. And for Nicias, his wealth made him to beenuied befides they misliked his strange manner of dealing, being no more familiar nor conuerfant with the people then he was and counted him too stately moreouer they hated him also because in many matters he had spoken directly against the thing the people defired, and had enforced them against their wils to agree to that which was profitable for themselves. In fine, to fpeakemore plainly, there fell out great strife betweenethe yong menthat would have warres. &the old men that coueted peace, some defirous to banish Ricias, & some others Alcibiades; but Where discordreignes in realme or towne. The wicked win the chiefe renowne.

And so it fell out then. For the ATHENIANS being divided in two factions, gave authoritie to certaine of the most impudent & insolent persons that were in all the citie: and among them was one Hyperbolus of the town of Perithys, aman of no haufor nor value, why he should be bold: but yet one that grew to some credit and power, dishonouring his countrey by the honour they gauchim. How Hyperbolus thinking himfelfefree at that time from any danger of banishment. (hauing rather deserved the gallowes) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him well inough that remained behind: shewed openly that he was glad of their discord & variance, and bufily stirred vp the people against the both. Nicias & Alcibiades being acquain-& variance, and builty itired up the people against the both. Nicros & Acciorates being acquainted with his wicked practifes, having fecretly talked together, joyned both their factions in one:

Alcohades wherby they brought it so to passe, that neither of the were banished, but Hyperbolus selfe for ten inned years. Which matter for the present time made the people very mery, though afterwards it grie-tribes ued them much feeing their ordinance of the Oftracismon blemished by the vnworthines of the person: which punishment was an honor vnto him. For this banishment was thought a meet pu- Hyperson was nishment for Thucydides, Aristides, and such like men of accomptas they, or their like: but for forten Hyperbolus, it was thought too great an honour, and too manifest an occasion of glorie to be giyearst. uen to him, that for his wickednesse had the selfe same punishment, which was to be inslicted vpon the chiefest estates for their greatnesse. And the comicall Poet Plato himself saith in a place:

Although his tend behaviour deferu'd as much and more, Tetwas not that the punishment he should have had therefore, The Ostracic denised was for men of noble fame, And not for varlets, whose lewd life deserved open shame;

After this Hiperbolus, there was never man banished with the Offracismon. For himselfe was the last, as Hipparchus CHOLARGIAN, & nearest kinseman to the tyrant was the first. Sure, for- The taking tune is a very vncertaine thing, and without conceit of reason. For had Nicias frankly put himfelf to the hazard of this banishment against Alcibiades, one of these two things must needs have nithment.

happened him: either to have remained in the city with victorie, his adversarie being banished. or being conuict by his banishment, to have scaped those extreame miseries and calamities the which he afterwards fell into, besides the same he had wonne of a wise Captaine, though he had bene ouercome. I know notwithstanding that Theophrastus writeth, how Hyperbolus not Nician was banished through the diffention that fell betwixt Phaax and Alcibiades: albeit most writers agree with that I haue told you before. Now the Ambassadours of the Egestans and Leon-TINES being come to ATHENS, to perswade the ATHENIANS to attempt the conquest of Sy-CILIA, Nicias being against it, was ouercome by Alcibiades craft and ambition. For he, before they were called to counsell, had already through false surmizes filled the peoples heads with vaine hope and perswasion of conquest. Insomuch as the young men meeting in places of excercife, and the old men also in artificers shops, and in their compassed chaires, or halfe circles where they fate talking together, were enery one occupied about drawing the platforme of St-CILE, telling the nature of the SICILIAN fea, and reckoning vp the hauens and places looking towards Africke. For they made not their accompt that Sicile should be the end of their warres, but rather the store house and armorie for all their munition and martiall provision to make warreagainst the CARTHAGINIANS, and to conquer all AFRICKE, and consequently all the Africk B feas, enento Hercules pillars. Now all their minds being bent to warres, when Nicias spake against it, he found very few men of qualitie to stand by him. For the rich, fearing lest the people would thinke they did it to avoide charge and the cost they should be at about these warres, they held their peace, though indeed not contented withall: yet would not Nicial leave still to counsell them to the contrary. But when they had past the decree in counsell for the enterprise of Sicile, and that the people had chosen him chiefe Captaine, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to follow the same: at the next session of the counsell holden in the citie, Nicias rose vpagain, to fee if he could turne the people from this journey with all the protestations he could possibly make, burdening Alcibiades, that for his owne ambition and private commodities, he brought the common wealth into so farre and dangerous a warre. But all his words prevailed not. Himselfe before all others was thought the meetest man for this charge, partly, because of his experience, but chiefly for that they knew he wold handle their matters with greater fafety. when his timorous forefight should be joyned with Alcibiades valiantnesse, and with Lamachus foftnesse, which indeed most confirmed the election. Now after the matter thus debated, Demostratus one of the Oratours that most procured the ATHENIANS to vindertake this enterprise stepped foorth, and said: It were good that Nicias left off and set aside all these excuses and deuices, and preferred a decree, that the people should throughly authorize the Captaines that were chosen, to set forward and execute what they thought good, as well here as there, and so perswaded the people to passe & authorise it. Yet it is said that the Priests obiected many things to hinder the journey. But Alcibiades also having suborned certaine Soothsayers alledged in like case some ancient Oracles that said the Athenians should have great honour from Sicile: and further had enticed certaine pilgrimes, who faid they were but newly come from the Oracle of Iupiter Ammon, and had brought this Oracle thence: That the Athenians should take all the Syraculans. But worst of all, if any knew of contrary signes or tokens to come, they held their peace, lest it should seeme they intermedled to prognosticate euill for affections sake, seeing that the fignes themselves, which were most plaine and notorious, could not remove them from the enterprise of this iourney. As for example, the hacking and cutting of the Hermes and images of Mercurie, which in one night were all to be mangled, fauing one image onely called the Hermes of Andecides, which was given and confecrated in old time by the tribe of the ÆGEIDES, and was fet vp directly ouer against a citizens house called Andocides. Furthermore, the chance that happened by the altar of the twelue gods: where a man leaping fuddenly vpon it, after he had gone round about it, cut off his genitories with a stone. And in a temple also in the citie of DEL-PHE s, where was a little image of Minerna of gold, fet vpon a palme tree of copper, which the city of ATHENS had given of the spoiles won of the MEDES. Vpon that palm tree sate certaine crowes many daies together, and neuer left pecking and iobbing at the fruit of it, which was all of gold, until they made the fame to fall from the tree. But the ATHENIAN'S faid, that the DEL-PHIANS (whom the Syracus ans had fubdued) had finely fained this deuice. There was a prophecie also that commanded them to bring one of Mineruaes Nuns to ATHENS, that was in the citie of CLAZOMENES. So they fent for this Nun called Hefychia, which is, rest; and it feemeth it was that which the goddes by this proply fie did counfell them vnto, that for that time they thould be quiet. Meton the Aftronomer having charge in the army leavied for the war of Sici-1 E being afraide of this prophetic, or otherwife miffiking the celestiall signes and successe of the the made iourney, fained himselfe mad, and set his house on fire. Others say he counterseited not madnes, but did one night indeed set his house on fire, and that the next morning looking rufully on it, he officers. went into the market place as a man brought to pitiful flate, to fue to the people, that in confide mer. ration of his great misfortune hapned him, they would discharge his sonne of the voyage, who was to take charge of a gally at his own coft, and ready, to make faile. Moreover, the familiar foirit of wife Socrates that did vie to tel him before what should happen, told him then, that this iorney would fall out to the deftruction of ATHENS. Socrates told it to certaine of his very familiar friends, and from them the rumor became comon. And this also troubled a number of them, for the valueky daies on the which they did imbarke. For they were the very daies on the which the women celebrating the feaft and yeareday of Adonis death: and there were also in divers parts of the city, images of dead men caried to buriall, and women following them, mourning & lamenting. So that fuch as did put any confidence in those fignes, faid they misliked it much, and that they were afraid left the fame fignified, that all the goodly preparation of this army, (the which was fet out with fuch pompe and branery) would come to nothing. Now for Aicies, that he foake against this warre in open counsell, whilest they were deliberating upon it, and that he was not carried away with any vaine hope, nor puffed vp with the glory of fo honourable a charge to make him change his mind: therein furely he shewed himselfe an honest man, wife and constant. But when he saw plainly that he could by no perswasions remove the people from the enterprise of this war, neither yet by fitte nor intreaty get himself discharged from being a captaine therof. but that they would in any case make him one of the heads of the army : then was it out of time tobe fearfull, and still giving backe, turning his head so oft like a child to looke upon his gally behind him, and ever to be telling that no reason could be heard in determining of his journey. For indeed this was enough to discourage his companions, and to marre all at the first setting out: histories where, to fay truly, he should suddenly have set vpon his enemics, and have gone to it with a lusty sold sold suddenly have set vpon his enemics. courage to have affayed fortune. But he tooke a cleane contrary course. For when Lamachus thought good at their first coming to go straight to Syracys a, and to give them battel as neare the wals as might be, and that Alcibiades on the other fide was of opinion, first of all to go about towin the cities that were in league with the Syracvsans, and after that they had made them rebel, then to go against the Syracysans themselves: Nicias to the contrary spake in counsell, and thought it better to go on faire and fof ly, descrying the coasts of Sicile round about to Wide view their gallies and preparation, and fo to returne firaight to ATHEN's againe, leaving onely a counted for few of their men with the EGESTANS, to helpe to defend them. But this from the beginning the Syracu maruellously cooled the courage of the foldiers, and quite discouraged them. Shortly after also fam. the Athentans having fent for Alcibiades to answer to certaine accusations, Nicias remaining captaine with Lamachus (the other captaine in fight, but Nicias selfe in power and authority the Lieutenant generall of all the army)ftill vseddelaies, running vp and downe, and spending time folong in confultation, till the fouldiers were left without both hope and courage and the feare the enemie had of them at their first coming to see so great an armie, was now in manner cleane gone. Yet Alcibiades being in the armie, before he was fent for from ATHENS, they went with threescore gallies to Syrac vsa, of the which they placed fiftie in battell ray out of the hauen, and fent the other ten into the hauen to discouer: which approaching neare the citic, caused an Heraldto make open proclamation, that they were come thither to restore the LEONTINES to their lands and possessions, and tooke a ship of the enemies, in the which among other things they found tables, wherein were written the names of all the inhabitants of Syracvsa, according to their tribes and houses. These tables were kept far from the city, in the temple of Iupiter Olympian, but at that time they had fent for them to know the number of men of feruice, and of age to beare weapon. The same tables being taken by the ATHENIANS, and caried to the Generals of the army: the foothfayers feeing this long rolle of names, at the first misliked it, fearing lest the prophesie had ben fulfilled, which promised them, that the ATHENTANS one day should take all the Syracusans. Howbeit it is reported this prophelie came to passe in another exploit, when Callippus ATHENIAN hauing slaine Dion, wonne all the citie of Syracysa. Now when Alcibiades was gone from the campe, Nicias bare all the fway, and commanded the whole armie. For Lamachus, though other wife he was a frout man, an honest man, and very valiant of his hands, and one that would not spare himselfe in time of need: neuerthelesse he was fo poore and miserable, that even when he was in state of a Generall, and gave vp an account of his expences, he would not sticke to put into his bookes, so much for a gowne, and so much for a paire of pantophles. Where Nicias authoritie and reputation contrariwife was of another maner of cut, as well for other respects, as for his riches, and for the honour of many noble things which he had done before. As one namely which they tell of him, that on a time being a Cap. taine with others, and fitting in councell with his companions in the councell house at ATHENS about the dispatch of certaine causes he spake vnto Sophocles the Poet, then present among them and bade him speake first and say his opinion, being the oldest man of all the whole company. Sophocles answered him againe: Indeed I confesse I am the oldest man, but thou art the noblest man, and him whom every man regardeth best. So having at that time Lamachus vnder him.a better Captaine and man of warre then himselfe was, yet by being so slow to imploy the army vnder his charge, by deferring of time still, and houering about Sicile as far from his enemies as he could the first gaue the enemies time and leisure to be bold without feare of him. And then going to befrege Hybla, being but a pelting little towne, and raising the siege without taking of it: he fell into to great a contempt with every man, that from thenceforth no man almost made any more reckoning of him. At last, he retired to Carana with his army, without any other exploit done, fauing that he tooke HYCCARA, a baggage village of the barbarous people, and where it is faid Lais the curtifan was borne, and that being then a yong girle, she was fold among other prisoners, and afterwards caried into Peloponnesvs. And in fine, the sommer being far earned out spent, Nicion was informed that the Syracvs and had taken such courage to them, that they would come and enterprise the charge upon them first and that their horsemen were approched already before his campe, to skirmish with them, asking the ATHENIANS in mockery, if they were come into Sicile to dwell with the CATANIANS, or to restore the LEONTINES to their lands againe. Hereupon with much ado, Nicias determined to go to SYRACVSA, and because he would campe there in safety, and at ease without hazard: he sent one of CATANA before to Syracv sa, to tell them (as if he had bene a spie) that if they would suddenly come and set v-Nicias no pon the campe of the ATHENIANS and take all their carriage, he wishest them to come withall their power to Catana at a day certaine which he would appoint them. For the Athenians (said he) for the most part are within the city, wherein there are certaine citizens, which sauouring the Syracusans, have determined so soone as they heare of their comming, to keepe the gates of the citie, and at the same time also to fet the Athenians ships on fire: and how there were also a great number in the citic of this confederacy, that did but look every hourefor their coming. And this was the nobleft stratageme of warre, that Nicias showed all the time hoewas in Sicile. For by this device he made the Syracvsans come into the field with all their power, so that they left their citie without guard: and he himselfe departing in the meanetime from CATANA with all his fleete, wonne the hauen of Syracys at his ease, and chose out a place to campe in, where his enemics could not hurt him: in the which he was both the stronger, and of Strates might without let or difficulty fet vpon them with that wherein he most trusted. The Syracv. SANS returning straight from CATANA, and offering him battel hard by the wals of Syracvsa, he came out into the field, and ouerthrew them. There were not many of the SYRACVSANS flaine at this battel, because their horsemen did hinder the chase: but Nicias breaking vp the bridges vpon the river, gave Hermocrates occasion to mocke him. For comforting and encouraging the Syracus Ans, he told them Nicias deferued to be laughed at, because he did what he could that he might not fight, as if he had not purposely come from Athens to Syracvsa, to fight. This not with standing, he made the Syracusans quake for feare: for where they had then fifteene Captaines, they chose out three only to whom the people were sworne, that they wold fuffer them to have full power and authority to command and take order for all things. The temple of Iupiter Olympian was hard by the ATHENIANS campe, which they would gladly have taken, for that it was full of rich iewels and offerings of gold and filuer, given vnto the temple aforetime. But Nicias of purpose still draue offtime, and delayed so long, till the Syracvsans at last sent a good garrison thither to keepe it safe thinking with himselfe, that if his souldiers came to take and spoile the temple, his countrey should be nothing the richer by it, and himselfe befides should beare all the blame of sacriledge. So, having obtained victory without profit, (which ran ftraight through SICILE) within few days after he returned vnto the city of NAXOS, where he lay all the winter confuming a wonderful maffe of victuals with fo great an army for the doing of things of finall moment, vpon certaine Sigilians that yeelded to him. The Syracysans in the meane time being in heart againe and couragious, returned to Catana, where they spoiled and ouerran all the country, and burnt the camp of the Athenians. Wherefore energy man blamed Nicias much, because through his long delay and protracting of time to make all things fure, helet flip fundry occasions of notable exploits, wherein good service might have benedone. Yet when he would do a thing indeed, he did it fothoroughly as no man could take exception to his doings, for that he brought it to fo good a paffer and once taking it in hand, he did execute it with all speed, though he was both flow to determine and a coward to enterprise. Now when heremoued his army to returne to Syracvsa, he brought it fo orderly, and alfo with to with fuch speed and safety, that he was come by sea to Thap sys, had landed and taken the fort signs sy of Epipolis, before the Syracvsans had any intelligence of it, or could possibly help it. For the rainfa. choilemen of the Syracvsan's being fet out against him, hoping to have stopped his passage. he overthrew them, tooke three hundred prisoners, and made their horsemen file, which beforewere thought inuincible. But that which made the Syracy sans most afraid, and seemed most wonderfull also to the other GRECIANS, was this; that in a very short space he had almost entironed Synacus a with a wall, which was as much in compasse about, as the wals of A- Nicion well THENS, and worse to performe, by reason of the woody country, and for the sea also that beateth vponthe wals, besides that there were divers marishes hard by it. & yet (fick as he was of the of Strains stone) he had almost finished it. And sure good reason it is that we attribute the fault of the not finishing of it, vnto his ficknesse. For mine owne part I wonder maruellously both of the care and diligence of the Captaine, and of the valiantnesse and dexteritie of the souldiers, which appeareth by the notable feats they did. For Euripides after their overthrow and vtter ruine, made a funerall Epitaph in verse, and said thus:

Eight times our men did put the men of Syracuse to flight, So long as with indifferencie the gods did vee their might.

But we find it written, that the SYRACVSANS were not onely eight times, but many times more ouerthrowne by them: a time at length there was indeed, that both the gods and fortune fought against them, even when the ATHENIANS were of greatest power. Now Nicias in his owne person was ever in the greatest and most weightie affaires, striving with his sicke body. Howbeitone day when his difease grew fore vpon him, he was compelled to be lodged in his campe with a few of his men: and Lamachus in the meane time alone having charge of the whole army, fought with the Syrac vsans, who then had brought a wall fro the city, vnto the wall with the which the Athenians had purposed to have that them in to keepe that they should not compasseit round. And because the ATHENIANS commonly were the stronger in these skirmishes, they many times ouer rashly followed the chase of their enemies that sled as it chanced one day that Lamachus went so farre, that he was left alone to encounter a company of horsemen of the citic, before whom Callierates marched foremost, a valiant man of his hands, who challenged Lamachus hand to hand. Lamachus abode him, and in the conflict was first hurt: but he gaue Callicrates also such a wound therewith all that they both fell downe dead presently in the place. The death Atthattime the Syrac vsans being the stronger side, tooke vp his body, & caried it away with of them: but they spurred out for life to the Athenians campe, where Nicias lay sicke, without chus. any guard or fuccor at all:neuertheleffe Nicias role with speed out of his bed, and perceiving the danger he wasin, commanded certaine of his friends to fet the wood on fire which they had brought within the trenches of the camp, to make certaine deuices for batterie, and the engines of timber alforhat were already made. That device onely flayed the Syracvsans, faued Ni. cias, and the strength of their camp, together with all the silver and carriage of the Athenians. For the Syraevsans perceiuing afarre off, betwixt them and the strength of their campe, such a great flame as rose vp in the aire, vpon the sight of it turned taile straight, and made towards their citie. Things falling out thus, Wisias being left fole Captaine of the armic with- Nicky Gle out any companion, in great hope not with standing to do some good: diverse cities of Sier- Garage of LE yeelded vnto him, ships fraught with corne came out of euery quarter to his campe, and mashe whole

Golippus a their city any longer against him. Gylippus also a Captaine of the Laced Emonians, com-Lacedamo ming to aide the Syracusans, understanding by the way how the city of Syracusan was man aideli he syracu. Shut in with a wall round about, and in great distresse: held on his voyage not with standing, nor with any hope to defend Sicile (Supposing the Athenians had wonne the whole countries) but with intent neuertheleffe to help the cities of ITALY, if he could possibly. For it was a common rumour abroad, that the ATHENIANS had wonne all, and that their Captaine for his wif. dome and good fortune was inuincible. Nicias himselfe now contrary to his wonted wisdome and forefight, trufting altogether to the good fuccesse which he saw to follow him, but specially beleeuing the reports that were told him of Syracvsa, and the newes that were brought him thence by fome of themselues which came secretly vnto him, perswading himselse that within few dayes he should have Syracvs a by composition, tooke no care to with stand Gylippus Coming thither, neither fent any man to keep him from landing in Sicile. By which negligence Gylippus landed in a paffenger, without Nicias knowledge: fo finall reckoning they made of him. and so much they did fondly despise him. Gylippus being thus landed farre from Syraces a, beganne to gather men of warre together, before the Syracvsans themselves knew of his landing, or looked for his coming: infomuch as they had already appointed the affembly of a councell to determine the articles and capitulations of peace, which they should conclude you with Nicias. Moreover, there were some that persuaded they should do well to make haste to conclude the peace, before the inclosure of Nicias wall was altogether finished, which then lacked not much to performe, having all the ftuffe for the purpole brought euen ready to the place. But as the fethings were even thus a doing, arrived one Gongylus at Syracvs A, that came from Corinth with a galley. At whose landing, the people vponthe peere flocking about him, to heare what newes he told them that Gylippu would be there before it were long, and that there came certaine other gallies after to their aid. The SYRACYSAN'S would hardly beleeue him, vntill there came another messenger also sent from Gylippus selfe of purpose, that willed them to arme, and come to him into the field. Thereupon the Syracv san's being maruellously remined went all straight and armed themselues. And Gylippus was no sooner come into Syracvsa, but arrived at he presently put his men in battel ray, to set vpon the ATHENIANS. Nicias for his part had like. wife also fet the ATHENIANS in order of batell, and ready to fight. When both the armies were now approached neare to each other, Gylippus threw downehis weapons, and fent a heraldynto Nicias to promise them life and baggage to depart safely out of Sicile. But Nicias would make the herald none answer to that message. Howbeit there were certaine of his souldiers that in mockeric asked the herald, if for the coming of a poore cape and wand of LACEDEMON, the Syracvs ans thought themselves strengthened so much, that they should despise the A-THENIANS, which not long before kept three hundred LACED EMONIANS prisoners in irons, farre stronger and more haire on their heads then Gylippus had, and had also sent them home to their citizens at LACED & MON. And Timeus writeth alfo, that the SICILIAN'S themselves, made no reckoning of Gylippus, neither then, nor at any time after. After, because they faw his extreme coueroufnesse and miseric and then, for that he came so meanely apparelled, with a threed-bare cape, and a long bush of haire, which made them form him. Yet in another place he faith, that fo foon as Gylippus arrived in Sicile, many came to him out of every quarter with very goodwil like birds wondering at an Owle. This fecond report feemeth truer then the first for they swarmed about him, because in this cape & wand they saw the rokens of the maiesty of the city and feigniory of Sparta, Thucydides also faith, that it was Gylippus only that did all there, And much like doth Philistus felf a Syracus an confesse, who was present then in person, and saw all things that were done. Not with standing at the first battel § AT HENIANS had the upper hand, & slue a number of the Syracvs ans, among the which Gongylus the Corinthian was one. But the next morning following, Gylsppus made them know the skill and experience of a wife Captaine. For the Corinwith the felfe fame weapons, with the fame men, with the fame horses, and in the same places, changing oncly the order of his battell, he overthrew the ATHENIANS: and (fighting with them still) having driven them even into their campe, he set the Syracy sans a worke to build vp a wall ouerthwart, (with the very felfe fame stones and stuffe, which the ATHENIANS had brought and laid there for the finishing of their inclosure) to cut off the other, and to keepe it from going forward, that it iouncd not together. So, all that the Athenians had done before wntill that prefent, was viterly to no purpose. Things standing in these termes, the Syracvsans being couragious againe, beganne to arme gallies; and running vp and downe the fields with their horfemen and flaues, tooke many prisoners. Gylippus on the other fide, went in person to and fro through the cities of Sicil B, perswading & exhorting the inhabitants in such fort, that they all willingly obeyed him, and tooke armes by his procurement. Nicias feeing things thus fall out, fell to his old trade againe; and confidering the change of his flate and former good Nicias lucke, his heart beginning to faint, wrote straight to the ATHENIANS to send another armie into 2004/0014118 Sicil B, or rather to call that home which he had there, but in any case to give him leave to returne, and to discharge him of his office, for cause of his sicknesse. The ATHENIANS were indisferent before hee wrote, to fend aide thither; how beit the enuie the nobilitie bare vnto Nicios good fortune, did euer cause some delay that they sent not vntil then, and then they determined to fend with speed. So Demosthenes was named to be sent away immediatly after winter, with agreat nauic. In the middest of winter Eurymedon went to Nicias, and caried him both money and newes, that the people had chosen some of them for his companions in the charge, which were already in service with him, to wit, Euthydemus and Menander. Now Nicias in the meane Euthyde time being suddenly affailed by his enemies both by sea & land; though at the first he had tewer Menander gallies in number then they, yet he budged divers of theirs, and funkethem. But by land againe, shofen caphe could not aide his men in time, because Gylippus at the first onset had taken a fort of his called Nistes. Plemmyrion, within the which lay the store & tackle for many gallies, and a great masse of readiemony, which was wholy loft. Befides, in the same conflict also were many men staine, and many taken prisoners. Yet further, the greatest matter of weight was, that therby he tooke from Nicias the great commoditie he had to bring his victuals fately by fea to his campe. For while the Athenian's kept this fort, they might at their pleasure bring victuals without danger to their campe, being couered with the fame : but then they had loft it, when it was hard for them foto do, because they were ever driven to fight with i enemies that lay at anker before the fort. Furthermore, the Syracvsans did not thinke that their armie by fea was ouerthrowne, because their enemies were the stronger, but for that their men had followed the Athenians disorderedly: and therefore were defirous once againe to venture, in better fort and order then before. But Wicras by no meanes would be brought to fight againe: faying, that it were a madneffe, looking for fuch a great name and a new fupply as Demosibenes was comming withall, rashly to fight with a fewer number of ships then they, and but poorly furnished. But contrarily, Menander and Euthydemus newly promoted to the state of Captaines with Nicias, being pricked forwards with ambition against the two other Captaines (Nicias and Demostheres that was then coming (defired to preuent Demosthenes, in performing some notable service before his arrival, and thereby also to excell Nicias doings: Howbeit the cloke they had to couer their ambition withal was, the honor and reputation of the citie of Athens, the which (faid they) were flamed & difhonored for euer, if they now should shew the selucs afraid of the Syracysans, who provoked them to fight. Thus brought they Nicias against his will to battel, in the which the ATHENIANS were flaine and ouercome, by the good counfell of a Corint Hian pylot called Ariffon. For the leftwing of their battell (as Thucydides writeth) was clearely ouerthrowne, and they loft a great number of their men. Wherupon Nicios was wonderfully perplexed, confidering on the one fide that he had taken maruellous paines, whilst he was sole Captaine of the whole army: and on the other fide for that he had committed a foule fault, when they had given him companions. But as Nicias was in this great despaire, they descried Demosthenes vpon a peere of the hauen, with his vemosities feet brauly fet out and furnished, to terrific the enemies. For he had threescore and thirteen gallies and in them he brought a thousand to the man well arread and apprising a State of the state of lies, and in them he brought 5 thousand footmen well armed and appointed, & of darters, bowmen, and hurlers with flings, about 3 thousand, and the gallies trimmed and set forth with goodly armors, numbers of enfignes, and with a world of trumpers, howboies, and such marine mufick, and all fet out in this triumphant shew, to feare the enemics the more. Now though the Sy-RAGVS ANS themselves againe in a pecke of troubles, perceiving they stroug against the streame, and confumed themselues to no purpose, when by that they saw there was no likelihood to be deliuered from their troubles. And Nicias also rejoyced, that so great aide was come, but his joy DemoRhe. held not long; for so soone as he began to talke with Demosthenes of the state of things, he found him bent forthwith to fet vpon the Syracy sans, and to hazard all with speed, that they might quickly take Syracvsa, and so dispatch away home againe. Nicios thought this more hast then good speed, and feared much this foole-hardinesse. Whereupon he prayed him to attempt no-Bbb

554 thing raffly nor desperately and perswaded him that it was their best way to prolong the warre against the enemies, who were without money, and therefore would soone be fortaken of their confederates. And besides, if they came once to be pinched for lacke of victuals, that they would then quickly feek to him for peace, as they had done aforetime. For there were many within Sy-RACVS A that were Nicias friends, who wished him to abide time: for they were weary of warre. and waxed angry also with Gylippus. So that if they were but straighted a little more with want ofvictuals, they would yeeld straight. Nicias deliuering these perswasions some what darkly, and keeping somewhat also from vtterance, because he would not speake them openly, made his colleagues thinke he spake it for cowardlinesse, and that he returned againe to his former delaies to keepeall in fecuritie, by which manner of proceeding he had from the beginning killed the hearts of his armie, for that he had not at his first comming set vpon the enemies, but had protracted time so long, till the courage of his souldiers was cold and done, & himselfe also brought into contempt with his enemies. Whereupon the other Captaines (his colleagues and companions with him in the charge) Euthydemus and Menander, flucketo Demosthenes opinion: whereunto Nicias was also forced against his wil to yeeld. So Demosthenes the self same night taking the footmen, went to assault the fort of Epipolis; where, before his enemies heard any thing of his comming, he flue many of them, and made the rest flie that offered resistance. But not content with this victory, he went farther, till he fell vponthe Bogotians. They gathering themselnes together, were the first that resisted the Athenians, basing their pikes with such fury and loud cries, that they caused the former to retire, and made all the rest of the assailants affraid and ama. zed. For the formost slying backe, came full vpon their companions; who taking them for their enemies, & their flight for a charge, refifted them with all their force, and so mistaking one ano. ther, both were wounded and flaine; and the hurt they meant vnto their enemies, did vnfortunatly light vpon their own fellowes. For this multitude meeting thus confufedly together, what through their great feare, and what for that they could not differne one another in the night, the which was neither so dark that they could not see at all, nor yet so cleare, as they might certainly indge by fight what they were that met them : (for then the Moone declined apace, & the small light it gaue was diffused with the number of men that ran to and fro) the feare they had of the enemic, made them mistrust their friends. All these troubles and disaduantages had the Athe-NIANS, and beside the Moone on their backs, which causing the shadow to fall forward, did hide their number, and gliftering of armor: and contrarily, the enemies targets glaring in their eyes by the reflection of the Moone that shone vpon them, increased their fe re, and made them seeme a greater number and better appointed then they were indeed. At last, the enemies giving a lusticcharge vpon them on euery side, after they once began to give backe and turne taile, some were flaine by their enemics, others by their owne companie, and others also brake their neckes The flaughfalling from the rocks. The reft that were dispersed abroad in the fields, were the next morning euery.man of them put to the fword by the horfemen. So the account made, two thousand A-THENIANS were flaine, and very few of them escaped by flight, that brought their armors back againe. Wherefore Nicias that alwaies mistrusted it would thus come to passe, was maruellously offended with Demosthenes, and condemned his rashnesse. But he excusing himselfe as well as he could, thought it best to imbarke in the morning betimes; and so to hoise saile homewards. For, faid he, we must look for no new aid from ATHENS, neither are westrong enough with this army to ouercome our enemies; and though we were, yet must we of necessity avoid the place we are in, because (as it is reported) it is alwaies vnwholsome for an army to campe in, and then specially most contagious, by reason of the autumne and season of the yeare, as they might plainly fee by exptrience. For many of their people were already ficke, and all of them in maner had no mindto tary. Nicias in no case liked the motion of departing thence, because he feared nor the Syracvsans, but rather the Athenians, for their accusations & condemnatio. And therfore in open counfell he told them, that as yet he faw no fuch danger to remaine: and though there were, yet that he had rather die of his enemies hands, then be put to death by his owne countrimen. Being therein of a contrary mind to Leo BIZANTINE, who after that, faid to his citizens: I had rather fuffer death by you, then to be flaine with you. And furthermore, as for remooning their campe to some other place, they should have leifure enough to determine of that matter as they thought good. Now when Nicias had deliuered this opinion in counfell, Demosthenes having had ill lucke at his first comming, durst not contrary it. And the residue also supposing that Nicios flucke not fo hard against their departure, but that he relied you the trust and confidence he had of fome within the citie: they all agreed to Nicias. But when newes came that there was a new supply come vnto the Syracy sans, & that they faw the plague increased more and more in their campe: then Nicias selfe thought it best to depart thence, and gaue notice to the fouldiers to prepare themselves to ship away. Notwithstanding, when they had putal things in readinesse for their departure, without any knowledge of the enemie, or suspition thereof: the Moone began to eclipse in the night, and suddenly to lose her light, to the great feare of Nicios and divers others, who through ignorance and superstition quaked at such sights. For, of the touching the eclipse & darknesse of the Sunne, which is ever at any conjunction of the Moone, Moone, every common person then knew the cause to be the darknesse of the body of the Moone betwixt the Sunne and our fight. But the eclipse of the Moone it selfe, to know what doth darken it in that fort, and how being at the full it doth suddainely lose her light, and change into so many kinds of colours: that was aboue their knowledge; and therfore they thought i very strange; Moone perswading themselves that it was a signe of some great mischiefes the gods did threaten vnto men. For Anaxagoras, the first that ever determined and delivered any thing for certaine and alfured, concerning the light and darknesse of the Moone, his doctrine was not then of any long Anaxago. continuance, neither had it the credit of antiquitie, nor was generally knowne but only to a few, the first who durst not talke of it, but with feare, even to them they trusted best. And the reason was, for the property who durst not talke of it, but with feare, even to them they trusted best. And the reason was, for that the people could not at that time abide them that professed the knowledge of naturall Phi- of the celliffe losophic, and inquired of the causes of things: for them they called then Mercanos for me as much to of the fay, as curious inquirers and tatlers of things aboue the reach of reason, done in heaven and in the aire. Because the people thought they ascribed that which was done by the gods only, vnto certaine naturall and necessary causes that worke their effects not by prouidence nor will, but by force & necessarie consequences. For these causes was Protagoras banished fro Athens, & Anaxagoras put in prison: from whence Pericles had much ado to procure his deliuerie. And Socrates niam dee also, though he did not meddle with that part of Philosophie, was not withstanding put to death perfective for the suspinion therof. In fine, the doctrine of Plato being received and liked, as well for his vertuous life, as also for that he submitted the necessitie of natural causes vntothe controlment and Socrates disposition of divine power, as vnto a more excellent and supreame cause: tooke away all the ill passo opinion which the people had of fuch disputations, and gaue open passage and free entry vnto philosophie the Mathematicall sciences. And therefore Dion, one of Platoes scholers and friends, an eclipse of the Moone chancing even at the very fame time that he was weying vp his ankers to faile from Dion very ZAZYNTHE, to make warre with the tyrant Dyonifus: being nothing afraid nor troubled therewithall, made faile notwithstanding, and when he cametos yracvsa, draue out the tyrant, But causes. then it fell out vn fortunately for Nicias, who had no expert nor skilful Sooth fayer: for the party which he was wont to vie for that purpose, and which tooke away much of his superstition, called Stilbides, was dead not long before. For this figne of the cclipfe of the Moone (Philochorus faith) was not hurtfull for men that would flie, but contrarily very good; for faid he, things that men do in feare, would be hidden, and therefore light is an enemie vnto them. But this not withflanding, their custome was not to keepe the felues close about three daies in such eclipses of the Moone and Sun, as Autoclides selfe prescribeth in a booke he made of such matters: where Nicias bare them then in hand, that they should tarie the whole and full revolution of the course of the Moone, as though he had not feene her straight cleare againe, after shee had once passed the shannaturalt dow & darknesse of the earth. But all other things laid aside and forgotten, Nicias disposed himfelfe to facrifice vnto the gods:vntll fuch time as the enemies came again as well to befrege their forts, and all their campe by land, as also to occupie the whole hauen by sea. For they had not onely put men aboord into their gallies able to weare armour, but moreouer young boyes into fisher boats and other light barkes, with the which they came to the ATHENIANS, and shamefully reuiled them, to procure them to fight: among the which there was one of a noble house, called Heraclides, whose boate being forwarder then his companions, was in danger of taking by a gallie of the ATHENIANS, that rowed against him. Pollichus his vncle being afraid of it, lanby a gallie of the Athenians, that rowed against him: Pollichus his vncie being arraid of 12, 1811the Syrached forward with ten gallies of Syrac vs a for his rescue, of the which himselfe was Captaine.

The Syrached forward with ten gallies of Syrac vs a for his rescue, of the which himselfe was Captaine. The other gallyes doubting also lest Pollichus should take hurt, came on likewise amaine: so come like that there fellout a great battell by fea, which the Syracvsans wanne, and flue Eurymedon atheniane the Captaine, and many other. This made the fouldiers of y ATHENTANS fo afraid, that they beganto cry out, it was no longer tarrying, there and that there was none other way but to depart thence by land. For after the Syracvsans had won that battell they had ftraight shurvo the hauens mouth. Nicias could not consent o such a retire : for, said he, it would be too greata shame for them to leaue their gallies and other ships to the enemie, considering the number not to be much lesse then two hundred: but he thought good rather to arme a hundred and tengallies with the best and valiantest of their footmen, and darters, that were in the armic, because the other galleyes had spent their owers. And for the rest of the armie, Nicias for saking their great campe and walles which reacheth as far as the temple of Hercules) did fet them in battell rav vpon the peere of the hauen. Insomuch as the Syra evsans which vntill that day could not performe their wonted facrifices vnto Hercules, did then fend their Priests and Captaines thither to do them. The fouldiers being imbarked into the gallies, the Priests and Soothsayers came and told the Syracvs ans, that vindoubtedly the figures of the facrifices did promife them a noble victorie, so that they gaue no charge, but onely stood vpon their defence: for so did Hercules euer ouercome, defending when he was affailed. With this good hope the Syracysans rowed forward, and there was such a hote and cruell battell by sea, as had not beene in all this warrebefore: the which was as dreadfull to them that stood on the shore to behold it, as it was mortall vnto them that fought it, feeing the whole conflict, and what alteration fell out beyond all expectation. For the ATHENIANS did as much hurt themselves by the order they keptin their fight, & by the rankes of their ships, as they were hurt by their enemies. For they had placedall their great ships together, fighting with the heavy against the enemies that were light and fwift, which came on on every fide of them, hurling stones at them, which were made sharpe to wound how euer they lighted wheras the ATHENIANS only casting their darts, and vsing their bowes and flings, by meanes of their rowing vp and downe, could not lightly aime to hit with entities ever the head. That manner of fight Arifto a Corinthian (an excellent ship-master) had taught the some on the Syracysans, who was himselfe flaine valiantly fighting, when they were conquerors. The Syraufan. Athenians thereupon being driven to fight, having sustained a maruellous flaughter & overthrow, (their way to flie by sea being also clearcly taken from them) and perceiving moreouer that they could hardly faue thefelues by land: were then fo discouraged, as they made no loncer refistance, whe their enemics came hard by them and caried away their ships before their faces. Neither did they aske leaue to take up their dead mens bodies to bury the, taking more pity to for sake their diseased & sore wounded companions, then to bury them that were already staine. When they considered althesethings, they thought their own state more miserable then theirs, which were to end their lives with much more cruelty, then was their miserie present. So they being determined to depart thence in the night, Gylippus perceiuing the Syracusans through all the city disposed themselves to sacrifice to the gods, and to be merry, as well for the joy of their victory, as also for Hercules feast: thought it bootlesse to perswade them, and much lesse to compell them to take armes vpon a sudden, to set vpon their enemies that were departing. Howbeit Hermocrates deuising with himselfe how to deceiue Nicias, sent some of his friends vnto him with instructions, to tell him that they came from such as were wont to send him secret intelligence of all things during this war : and willed him to take heed not to depart that night, left he fel into the ambushes which the Syracusans had laid for him, having sent before to take al the straights and passages, by the which he should passe. Nicias being ouerreached by Hermocrates craft and subtiltie, staied there that night, as though he had bene afraid to fall within the danger of his enemics ambush. Thereupon the Syracvsans the next morning by peepe of day, hoiffed faile, got the straights of Nielas passage, stopped the rivers mouths, and brake vp the bridges: and then cast their horsmen in a squadron in the next plaine fields adioyning, so that the ATHE-NIANS had no way left to escape and passe by them without fighting. At last not with standing, having frayed all that day and the next night following, they put themselues in journey, and departed with great cries and lamentations, as if they had gone from their naturall countrey, and not out of their enemies land, as well for the great distresse and necessity wherin they were (lacking all things needfull to sustaine life,) as also for the extreame forrow they felt, to leave their fore wounded companions and diseased kinsemen and friends behind them, that could not for their weaknesse follow the campe, but specially for that they looked for some worse matter to fall to themselues, then that which they saw present before their ejesto be happened unto their fellowes. But of all the most pitifull fightes to behold in that campe, there was none more lamentable lamentable nor miserable, then the person of Nicias self: who being tormented with this disease. and waxen very leane and pale, was also vnworthily brought to extreame want of natural suffer nance, euen when he had most neede of comfort, being very fickely. Yet notwithstanding his miline. weaknesse and infirmitie, he tooke great paines, and suffered many things which the soundest bodies do labour much to ouercome and fuffer: making it appeare evidently to every man, that he did not abide all that paines for any respect of himselfe, or defire that he had to save his own life fo much as for their fakes, in that he yeelded not vnto present despaire. For where the soldiers for very feare and forrow burst out into teares and bitter wailing, Nichas selfe shewed, that if by chance he were forced at any time to doe the like, it was rather youn remembrance of the than eand dishonour that came into his minde, to see the vnfortunate successe of his voyage, in fleed of the honour and victorie they hoped to have brought home, then for any other respect. But if to fee Nicias in this miferie, did mone the lookers on to pity: yet did this much more increase their compassion, when they remembred Nicias words in his orations continually to the people, to breake this journey, and to diffwade them from the enterprise of this warre. For the they plainely judged him norto have descrued these troubles. Yet furthermore, this caused the fouldiers viterly to dispaire of helpe from the gods, when they considered with themselues, that fo denout and godly a man as Nicras (who left nothing vndone that might tend to the honour and feruice of the gods) had no better fuccesse, then the most vile and wicked persons in all the whole armie. All this not withflanding, Nicias ftrained himtelfe in all that might be, both by his good countenance, his cheerefull words, and his kindvfing of enery man; to let them know that he fainted not under his burthen, nor yet did yeeld to this misfortune and extreame calamitie. And thus travelling eight daies journey out-right together, not with standing that he was by the way continually fet your wearied and hurtivet he euer maintained his bands, & led them whole in company, yntill that Demosthenes with all his bands of foldiers was taken prisoner, in a certain village called Polyzelios: where remaining behind, he was enuironed by his enemies in fight, nestekenef and feeing himselfe so compassed in, drew out his sword, and with his owne hands thrust himfelfe thorow, but died not of it, because his enemies came straight about him, and tooke hold of fans. him. The Syracusans thereupon went with speed to Nicias, and told him of Demost heres case. He giving no credit to them, sent presently certaine of his horsemen thither to vnderstand the truth who brought him word that Demosthenes and all his men were taken prifoners. Then he befought Gylippus to treat of peace, to fuffer the poore remaine of the ATH ENIANS to depart Nicia meout of Sicile with fafety, and to take fuch hostages for the fure paiment of all fuch fummes setterary of money the Syracysan's had disburfed by meanes of this warre, as should like himselfe; of peace, which he promifed he would cause the ATHENIAN'S to perform and fatisfie vnto them. Howbe it the Syracovs and s would in no wife hearken to peace, but cruelly threatening and reading them that made motion hereof, in rage gaue a new onfet vpon him, more fiercely then euer before they had done. Nicias being then veterly without any kind of victuals, did not with standing hold out that night, and marched all the next day following (though the enemies darts still flew about their eares) untill he came to the river of Afinarus, into the which the Synaevsans did forcibly drive them. Some others of them also dying for thirst, entred the river of them- William felues, thinking to drink. But there of all others was the most cruel slaughter of the poore wretthes, even as they were drinking; untill fuch time as Nicias falling down flat at Gyllippus feete, of ofinatus faid thus ynto him: Since the gods haue given thee (Gylippus) victorie, shew mercy; not to me that by these miseries have wonimmortal honor and same, but ynto these poore vanquished A-THENIANS : calling to thy remembrance, that the fortunes of warre are common, and how that words yet. the ATHENIAN'S have vied you LACED EMONIAN'S courteoufly, as often as fortune favoured ding himthem against you. Gylippus beholding Nicias, & periwaded by his words, took copassion of him Gylippus. (for he knew he was a friend vnto the Laced Amonians at the last peace concluded betwixt them, & furthermore thought it great honour to him, if he could cary away the two Captains or Grlippus Generals of his enemies prisoners) shewed him mercy, gaue him words of comfort, and moreouer commaunded befides that they should take all the residue prisoners. But his commandement Nicias, was not knowen in time to all: infomuch as there were many moe flaine then taken, although some private soldiers saved divers not with standing by stealth. Now the Syracusans having brought althe prisoners that were openly taken into a troupe together, first vnarmed them, then taking their weapons from them, hung them vp vpon the goodliest young trees that stood vpon the riners fide, in token of triumph. And so putting on triumphing garlands upon their heads. and having trimmed their owne horses in triumphant manner, and also shorne all the horses of their enemies: in this triumphing fort they made their entrie into the city of Syracvsa, hauing gloriously ended the most notable warre that euer was among st the GREEKES one against another, and attained also the nobleft victorie that could be atchieued, & that only by force of arms and valiancie. So at their returne, a councell and affembly was holden at Syracvs a, by the Gitizens and their confederates: in the which Eurytles one of the Oratours (a practifer in publike causes) first made petition, that the day on the which they had taken Nicias, might for ever thenceforth be kept holy-day, without any maner of work or labour, but only to do facrifice to the gods; and that the feast should be called, Assures feast, after the name of the river where the ouerthrow was given. This victoric was had the fixe and twentieth day of the moneth of Inly. And as touching the prisoners, that the confederates of the ATHENIANS and their flaues fhould be openly fould by the drumme: and that the natural Athenian s which were freemen. and their confederates of the country of Sieil, flould be clapped in irons and layd in prison. the Captaines onely excepted, whom they should put to death. The Syracvsans, confirmed this decree. And when the Captaine Hermocrates went about to perswade them, that to be mercifull in victorie, wold be more honor vnto them, then the victory it felfe; they thrust him backe with great tumult. And furthermore, when Gylippus made fuite that for the Captaines of the A. THENTANS, he might cary them aline with him to Sparta, he was not only shamefully denied. but most vilely abused so lusty were they grown vpon this victoric, besides also that in the time of the war they were offended with him & could not endure his straight seuere LACONIAN go. uernement. Times faith moreouer, that they accused him of couctous fuell and thest, which vice he inherited from his father. For Cleandrides his father was convict for extortion, and banished ATHENS. And Gylippus selfe having stolne thirtie talents out of a thousand which Lysander sent to Sparra by him, and having hid them under the eauings of his house, being bewrayed, was for exterti. compelled with shame to flie his countrey, as we have more amply declared in the life of Lyfander. So Timeus writeth, that Nicias & Demofthenes were not stoned to death by & Syracvsans, Wisias and as Thucydides & Philiffus report, but that they killed themselves, ypon word sent them by Hermocrates (before the affembly of the people was broken vp) by one of his men, whom the keepers of the prison let in vnto them: howbeit their bodies were cast out at the jayle doore, for eucry man to behold. I have heard there is a target at this present to be seen in a temple at Syracvs A, which is faid to be Nicias target, couered alouer with gold and purple filke, paffing finely Wroughttogether. As for the other prisoners of the ATHENIANS, the most of them died of ficknesse, and of ill handling in the prison, wherethey had no more allowed them to live withal but two dishfuls of barley for their bread, and one of water for each man a day. Indeed many of them were convayed away, and fold for flaues; and many also that scaped vinknowne as flaues were also fold for bondmen, whom they branded in the forehead with the print of a horse, who not with standing besides their bondage, endured also this paine. But such their humble patience and modefly did greatly profit them: for either shortly after they were made freemen or if they still continued in bondage, they were gently intreated and beloued of their masters. Some of them were fauedalfo for Eurypides fake. For the Sicilians liked the verses of this Poet better then they did any other GRECIAN'S verses of the midst GRECE. For if they heard any rimes or fongs like vnto his, they wold have them by heart, & one wold prefent them to another with greatioy. And therfore it is reported, that divers escaping his bondage, & returning againto A-THENS, went very louingly to falute Eurypides, & to thank him for their liues; and told him how they were deliuered from flauery, only by teaching the those verses which they remembred of his works. Others told him also, how that after the battel, they scaping by flight, and wandering vp and downe the fields, met with fome that gaue them meate and drinke to fing his verses. And this is not to be maruelled at, weighing y report made of a ship of the city of CAVNVS, that on a time being chased in thither by pirats, thinking to saue theselues within their ports, could not at the first be received, but had repulse; howbeit being demanded whether they could fing any of Eurypides fongs, and answering that they could, were straight suffered to enter, and come in. The news of this lamentable ouerthrow, was not beleeued at the first, when they heard of it at ATHENS. For a stranger that landed in the hauen of PIR AA, went and sate him down (as the maner is) in a Barbers shop, and thinking it had bin comonly known there, began to talke of it.

The Barber hearing the stranger tell of such matters: before any other had heard of it, ranne into the city as fast as he could, and going to the gouernours told the newes openly before them all. The Magistrates therupon did presently call an assembly, & brought the barber before them: who being demaunded of whom he heard these newes, could make no certaine report. Whereupon being taken for a forger of newes, that without ground had put the city in feare and trouble, he was prefently bound, and layed on a wheele, whereon they vie to put offen-nians do ders to death, and so was there tormented a great time, vntill at last there arrived certaine men torment the in the city; who brought too certaine newes thereof, and told enery thing how the ouerthrow the newes of the new of the n came. So as in fine they found Nicias words true, which now they believed, when they faw their ouerall those miseries light fully vponthem, which he long before had prognosticated vnto them.

THE LIFE OF Marcus Crassus.

Arcus Crassus was the sonne of a Censor, who had also received the Marsus honour of triumph: but himselfe was brought vp in a little house with kinred, and two other of his brethren, which were both maried in their fathers & mothers lifetime, and kept house together. Whereupon it came to passe, that he was a man of such sober and temperate diet, that one of his brethren being deceased, he maried his wife, by whom he had children. For women, he lived as continent a life, as any ROMAINE of his time: notwithstanding, afterwards being of riper yeares, he was accufed by Plotinus to have defloured one of the Vestall Nunnes called Licinia. But in troth the cause of that suspition grew thus. Licinia had a goodly pleasant garden hard by the suburbes of the citie, wherewith Crassus was maruellously in loue, and would faine hauchad it good cheape: & vpon this onely occasion was often seene in speech with her; which made the people suspect him. But for as much as it seemed to the Judgesthat his couctousnesse was the cause that made him follow her, he was cleared of the incest suspected, but he neuer left following of the Nun, till he had got the garden of her. The Romaine's fay there was but that only vice of couctous fresh crass, that drowned many other goodly vertues in him: for mine crass as owne opinion me thinkes he could not be touched with that vice alone without others, fince it well-young. grew fo great, as the note of that only did hide and couer all his other vices. Now to fet out his extreme couetous desire of getting, naturally bred in him, they proue it by two manifest reasons. Bbb 4

The first, his manner and meanes he yied to get; and the second, the greatnesse of his wealth. For at the beginning he was not left much more worth, then three hundred talants. And during the time that he dealt in the affaires of the common wealth, he offered the tenths of all his goods wholly vnto Hercules, kept open house for all the people of Rome, and gaue also to enery citizent of the same as much corne as would keepe him three moneths: and yet when he went from Rome to make warre with the Parthians, himselfe being desirous to know what all he had was worth, found that it amounted to the fumme of feuen thousand one hundred talants. But if I may with licence vie euill speech, writing a troath: I say he got the most part of his wealth by fire and bloud, raifing his greatest revenew of publicke calamities. For when Sylla hadtal kenthecitie of Rome, he made portfale of the goods of them whom he had put to death, to those that gaue most terming them his booty, onely for that he would the nobilitie and great test men of power in the citie should be partakers with him of this iniquitie: and in this open fale Crassus neuer left taking of gifts, nor buying of things of Sylla for profit. Furthermore, Crassus perceining that the greatest decay commonly of the buildings in Rome came by fire, and falling downe of houses, through the ouermuch weight by number of stories built one vpon another: bought bondmen that were masons, carpenters, and these deuisors and builders, and of these he had to the number of flue hundred. Afterwards, when the fire tooke any house, he would buy the house while it was a burning and the next houses adjoying to it, which the owners fold for litle, being then in danger as they were, and a burning: so that by processe of time, the most part of the houses in Rome came to be his. But not with standing that he had so many slaves to his workmen, he neuer built any house from the ground, sauing his owne house wherein he dwelt: faying, that fuch as delighted to build, vndid themselues without the helpe of any enemy. And though he had many mines of filter, many ploughs, and a number of hinds and ploughmen to follow the fame yet all that comodity was nothing in respect of the profit his flaues and bondmen brought him daily in. As readers, scriueners, goldsmiths, bankers, receivers, stewards of houshold, caruers, and other such officers at the table, taking paines himselfe to help them whe they were learners, and to instruct them what they should doe: and to be short, he thought the greatest carea good housholder ought to have, was to see his slaves or servants weltaught being the most lively cattell and best instruments of a mans house. And surely therein his opinion was not ill, at the least if he thought as he spake; that all things must be done by servants, and his feruants must be ruled by him. For we see that the art and skill to be a good husband, when it confifteth in gouernment of things without life or fenfe, is but a base thing, only tending to gaine: but when it dependeth vpon good order and gouernement of men, me thinks then it is to know how to gouerne well a common wealth. But as his judgement was good in the other, fo was it very bad in this: that hethought no man rich and wealthie, that could not maintaine a whole armie with his owne proper goods. For the warre (as king Archidamus was wont to fay) is not made with any certaintie of expence; and thereforethere must no sufficiencie of riches be limited for the maintenance of the same. But herein Marius and he differed farre in opinion: who having allowed every Romaine fourteen acres land(called with them, Jugera) vnderstanding that some were not pleased, but wold have more; made them this answer: The gods forbid any ROMAINE should thinke that land little, which indeed is inough to suffice for his maintenance. This notwithstanding, Crassus was courteous to strangers, for his house was open to them all, and he lent his friends money without interest: but when they brake day of payment with him, then would he roundly demaund his money of them. So, his courtefie to lend many times without interest, did more trouble them, than if he had take very great vsury. Indeed whe he bade any man to come to his table, his fare was but even ordinary, without all exceffe but his crassusfare fine and cleanly service, and the good entertainement hee gaue every man that came to him, pleased him better, than if he had bene more plentifull of diet and dishes. As for his learning and study, he chiefely studied eloquence, and that fort specially that best wold serue his turneto speake in open presence so that he became the best spoken man in Rome of all histime, and by his great industry & diligent indeauour excelled all them that even by nature were most apt vnto it. For some say, he had never so small nor little a cause in hand, but he alwaies came prepared having studied his cause before for pleading : and oftentimes also when Pompey Cafar, and Cicero refused to rife and speake to matters, Crassis would defend every cause, if he were requested. And therefore was he generally beloued & well thought of because he shewed himself painful, and willing to helpe enery man. Likewise was his gentlenes maruellously esteemed, because he faluted enery body curteoufly, and made much of all mentfor whom socuer he met in the streets that spake to him as he passed and saluted him, were he neuer so meane, he wold speake to him againe, and call him by his name. It is fayd also he was very well studied in stories, and indifferently seeme in Philosophy, specially in Aristotles workes, which one Alexander did read vnto him, a man that became very gentle and patient of nature, by vfing of craffus company: for it were hard to fay, whether Alexander was poorer when he came to Crassus, or made poorer whilehe was with him. Of all his friends he would euer haue Alexander abroad with him, and while they were abroad, would lend him a hat to couer his head by they way: but so soone as they were returned, he would call for it againe. O wonderfull patience of a man! to feethat hemaking profession of Philosophy as he did, the poore man being in great pouerty, did not place pouerty in things indifferent. But hercof we will speake more hereafter. Cinna and Marius being now of greater power, and coming on directly towards Rome, enery man suspected straight their comming was for no good to the commonwealth, but as appeareth plainly, for the death and destruction of the noblest men of Rome. For it so fell out indeed, that they slue all the chiefe men they found in the citie, among whom Crassus father and his brother were of the number, and himfelfe being at that time but yong, escaped the present danger only by flight. Furthermore, Crasses Continue file hearing that they laied waite to take him, and that the tyrants fought him in every place, tooke eth Marius three of his friends in his company and ten feruants only and fled into Spaine with all possible and cinna, speed, where he had been with his father before, & had got some friends when he was Prætor, and ruled the country. Neuertheleffe, seeing enery body afraid, and mistrusting Marins crucky, as if he had bin at their doores, he durft not bewray himself to any man, but went into the fields, and hid him in a great cane being within the land of one Vibius Piciacus by the sea side, from whence he fent a man of his to this Piciacus, to feele what goodwil he bare him, but specially for that his victuals began to faile him. Vibius hearing that Craffus was fafe, and had escaped, became Vibius very glad of it: and vnderstanding how many persons he had with him, and into what place he was gotten went not himselfe to lee him, but called one of his slaues (who was his receiver and craffeto occupied that ground for him (and bringing him neere the place where Crasus was, comanded him encry night to prouide meat for supper, to bring it ready dressed to this rocke whereunder was the caue, & make no words of it, neither be inquisitive for who it was; for if hedid he should die for it, and otherwise, for keeping the thing secret as he commanded, he promised to make him a free man. This caue is not farre from the fea fide, and is closed in round about with two rockes that meet together, which receive a fost coole wind into them. When ye are entred into ŷ caue, it is of a great height within, and in the hollownesse therofare many other caues of great receipt one within another, & befides that, it neither lacketh light nor water for there is a wel of paffing good water running hard by the rocke, and the naturall rifts of the rocks also receiving the light without, where they meet together, do fend it inward into the caue. So that in the day time it is maruellous light, & hath no dampe aire, but very pure and drie, by reason of the thicknesse of the rocke, which sendeth all the moistnesse and vapour into that springing well. crassus keeping close in this caue, Vibius receiver brought victuals thither daily to releeve him and his company, but faw not them he brought it to, nor could viderstand what they were : and yet they faw him plainely, observing the houre and time of his coming when he brought the same. He provided them no more then would even necessarily serve their turne, and yet plenty sufficient to make good cheere withal for Vibrus was bent to entertain Crassus as honourably as he could possible, in so much as he considered he was a young man, and therefore reason would he should offer him some occasion to take such pleasure and delight as his youth required. For to releeue his necessity onely, he thought that rather a part of feare, than any shew of love towards him. One day he tooke two faire young damfels, and brought them with him to the fea fide: and when he came to the caue, shewed them where they should get vp, and bad them not be afraid. crasfus at the first, when he saw the young wenches, was afraid he had beene betrayed: yet he afked them what they were, and whom they fought. They being instructed by Vibins what they should fay, answered, that they fought their maister that was hidden there. Then Crasus knew this was Vibius mirth to shew him courtesse: so he received them into his caue, and kept them as long as he lay there, letting Vibius vnderstand by them what he lacked. Fenestella writeth, that he saw one of them when she was an old woman, and that he had heard her tell him this tale many a time with great delight. In fine, Crassus (after he had lyen hidden in this caue eight moneths) vnderstanding that Cinna was dead, came out: and so some as he made himselfeto be knowne, there repaired a great number of fouldiers vnto him, of whom he only chose two thoufand fine hundred, and with them passed by many cities, and sacked one called MALACA, as diuerse do write but he statly denied it, and stoutly contraried them that affirmed it. And afterwards having gotten ships together, went into Africke, to Metellus Pius, a man of great rojuge into fame, and that had already gotten a great armie together. Howbeit he taried not long with Metellus, but iarring withhim, went vnto sylla, who welcomed and honoured him as much as any that he had about him. Sylla afterwards arriving in IrALY, intending to imploy all the yong no. crassius sent bilitie he had in his companie, gaue every one of them charge vnder him, and sent Crassius into the countrey of the MARSIANS, to leavie men of warre there. Crasse desiring certaine bands of Syllato aide him, being driven to passe by his enemies: Sylla answered him angerly againe: I give thee thy father, thy brother thy friends and kinfemen to aide thee, whom they most wickedly haue flaine and murthered, and whose deaths I pursue with hote reuenge of maine army, vpon those bloudy murtherers that have slaine them. Crassus being netled with these words. departed thence prefently, and floutly passing through his enemies, leavied a good number of fouldiers: and was euer after ready at Syllaes commandement in all his warres. Here began first (as they fay) the ftrife and contention betwixt him and Pompey . For Pompey being yonger than Craffus, and borne of a wicked father in Rome, whom the people more hated then ever they did manicame yet to great honour by his valiancy, and by the notable acts he did in the wars at that time. So that Sylla did Pompey that honor many times, which he feldome did vnto them that Syllacalled were his elders, nor yet vnto those that were his equals: as to rise vp when he came towards him, to put off his cap, to call him Imperator, as much as Lieuetenant generall. And this galled Craffus to the heart, although he had no wrong in that Pompey was taken before him, because he had no experience in matters of war at that time, & also because these two vices that were bred in him, mifery and couctoufnesse, drowned all his vertue and well doing. For at the sacke of the city of TVDER, which he tooke, he privily got the most part of the spoyle to himselfe, whereof he was accused before Sylla. Yet in the last battell of this civill warre (which was the greatest and most dangerous of all other) cuen before Rome it selfe, the wing that sylla led, was repulsed and ouerthrowne: but Crassus that led the right wing, ouercame his enemies, followed them in chase till midnight, sent sylla word of his victory, and demaunded victuals for his men. But then againe he ranne into as great defame, for buying, or begging, the confiscate goods of the outlawes appointed to be flaine, for little or nothing. And it is faid also, that he made one an outlaw in the countrey of the BRYTIANS, without Syllaes privitie or commandement, only to have his goods. But Sylla being told of it, would neuerafter vse him in any open service. Surely this is a strange thing, that crassus selfe being a great flatterer of other, and could creep into any mans fauor, was yet himselfe casie to be wonthrough flattery, of any man that would seeke him that way. Furthermore, it is faid of him that he had this property: that though himself was as extreamly couctous as might be, yet he bitterly reproued and vtterly misliked them that had his own humor of auarice. Pompeyes honour that he attained vnto daily, by bearing great charge and rule in the warres, did greatly trouble craffus: both because he obtained the honour of triumph before he came to be Senator, and also for that the Romains commonly called him, Pompeius Magnus, to say, Pompey the great. Crassus being in place on a time when one sayd that saw Pompey comming, Sec, Pompey the great is come. And how great I pray ye, faydhe scornefully : howbeit despairing that he could not obtaine to match him in the warres, he gaue himselfe vnto the affaires of the city: and by his paines and industry of pleading, and defending mens causes, by lending of money to them that needed, and by helping of them that fued for any office, or deindustry & manded any thing else of the people, he attained in the end to the like estimation and authoritic that Pompey was come vnto, by his many noble victories. And there was one notable thing in cither of them. For Pompeyes fame and power was greater in Rome, when himself was absent; and contrariwise when he was there present, Crassis oftentimes was better esteemed than he. Pompey caried a great maiefty and grauity in his maner of life, would not be feen often of the people, but kept from repairing to open places, and would speake but in few mens causes, and that vnwillingly: all to keepe his fauour and credite whole for himfelfe, when he flood in need to employ the same. Where Crassus diligence was profitable to many, because he kept continually in the market place, and was easie to be repaired vnto by any manthat required his helpe, daily following those exercises, indeauouring himselfe to pleasure enery mansso that by this easie accesse and familiaritie, for favour and goodwill, he grew to exceed the grauitie and maiefty of Pompey. But as for the worthinesse of their persons, their eloquence of speech, and their good grace and countenance; in all those (it is said) Pempey and Crassus were both alike. And this enuie and emulation never caried Crassus away, with any open malice or ill will. For though he was fory to fee Pompey and Cafar honoured about him: yet the worme of ambition never bred malice in him. No, though Cafar when he was taken by pirates in As 1 A (as he was once) and being kept prisoner cried out aloud: O Crassus, what ioy will this be to thee, when thou shalt heare I am in prison! This notwith standing, they were afterwards good friends, as it appeareth; for Cafar being ready on a time to depart out of Rome for Prator into Spaine, & not being able to fatisfie his creditors that came flocking all at once about him, to flay and arrest his cariage: Crasus, in that time of need for looke him not, but became his furctie for the fumme of eight hundred and Three fact. thirty talents. In fine, all Rome being divided into three factions, to wit, of Pompey, Cafar and ions at Crassius (for as for Cato, the estimation they had of his sidelitie was greater then his authoritie: Reme. and his vertue more wondred at then practifed) in fo much as the grauest and wifest men tooke part with Pompey. The liuclieft youthes, and likelieft to runne into desperate attempts, they followed C. elars hope. Crasus keeping the middest of the streame, was indifferent to them both, and oftentimes changed his minde and purpose. For in matters of gouernement in the commonweale, he neither shewed himselfe a constant friend, nor a dangerous enemic: but for gaine, was eafily made friend or foe. So that in a moment they faw him praise and reprooue, defend and condemne, the same lawes, and the same men. His estimation grew more, through the peoples feare of him, then for any good wil they bare him. As appeareth by the answer that one Sicinius (a very busic headedman, and one that troubled enery governor of the commonweale inhis time) made to one that asked him, why he was not buffe with Crafius among the reft: and how it happened that he fo feaped his hands? O, faid he, he caried hav on his horne. The Sicinius manner was then at Rome, if any man had a curst bullocke that would strike with his horne, to wind hay about his head, that the people might beware of him when they met him. The commotion offencers, which some call Spartacess warre, their wasting and destroying of ITALIE The warre came vpon this occasion. In the citie of CAPVA, there was one Lentulus Batiatus, that kept a of the bind. great number of fencers at variebated foiles, whom the Romaines call Gladiatores, whereof Spartam the most part were GAVLES and THRACIANS. These men were kept locked vp, not for any fault warre. they had committed, but onely for the wickednesse of their maister that had brought them and compelled them by force, one to fight with another at the sharpe. On a time two hundred of them were minded to steale away: but their conspiracie being bewrayed, threescore and eighteene of them entred into a cooks house, and with the spits and kitchin-kniues, which there they got, went quite out of the citie. By the way they fortuned to meete with carts loden with fencers weapons, that were brought from CAPVA, going to fome other city: those they also took by force, and arming themselues therewith, got them then to a strong place of situation. Where among ft themselves they chose three Captaines, and one Spartaeus a Thracian borne (and of those countreymen that go wandering vp and downe with their heards of beasts, neuer staying long in a place) they made their Generall. This Spartacus was not only valiant, but ftrong made Thewhe withall, and endued with more wisedome and honesty, than is commonly found in men of his behaviour of Sparts. flate and condition: and for civilitie & good vnderstanding a man more like to the Grecians of spans then any of his countrymen comonly be. It is reported, that when Spartacus came first to Rome elife capto be fold for a flaue; there was found as he flept, a fnake wound about his face. His wife feeing tains of the bondmens it, being his own countriwoman, and a wife woman befides, possess with Bacchus spirit of diul- marre. nation: faid plainly that it did fignifie, that one day he should be of great power, much dread, and haue very good fuccesse. This same woman prophetesse was then with him, and followed v him likewife when he fled. Now first they overthrew certaine soldiers that came out of CAPVA against them, thinking to take them: and stripping them of their armorand weapons, made them clodius a glad to take the fencers weapons, which they threw away as vile & vnfemly. After that, the Ro- Romaine MAINS fent Clodius Prætor against them, with three thousand men. Who besieged them in their grains fort, fituate vpon a hill that had a very freepe and narrow afcent vnto it, and kept the passage Sparacus vp to them: all the rest of the ground round about it, was nothing but high rockes hanging with 3000 ouer, and vpon them great store of wild vines. Of them the bondmen cut the strongest strips, and made thereof ladders, like to thele ship ladders of ropes, of such a length and so strong, that they reached from the top of the hill euen to the very bottome; vpon those they all came lafely downe, fauing one that tarried aboue to throw downe their armour after them, who afterwards by the fame ladder fauing himselfe last of all. The Romain's mistrusting no such matter, these bondmen compassed the hill round, affailed them behind, and put them in such a seare with the fudden onset, as they fled upon it euery man, and so was their campe taken. Thereupon divers ouercome of heardmen and shepheards that kept cattell hard by the hill, joyned with the Romains that fled, being ftrong and hardy men of which some they armed and others they vsed as scouts and spials to discouer. Vpon this ouerthrow was sent another Captaine from Rome, called Publius Varinus, against these bondmen: who first ouercame Furius, the Lieuetenant of Varinus in battell, and two thousand of his men: and after that against they flue one Cossinius, and ouerthrew a great armie of his, being joyned with Publius Various, as his fellow and counsellor. Spartacus having intelligence that Cossinius was bathing himselfe at a place called the falt pits, had allmost taken him tardie, hauing much ado by flight to faue him selfe: not with standing, Spartacus wan all his c riage at that time, and having him hard in chase, took his whole campe with great slaughter of his men, among whom Cossinius selfe was flaine. Spartacus having thus now in fundry battels and encounters ouercome the Prætor himfelfe, Publius Various, and at the length taken his fergeants from him that caried the axes before him, and his owne horse whereon be rode himself. was grownethento fuch a power, as he was dreaded of enery man. Yet all this not with standing. Spartacus wisely considering his owne force, thinking it not good to tary till he might ouercome the power of the Romains, marched with his army towards the Alpes, taking it their best way after they had passed them ouer, every manto repaire hometo his ownecountrey, some into GAVLE, the rest into THRACIA. But his souldiers trusting to their multitude, & persivading the. sclues to do great things, would not obey him therein, but went againe to spoile and ouer runall ITALY. The Senate of Rome being in great perplexitie, not onely for the shame and dishonour that their men should be ouercome in that fort by slaues and rebels, but also for the scare and Cellius and danger all ITALY stood in besides: sent both the Consuls together, Gellius and Leniulus, as vnto as difficult and dangerous a warre, as any that could have happened vnto them. This Gellius one of the Confuls, fetting fuddenly vpon a band of the Germaines, which in a brauery & contempt as it were, dispersed themselves from their campe, put them to the sword every man. Lentulus, his colleague and fellow Confull on the other fide, compaffed in Spartacus round with a great army:but Spartaens charged his Lieutenants that led the army, gaue the battell, ouerthrew them, and took all their cariage. Hereupon, marching on still with his army towards the Alpes, Cassius the Prator and governor of GAVLE about the Po, came against him with an army often thoufand men. Spartaeus ioyned battell with him, and ouercame him. Cakius hauing lost a great number of his men, with great difficulty faued himfelf by flying. The Senate hearing of Caffins ouerthrow, were maruelloufly offended with the Confuls, and fent commandement vnto them, to leaue off the warre; and thereupon gaue the whole charge thereof vnto Marcus Crassus, who was Creffur fent, accompanied in his iourney with many noble young gentlemen of honorable houses, both for that he was maruelloufly effected, and also for the good will they bare him. Now went Crassus from Rome, and camped in Romania, tarying Spartacus coming, who was marching thirherward. He fent Mummius one of his Lieutenants with two legions, to fetch a compaffe about to intrap the enemie behind: straightly commanding him to follow Spartacus rereward, but inno Deutename. case to offer him skirmish nor battell. But Mummius notwithstanding this straight comman-Munmus dement, seeing some hope given him to doegood, set vpon Spartacus, who gave him the overthrow, flue numbers of his men, and moe had flaine, fauing that certaine of them faued themfelucs by flight, having onely loft their armour and weapons. Hereupon Crassus was grieuously offended with Mummeus, and receiving his fouldiers that fled, gaue them other armor and weapons:but yet vpon furctics, that they should keepe them better thencefoorth, then they had before done. Now Craffus of the five hundred that were in the first rankes, and that first fled, them he deuided into fiftietimes ten, and out of euery one of those he put one of them to death, as the lo, fellout: renewing againe the ancient discipline of the Romains stopunish cowardly souldiers, which of long time before had not bene put in vse. For it is a kind of death that bringeth open shame withall: and because it is done in the face of the campe, it makethall the residue afraid to feetheterrour of this punishment, crassus having done execution in this fort ypon his men, led his armie against Spartacus, who still drew backe, vntill he cametothe sea fide through the countrey of the Lycanians, where he found in the straight of the far of Messi-MA, certaine pirates ships of Cilicia, and there determined to go into Sicilia. And having Dur two thousand men into Sicile, he then remined the warre there of the flaues, which was but in manner newly ended, and lacked small prouocation to begin it againe. But these pirates having promifed Spartacus to paffe him over thither, and alfo taken gifts of him, deceived him, and brake their promife. Whereupon Spartacus returning backe againe from the fea fide, went and camped within a little He of the RHEGIANS. Crassus comming thither to seeke him, and perceiuing that the nature of the place taught him whathe should doe, determined with a wall to choke vp the barre or channell entring into this little Iland, both to keepe his men occupied fro idlenesse, and his enemies also from victuall. This was a maruellous hard and long peece of worke, notwithstanding Crassias finished it beyond all mens expectation in a very short time, and brought attench from one fide of the feato the other ouerthwartthis barre, which was three hundred furlongs in length, fifteene foote broade, and so many in height; and you the top of crafts this trench built a high wall, of a maruellous strength, whereof Spartacus at the first made light wonderfull account, and laughed at it. But when pillage beganto faile him, and trauelling all about the Ile wall. for victuals, perceiuing himfelfe to be shut in with this wal, and that there was no kind of victuals to be had within all the compasse of the Ile: he then tooke the vantage of a rough boysterous night, the wind being very great, when it snowed exceedingly, set his men on worke, and filled vp a peece of the trench (being a finall breadth) with earth, ftones and boughes of trees, whereupon he passed over the third part of his armie. Crassus at the first then became afraid, lest spartacus would have taken his way directly toward Rome: but he was soone put out of that feare. when he heard they were fallen out together, and that a great number of them re belling against Spartacus, went and camped of themselves by the lake of Lycanta, which water by report Awonderhath this variable propertie, that at certaine times it changeth and becommeth very sweete, and of the mater at some other times againe so falt and brackish as no man can drinke it, Grafius going to set vp- of the lake on them, draue them beyond the lake, but could kill no great number of them, nor follow of Lucania. them very farre, because spartacus came presently to the rescue with his armie, who stayed the chase. Crassus had written letters before to the Senate, to call Lucullus home out of THRACIA, and Pompey out of Spaine, wherof he then repented him, and made all the possible speedhe could to end this warre before either of them came thither; knowing, that which of them fo cuer came to his helpe, to him would the people give the honour of ending this warre, and not to himselfe. Wherefore he first determined to assaile them that had revolted from Spartacus, and camped by themselues, who were led by Caius Canicius, and another called Castus, So Crasfus sent fixe thousand footmen before to take a hill, commaunding them to lie as close as they could, that their enemies might not discouer them; and so they did, and couered their morians layed by and head-peeces as well as might be, from being seene. Neuerthelesse they were discouered by craftia. two women doing facrifice for the fafety of their armie, and thereupon were all in great hazard of casting away, had not Crassus beene, who came in time to their aid, and gave the enemies the cruellest battell that euer they fought in all that warre. For there were slaine of the slaues at that battell twelue thousand and three hundred, of which, two onely were found hurt in the backes, and all the rest slaine in the place of their rankes, valiantly fighting where they were fet in battel ray . Spartacus after this ouerthrow, drew towards the mountaines of Petel Y, whi- Spania us ther Quintus one of Crafius Liuctenants, and Scrofa his treasurer followed him, still skirmishing Soulders. with his rereward all the way: yet in fine, Spartacus turned fuddenly vpon them, made the reined to ROMAINES flie that still harried his men in that fort, and hurt Scrofa Craffus treasurer fo fore, that the meunhe hardly escaped with life. But the vantage they had of the ROMAINES by this ouerthrow, of Fetelie, fell out in the end to the vtter destruction of Spartacus. For his men thereby, being the most of them fugitive bondmen, grew to such a stoutnesse and pride of themselves, that they would no more flic from fight, neither yet would they any longer obey their leaders and Captaines; but by theway as they went, they compassed them in with their weapons, and told them, that they should goe backe againe with them, whether they would or not, and be brought through Lycania against the Romaines. All this made for crassis he wished, for he hadreceived newes that Pompey was comming, and that divers were futers for him at Rome to be fent in this journey, faying, that the last victorie of this warre was due to him, and that he would difparch it at a battell, as soone as he came thither. Crassus therefore seeking occasion to fight. lodged as neere the enemie as he could, and made his men one day cast a trench; which the bondmen seeking to preuent, came with great furie, and set vpon them that wrought. Wherevpon fell out a hot skirmish, and still supplies came on of either side, so that Spartacus in the end perceiuing he was forced vnto it, put his whole power in battell ray. And when he had fet them in order, and that they brought him his horse he was wont to ride on, he drew out his fword, and before them all flue the horse dead in the place, saying: If it be my fortune to win the field, I know I shall have horse enow to serve my turne; and if I chance to be overcome, then shall I need no more horses. After that, he flue in among the Romaines, thinking to attaine to fight with Crasius, but he could not come neere him; yethe flue with his owne hands two ROMAINE Centurions that refifted him. In the end, all his men he had about him, for fooke him and fled, fo as Spartacus was left alone among his enemies; who valiantly fighting for his life, was cut in peeces. Now though craffus fortune was very good in this warre, and that he had shewed himselfe a noble and valiant Captaine, venturing his person in any danger, yet he could not keepe Pompey from the honour of ending this warre: for the flaues that scaped from this last battell where Spartacus was flaine, fell into Pompeys hands, who made an end of all those rebellious rascals. Pompey hereupon wrote to the Senate, that Crassus, had ouercome the slaues in battell, but that he himselfe had pulled vp that warre even by the very rootes. After this Pompey made his entrie into Rome, and triumphed for his victorie of Sertorius, and the conquest of Spaine, Crassus also sued not for the great triumph, neither thought he the small Quation trisarph for triumph on foote, which they granted him, any honour vnto him, for ouercomming a few fugitiue bondmen. But for this small triumph, whereby it was called Ouatio, how much it diffeounts, see reth from the great triumph, see Marcellus life, where we have at large discoursed therof. Now Pompey being called to be Confull; Craffus, though he ftood in good hope to be chosen Confull with him, did yet notwithstanding pray his friendship and furtherance. Pompey was very willing to helpe him, and was ever defirous to make Craffus beholding to him: whereupon he dealt friendly for him, and spake openly in the assembly of the citie, that he would no lesse thanke the people to appoint Crassus his companion and fellow Consull with him, then for making himfelfe Confull. But not withftanding they were both Confuls together in office, their friendship held not, but were euer at iarre, and the one against the other. So by meanes of their disagreement, they passed all the time of their Consulship without any memorable act done fauing that Crassus made a great sacrifice to Hercules, and kept an open feast for the people of Rome of a thousand tables, and gaue to euery citizen corne to find him three moneths. But in the end of their Confulship, at a common councell holden, there was a knight of Rome called great feaft-Ouatius Aurelius (a man not greatly knowne, for that he had no dealings in the state, and kept most in the countrey) who getting voto the pulpit for orations, told the people what a vision he had seene in his dreame. Inpiter (faith he) appearing to me this night, willed me to tell you o-2 b : dreame penly, that ye should not put crassus and Pompey out of their office, before they were reconciled together. He had no sooner spoken the words, but the people commanded them to be friends. Pompey fate still, and said neuer a wordtoit. But Crassus rose, and tooke Pompey by the hand, and Craff.is and turning him to the people, told them aloud: My Lords of Rome, I doe nothing vnworthy of my felfe, to feeke Pompeys friendship and fauour first, since you your selves have called him the Great, before he had any haire ypon his face, and that ye gaue him the honor of triumph before he was Senator. And this is all that crasus did of any account in his Counsulship. When he was Censorallo, he passed it ouer without any act done. For he reformed not the Senate, mustered not the men of warre, nor tooke any view or estimate of the peoples goods, although Luctatius Catulus was his colleague and fellow Cenfor, as gentle a person as any of that time that liucd in Rome. Now Crassus at the first entric into his office of Censor, going about a cruell and violent act to bring ÆGYPT to pay tribute to the ROMAINE'S Casulus did foutly withstand him: wherby diffention falling out between them, they both did willingly refigne their office. In that great conspiracie of Catiline, which in maner ouerthrew the whole state and common wealth of Rome, Crassus was had in some icalousic and mistrust, because there was one of the confederates that named him for one of them, howbeit they gaue no credite vnto him. Yet Cicero in an oration of his, doth plainly accuse Crassa and Casar, as confederates with Catiline: howbeit this pration came not forth till they were both dead. And in the oration he made also, when his office and authoritie of Confull ceased, he sayd: that Crasus came one night to him, and showed him a letter touching Cariline, certainely confirming the conspiraciethen in examination. For celar conwhich cause Crassus euer after hated him: and that he did not openly reuenge it, the let was by sederates meanes of his fonne. For Publius Craffus much favoring eloquence, and being given to his booke, Ediling. bare great good willynto Givero: in fuch fort, that you his banishment he put on changed gar- crassing ments as Cietro did, and procured many other youths to do the like alfo, and in fine, perfwaded entitle. his father to become his friend. Cafar now returning to Rome from the province he had in gouernement, intended to fue for the Confulfhip; and perceiving that Pompey and Crassus were againe at a jarre, thought thus with himselfe, that to make the one of them his friend to further his fuite, he should but procure the other his enemic; and minding therefore to attaine his defire with the fauour of them both, fought first the meanes to make them friends, and perswaded casarre with them, that by their controversie the one seeking the others vindoing, they did thereby but crassing and make Cicero, Catulus and Cato of the greater authoritie, who of themselves were of no power, if Pompey they two joyned in friendship together: for making both their friends and factions one, they together. might rule the state and common wealth even as they would. Cofar having by his perswasion reconciled Crassand Pompey, ioyning their three powers in one, made themselves vnuincible, which afterwards turned to the deftruction of the people and Senate of Rome. For he made crafting or them not only greater than they were before the one by the others meanes; but himselfe also of caser, all great power through them. For when they began to fauour Cefar, he was straight chosen Confull without any deniall: and so behaued himselfe in the Consulship, that at the length they gaue friendpip, him charge of great armies, and then fent him to gouerne the GAVLES; which was, as a man may fay, euen themselues to put him into the castle that should keepe all the citie in subjection: imagining that they two should make spoile and good booty of the rest, sithence they had procured him such a government. Now for Pompey, the cause that made him commit this error, was nothing elfe, but his extreame ambition. But as for Craffus, befides his old vice of conetoufnesse rooted in him, he added to that a new auarice and defire of triumphs and victories, which Cafars fame for proweffe and noble acts in wars did throughly kindle in him, that he being otherwife his better in all things, might not yet in that be his inferiour: which furie tooke fuch hold as it neuer left him, till it brought him vnto an infamous end, and the commonwealth to great miserie. Thus Cafar being come out of his province of GAVLE VNto LVCA, divers ROMAINES went thither to fee him, and among other Pompey and Crassus. They having talked with him in fecret, agreed among them to deuise to have the whole power of Rome in their hands: fo pompey and that C. efar should keepe his armietogether, and Crassus and Pompey should take other provinces crassus del and armies to them. Now to attaine to this, they had no way but one: that Pompey and Crassus Cestar as should again fue the second time to be Confuls, and that Cafars friends at Rome should stand Luca, with them for it, fending also a sufficient number of his souldiers to be there at the day of chufing the Confuls. Thereupon Pompey and Craffus returned to Rome to that end, but not without sufpition of their practife: for there ranne a rumour in the citie, that their meeting of Cafar in Lyca, was for no good intent. Whereupon, Marcellinus and Domitius asked Fompey in open Senate, if he meant to make fuite to be Confull. Pompey answered them: Peraduenture he did, peraduenture he did not. They asking him againe the same question : he and Pompeys fwered, he would fue for the good men, not for the cuill. Pompeys answers were thought very answer. proud and haughty. Howbeit Craffus answered more modefily, that if he saw it necessarie for the commonwealth, he would fire to be Confull: if not, that he would not stand for it. crass was Vpon these words, some were so bold to make suite for the Consulship, as Domitius among o- delt anther. But afterwards Pompey and Crassus standing openly for it, all the rest lest off their suite for feare of them, Domitius only excepted: whom Cato fo prayed and intreated, the kinfman and friend, that he made him to feeke it. For he perswaded him, that it was to fight for the defence of their libertie, and how that it was not the Confulship Crassus and Pompertooked after, but that they went about to bring in a tyrannie; and that they fued not for the office, but to get fuch prouinces and armies into their hands as they defired, vnder colour and countenance of the Confulfhip. Catoringing these words into their cares, and beleeuing it certainely to be true as he said, brought Domitius as it were by force into the market place, where many honest men joyned with them: because they wondered what the matter meant, that the set wo noble men should suc

the second time to be Confuls, and why they made suite to be loyned together, and not to have any other with them, confidering there were fo many other worthic men, meete to be companion with either of them both in that office. Pompey feareing he should be preuented of his purpose, fell to commit great outrage and violence. As amongst other, when the day came to chuse the Consuls, Domitius going early in the morning before day, accompanied with his friends to the place where the election should be this man that caried his torch before him was flaine by some whom Pompey had laid in waite, and many of the company hurt, and among others, Cato. And having thus dispersed them, he beset a house round about whither they fled for Pomper and succour, and inclosed them there, vntill they were both chosen Consuls together. Shortly after Craffus they came with forcetothe pulpit for orations and draue Cato out of the market place, and flue seendtime. some of them that resisted and would not flie. They also then prolonged Casars gouernement of the GAVLES for five yeares more, and procured for themselves by decree of the people, the craffushad Countries of Syria and Spaine. Againe, when they drew lots together, Syria fell to Craffus, and Spaine to Pompey. Euery man was glad of their fortune. For the people on the one side were loth Pompey should go farre from Rome and himselfealso louing his wife well, was glad he had occasion to be so neare her, that he might remain the most part of his time at Rome. But Crassus of all other rejoyced most at his hap, that he should goe into S Y R I A: and it appeared plainely that he thought it was the happiest turne that euer came to him; for he would euer be talking of the journey, were he in neuer fogreat or strange company. Furthermore being among his friends and familiars, he would give out such fond boasts of it, as no yong man could haue made greater vaunts: which was cleane contrarie to his yeares & nature, hauing lived all his life time as modefuly, and with as smal oftentation as any man liuing. But then forgetting himfelfe too much, had fuch fond conceipts in his head, as he not onely hoped after the conquest of Syria, and of the Parthians, but flattered himselfe, that the world shold see all that Lucullus had done against king Tigranes, and Pompey against king Mithridates, were buttrifles (as a man would say) to that he intended. For he looked to conquer the BACTRIANS, the INDIANS, and the great Ocean seatowards the East, though in the decree passed by the people, there was no mention made of any wars against the Parthians. Now every man faw Crassus ambition and greedy defire of honour: in fo much as Cafar felfe wrote vnto Crassis out of GAVLE, commending his noble intent and forwardnesse, and wished him to goe through therewith. But Atteins one of the Tribunes being bent against Crassus to withstand his departure: (hauing diuers other confederates with him to further his purpose, who much missiked that any man of a brauery and lustinesse should make warre with any nation or people that had no way offended the Romains, but were their friends & confederats) Crassus fearing this conspiracy, prayed Pempey to affift and accompany him out of the city, because he was of great authority and much reuerenced of the people, as it appeared then. For, though multitudes of people were gathered together of purpose to let Crassus of his departure, and to cry out vpon him: yet when they saw Pompey goe before him, with a pleasant smiling countenane, they quieted themselues, and made alane for them, suffering them to passe on, and said nothing. This notwithstanding, Atteins The Tribune stepped before them, and commanded crassus he should not depart the city, with great protestations if he did the contrary. But perceiuing Crasus still held on his way notwithstanding, he commanded then one of the officers to lay hold of him, and to arrest him: howbeit the other Tribunes would not suffer the officers to do it. So the sergeant dismissed Crassius. Then Atteius running towards the gates of the citie, got a chafind ish with coales, and set it in the middest of the street. When Crassus against it, he cast in certain persumes, and made sprinklings ouer it, pronouncing horrible curfes, and calling vpon terrible and strange names of gods. The ROMAINES fay, that those maner of curses are very ancient, but yetvery secret, and offo great force, as he that is once curfed with that curfe can neuer escapeit, nor he that vieth it doth neuer prosper after it. And therefore few men doe vse it, and neuer but vpon vrgent occasion. But then they much reproued Atteins, for ving these dreadfull ceremonies and extreme curses, which were much hurtfull to the commonwealth, although he for countries sake had thus curfed Crassus. Crassus fetting forward notwithstanding, sailed on, and arrived at BRV N-DYSIVM, when winter stormes had not left the seas, and he had lost many of his ships: how-Deiotarus, beit he landed his armie, and marched through the countrie of GALATIA. There he found king Deiotarus, avery old man, and yet building a new city:and to taunt him pretily, faid vnto him: What, O King, begin you to build now in the afternoone . To whom the king of the GALATI-ANS againe smileing made answer: And truly Sir Captaine, you go not very early (methinks) to make warre with the PARTHIANS. For indeed crasus was threescore and voward, and yet his face made him feeme elder then he was. But to our storie againe. Crassis being come into the countrey, had as good lucke as he looked for: for he eafily built a bridge vpon the river of Euphrates, and passed his armie outrit without any let or trouble. So entring into Musoposurring the source of t TAM IA he received many cities that of good will yeelded themselves vnto him. Howbeit there was one citic named Zenodotia, whereof Appelonius was tyrant, where Crassus lost a hundred of his men: thereupon he brought his whole armie thirher, tooke it by force, facked their goods, and fold the prisoners by the drumme. The GREEKES called this city Zeno Doria, and taken by for winning of the same Crassus suffered his men to call him Imperator to say, soueraigne Cap- crassus. taine: which turned to his shame and reproach, and made him to be thought of a base minde as one that had finall hope to attaine to great things, making fuch reckoning of so small a trifle. Thus when he had bestowed seuen thousand of his footmen in garrison in those cities that had yeelded vnto him, and about a thousand horsemen, he returned backe to winter in Syria. Thither came his sonne Publins Crassus to him out of GAV LE from Iulius Cesar, who had giuen him such honors, as Generals of Rome did vse to give such valiant souldiers for reward of came whi their good service: and brought vnto his father a thousand men of armes, all choise men father in This methinkes was the greatest fault Crasus committed in all his enterprise of that warre. Spria. For when he should presently have gone on still, and entred into BABYLON and SELEVCIA; (cities that were cuer enemies vnto the PARTHIANS) he tracted time, and gaue them leasure to prepare to encounter his force when he should come against them. Againe, they found great fault with him for spending of his time when he lay in Syria, seeming rather to leade a merchantslife, than a chiefetaines. For he neuer faw his armie, nortrained them out to any martiall muted by exercife, but fell to counting the reuenew of the cities, and was many dayes bufily occupied craffus. weyghing of the gold and filuer in the temple of the goddesse Hierapolis. And worse then that: he sent to the people, princes, and cities about him, to furnish him with a certain number of men of warre, and then he would discharge them for a summe of money. All these things made him to be bothill spoken of and despised of enery bodie. The first token of his ill lucke that happened to him, came from this goddesse Hierapolis, whom some suppose to be Venns, other say Inno and others, that she is the mother and chiefe cause that gineth beginning of moisture to cuerie thing that commeth foorth and hath a being, and taught men the originall cause also of cucrie good thing. For as Crasus the father, and sonne both, were coming our of the temple, Crasus the yonger fell first on his face, and the father afterwards vpon his sonne. Likewise as he was gathering his garisons together, calling them out of the cities into the field, there came Ambassa crasuil dours vnto him from Arfaces king of the PARTHIANS: who delivered him their message in luste. few words, and told him, that if this armie he brought came from the ROMAINES to make This name warre with their maister, then that he would have no peace nor friendship with them, but of different would make mortall warres against them. Further, if it were (as he had heard say) that Craf- des, was fus against the peoples minds of Rome, for his owne conetous desire, and peculiar profite commons. was come in a iolity to make warre with the PARTHIANS, and to inuade their countrey: then in that respect Arsaces would deale more fauourably, in consideration of Crassus yeares, and thian. was contented also to suffer his mento depart with life and goods, whom he tooke rather to be ambassa in prison, then in garrison within his cities. Thereto Grassus couragiously answered, that he Parihians would make them answer in the citie of SELEVCIA. Therewith Vagifes, one of the eldest Am- fention baffadours fell a laughing, and shewing Crassius the palme of his hand, told him thus: Haire will Crassius. fooner grow in the palme of my hand, Crassus, then you will come to Seleveia. In this fortthe Veguin Ambassadours tooke their leaue of Crassus, and returned to their king Hyrodes, telling him he words shew was to prepare for warre. In the meane space, certaine of Crassus souldiers whom he had lest in the palme garrison in the cities of MESOFOTAMIA, having scaped maruellous dangerously and with of his hand, great difficultie, brought him newes of importance, having themselves seene the wonderfull hyrids great campe of the enemies, and their maner of fight in the assaults they made to the cities where Parthiam. they lay in garrison. And, as it falleth out commonly among men escaped from any danger, making things more fearefull and dangerous then they be indeed, they reported that it was vn-

eye could discerne them, and would pierce through any thing they hit, before a man could tell who shot them. Besides, for the horsemens weapons they vsed, that they were such, as no armour could possibly hold out: and their armours on the other side made of such a temperand mettall, as no force of anything could pierce them through, The Romaines hearing these newes, fell from their former stoutnesse and courage, being borne in hand before, that the PAR-THIAN'S differed nothing at all from the ARMENIAN'S and CAPPADOCIANS, who Lucultus had ouercome and spoiled so. oft, that he was wearie with all and they had already made account, that their greatest paines in this warre, was but the tedionsnesses of the iourney they had to make, and the trouble they should have to follow those ment hat would not abide them. But then contrary to expectation, they looked to come to stroakes, & to be lustily fought withal. Herupon, diverse Captaines and head officers that had charge in the army (among whom Cassius the treafurer was one) aduised Crassus to stay, and to deliberate in councel to know whether he were best togo on. orto remaine where he was. The foothfayers themselnes did partly let Crassus vnderstand, that the gods shewed no good tokens in all their facrifices, and were hardly to be pacified. But Graffus gave no eare to them, neither would heare any other that told him as much, but only liftned to them that counselled him to make haste. Yet Crassus chiefest comfort and incouragement. was of Artabazes king of ARMENIA, who came to his camp with fix thousand horse, which were but only the kings corner and gard. Againe, he promifed him other tenthousand horsemen all armed and barbed, and thirtie thousand footmen which he kept continually in pay, and counselled Crassia enter the Parthian's countrey upon Armeniae's side: because his campe shold not onely have plenty of victuals, which he would fend him out of his countrey, but for that he should also march in more safety, having a countrey full of mountaines and woods before him, very ill for horsemen, which was the only strength and force of the PARTHIANS. Crassus coldly thanked Artabazes for his good will, and all his noble offer of aide: yet told him he would take his journey through MESOPOTAMIA, where he had left many good fouldiers of the Romaines. And thus departed the king of Armenia from him. But now as Craffus was passing his armie vpon the bridge he had made ouer the river of Euphrates, there fel out sudden ftrange and terrible crackes of thunder, with fearefull flashes of lightning full in the souldiers faces: morcouer, out of a great blacke cloud came a wonderfull fforme and tempest of wind vponthe bridge, that the maruellous force thereof ouerthrew a great part of the bridge, and caried it quite away. Befides all this, the place where he appointed to lodge, was twife stricken with two greatthunder-claps. One of his great horse in like case, being braucly furnished and fer out, tooke the bit in his teeth, leapt into the river with the rider on his backe, who were both drowned, and neuer feeneafter. They fay also, that the first Eagle and ensigne that was to betaken vp when they marched, turned backe of it selfe, without any hands layd vpon it. Further it fortuned that as they were distributing the victuals vnto the fouldiers, after they had all paffed ouer the bridge, the first thing that was given them, was falt and water lintels. Which the ROMAINES take for a token of death and mourning, because they vse it at the funerals of the dead. After all this, when Crassus was exhorting his fouldiers, a word scaped his mouth that troubled the armie maruellously. For he told them, that he had broken the bridge which he had made ouer the riuer Euphrates, of purpose, because there should not a man of them returne backe again. Where indeed when he had seene that they took this word in ill part, he should have called it in againe, or have declared his meaning, seeing his men so amazed thereat: but he made light of it, he was fo willfull. In the end he made ordinarie facrifice for the purging of his armie: and when the Soothfayer gaue him the intrailes of the beaft that was facrificed, they fell out of his hands. Crassus perceiuing that the standers by were troubled withall fell a laughing, and told them. You fee what age is: yet shall you not fee my sword fall out of my hand. So having ended his facrifice, he began to march forward into the countrey by the rivers fide, with feuen legions of footmen, and little lacke of foure thousand horse, and in manner as many shot and slings lightly armed. There returned to him certaine of his scoutes that had viewed the country, and told him there was not an enemie to be seene in the field, howbeit that they had found the tracke of a maruellous number of horse, which seemed as if they were returned backe. Then Crassus first of all began to hope well: and his souldiers also they fell to despise the Parthians, thinking certainely that they would not come to battell with them.

Yet Cassius his treasurer euer perswaded him the contrarie, and thought it better for him to refresh his army a little in one of the cities where he had his garrison, vntill such time as he heard more certaine newes of the enemies: or elfe that he would march directly towards SELEVCIA by the riverfide, which lay fit for him to victuall himselfe easily by boats that wold alwaies follow his campe & should be sure besides that the enemies could not enuiron him behind, so that having no way to fet vpon them but before, they should have none advantage of them. Crassus going about then to confult of the matter, there came one Ariannes vnto him, a Captaine of the ARABIANS, a fine subtill fellow, which was the greatest mischiefe and euill that fortune could a captaine send to Crassus at that present time; to bring him to vtter ruine and destruction. For there were sine forme of Craffus foldiers that had ferued Pompey before in that country, who knew him very wel. Arabians. and remembred that Pompey had done him great pleasures: whereupon they thought that he bare great good will to the ROMAINS. But Ariannes had been laboured at that time by the king of PARTHIAE's Captaines, and was won by them to deceive Crassus, and to entice him all he could, to draw him from the river and the wooddy country, and to bring him into the plaine field, where they might compaffe him in with their horimen, for they meant nothing leffe then to fight with the ROMAINES at the fwords point. This barbarous Captaine Ariannes comming to Craffus, did highly praise and commend Pompey, as his good Lord and benefactor (for he was an excellent spoken man) and extolled Grassus armie, reprouing him that he came to slowly forward, tracting time in that fort as he did, preparing himselfe as though he had neede of armour crasses and weapon, and not of feet and hands fivift & ready against the enemies : who for the chiefest of the) had of long time occupied the selues to flie with their best moueables, towards the desarts of Scythia & Hyrcania. Therfore if you determine (faid he) to fight, it were good you made hast to meet them, before the king have gathered all his power together. For now you have but Surena and Syllaces, two of his Lieutenants against you, whom he hath sent before to stay you, that you follow him not : & for the king himself, be, bold he meaneth not to trouble you, But he sillates, lyed in all. For king Hyrodes had divided his army in two parts at the first, wher of himself tooke Aspaces the one, and went to spoile the realme of ARMENIA, to be reuenged of king ArtabaZes; and with Lieute. the other he lent Surena against the Romaines, not for any contempt he had of Crassus (for it was not likely he would disdaine to come to battell with him, being one of the chiefest nobleme Surena fent of Rome, and to thinke it more honourable to make war with king Artaba Zes in Armenia) but Graffie. I thinke rather he did it of purpose to avoide the greater danger, and to keepe farre off, that he might with safety see what would happen, and therefore sent Surena before to hazard battell. and to turne the ROMAINE's backe againe. For Surena was no meane man, but the fecond person of PARTHIA next vnto the king in riches, reputation, valour and experience in wars, the chiefest of his time among all the PARTHIANS, and for execution, no man like him. Surena when he did what he but remode into the countrey onely with his houshold, had a thousand camels to cary his sump- was. ters, and 200 coaches of Curtifans, a thousand men of armes armed at all peeces, and as many surenaes mo befides lightly armed: fo that his whole traine and court made about 10000 horse. Further, traine, by the tenure of that land he had by fuccession from his ancestors, his office was at the first proclaiming of any king, to put the royall crowne or diadem vpon the kings head. Moreover, he had restored king Hyrodes that then reigned, to his crowne, who had been before driven out of his realme: and had won him the great citie of SELEVCIA, him felfe being the first man that scaled the wals, and ouerthrew them with his owne hands that refifted him. And though he was vnderthirty yeares of age, yet they counted him a wife man, as well for his counfel as his experience, which were the meanes whereby he ouercame Crassus: who through his rashnesse and your man, folly at the first, & afterwards for very feare & timorousnes, which his misfortune had brought him vnto, was easie to be taken and intrapped, by any policie or deceit. Now this barbarous cap- wife. taine Ariannes having then brought Craffus to beleeve all that he faid, and drawne him by perswasion from the river of Euphrates, vnto a goodly plain country, meeting at the first with very good way, but after with very ill, because they entred into sands where their feet sunke deep, and into defert fields where was neither tree nor water, nor any end of them that they could differn by eye, for hat not only extreame thirst, and miserable way maruelously amazed the ROMAINS, but the discomfort of the eye also, when they could see nothing to stay their fight vpon: that aboue all the rest, wrought their extreame trouble. For neither farre nor neere any sight of tree, riuer, brooke, mountaine, graffe, or greene herbe appeared within their view, but in troth an Ccc 4 endlesse sea of desert sands on every side round about their campe. Then began they to suspect that they were betrayed. Againe, when newes came that Artabazes king of ARMENIA, was kept driabages in his countrey with a great warre king Hyrodes made vpon him, which kept him that he could not according to his promise come to aide him, yet that he wished him to draw towards ARME-NIA, that both their armies being ioyned together, they might the better fight with king Hyrodes. if not, that he would alwaies keepe the wooddy countrie, marching in those vallies and places where his horsemen might be safe, and about the mountaines: Crassus was so wilfull, as he would write no answer to it, but angerly told the messenger, that he had no leasure then to hearken to the Armenians, but that afterwards he would be reuenged wel enough of Artabazes treason. Cassius his treasurer was much offended with Crassus for his answer: howbeit perceiuing he could doe no good with him, and that he tooke enery thing in ill part, he faid vnto him, he would tell him no more. Notwithstanding, taking Ariannes this Captaine of the Armenians aside, he rebuked him roundly, and sayd : O thou wretch, what curfed deuill hath brought thee to vs, and how cunningly hast thou bewitched and charmed Crasus: that thou hast made him bring his army into this endlesse desert, and to trace this way fitter for an ARABIAN Captain of theeues, then for a Generall and Consull of the ROMAINES! Ariannes being craftie and subtill, speaking gently vnto Callins, did comfort him, and prayed him to have patience; and going and coming by the bands, seeming to helpe the souldiers, he told them merily: O my fellowes, I beleeue you thinke to march through the countrey of NAPLES, and looke to meet with your pleafant springs, goodly groues of wood, your naturall baths, and the good Innes round about to refresh you, and do not remember that you passe through the deserts of ARABIA and Assy-RIA. And thus did this barbarous Captaine entertaine the ROMAINES a while :but afterwards he dislodged betimes, before he was openly knowne for a traytour, and yet not without Crassus privity, whom he bare in hand, that he would goe fet fome broile and tumult in the enemies campe. It is reported that Crassus the very same day came out of his tent not in his coate armour ofscarlet, (as the manner was of the ROMAINE Generals) but in a blacke coate : howbeit, remembring himselfe, he straight changed it againe. It is said moreouer, that the ensigne-bearers when they should march away, had much ado to plucke their ensignes out of the ground, they stucke so fast, But Crassus scoffing at the matter, hastened them the more to march forward, compelling the footmen to go as fast as the horsemen, till a few of their skouts came in, whom they had fent to discouer: who brought newes how the enemies had slaine their fellowes, and what ado they had themselues to scape with life, and that they were a maruellous great armic, and wel appointed to giue them battell. This newes made all the campe afraid, but Crassus felf more then the rest, so as he beganto set his men in battell ray, being for hast in manner besides himselfe. At the first following Cassius mind, he set his ranks wide, casting his souldiers into a square battell, agood way afunder one from another, because he would take in as much of the plaineas he could, to keepe the enemics from compassing them in, and so divided the horsmen into the wings. Yet afterwards he changed his mind againe, and straighted the battell of his footmen, fashioning it like a bricke, more long then broad, making a front and shewing their faces enery way. For there were twelue cohorts or enlignes imbattelled on either fide, and by enery cohort a company of horse, because there should be no place left without aide of horsemen, and that all his battell should be alike defended. Then he gaue Casius the leading of one wing, his sonne Publius Crassus the other, and himselfe led the battell in the middest. In this order they marched forward, till he came to a little brooke called Balissus, where there was no great store of water, but yet happily lighted on for the soldiers, for the great thirst and extreame heate they had abidden all that painfull way, where they had met with no water before. There the most part of Crassus Captaines thought best to campe all night, that they might in the meane time find meanes to know their enemies what number they were, and how they were armed, that they might fight with them in the morning. But Crassus yeelding to his sons and his horsemens perswasion, who intreated him to march on with his armie, and to set vpon the enemies presently: commanded, that fuch as would cate, should eate standing, keeping their rankes. Yet on the sudaine, before this commandement could runne through the whole armie, he commanded them against to march, not faire and foftly, as when they go to give battell, but with speed, till they spied the enemies, who feemed not to the Romains at the first to be so great a number, neither so brauely armed as they thought they had bene. For, concerning their great number, Surena had of purpose hid them, with certaine troupes he sent before; and to hide their bright armour, he had cast Surenaes cloakes and beafts skins ouer them, but when both the armies approached neare the one to the for the biother, and that the figne to give charge was lift up in the aire first they filled the field with a ding of his dreadful noise to heare. For the PARTHIAN'S do not encourage their men to fight with y found craffic bat. of a horne, neither with trumpets nor howboies, but with great kettle drums hollow within, and sell within the about them they hang litle bels and copper rings, and with them they all make a noise enery Parthiams, where together ; and it is like a dead found, mingled as it were with the braying or bellowing of thias a wild beaft, and a feareful noise as if it thundred, knowing that hearing is one of the senses that kinds foonest moueth the heart and spirit of any man, and maketh him soonest beside himselfe. The drums, ROMAINES being put in feare with this dead found the PARTHIAN'S straight threw the cloaths and courrings from them that hid their armor, & then shewed their bright helmets and curaces of Margian tempred fleele, that glared like fire, & their horses barbed with steele & copper. And Surena alfo, Generall of the PARTHIANS, who was a goodly personage, and as valiant as any The terson other in all his host, though his beauty somewhat effeminate, injudgement shewed small like- of surena, lihood of any fuch courage: for he painted his face, and ware his haire after the fashion of the Generallof MEDES, contrarie to the maner of the PARTHIANS, who let their haire grow after ŷ fashion of an design the TARTARES, without combing or tricking of them, to appeare more terrible to their enemies. bed. The Parthians at the first thought to have set you the Romaines with their pikes, to see if they could breake their first ranks. But when they drew neare, & faw the depth of the ROMAIN s battel standing close together, firmly keeping their ranks, the they gaue backe, making as though they sted, and dispersed themselves. But the Romain Es maruelled when they found it contraric, and that it was but a deuice to entiron them on enery fide. Whereupon Crassus commanded his shot and light armed men to affaile the the which they did: but they went not far they were fo beaten in with arrowes and driven to retire to their force of the armed men. And this was the first beginning that both seared and troubled the Romaines, when they saw the vehemencie and great force of the enemies shot, which brake their armors, and ran through any thing they hit, were it neuer so hard or soft. The PARTHIANS thus still drawing backe, shot all together on every fide, not aforchand, but at adventure for the battel of the Romaines ftood fo nearetoge- thin ther, as if they would, they could not miffe the killing of some. These bowmen drew a great fought ftrength & had big, ftrong bowes, which fent the arrows fro them with a wonderfull force. The returns. Romans by means of these bows were in hard state. For if they kept their ranks, they were grieuoully wounded again, if they left the, and fought to run vpon the Parthians to fight at land with them, they faw they could do them but litle hurt, and yet were very likely to take the greater harmethemfelues. For as fast as the Romaines came vponthem, so fast did the Parinians flie from them, and yet in flying continued fill their flooting: which no nation but the Scy- The maner THIAN'S could better do then they, being a matter indeed most greatly to their advantage. For thian fight by their flight they best do saue themselues, and fighting still, they therby shun the shame of that their flying. The ROMAINE's still defended themselves, and held it out so long as they had any hope that the PARTHIANS would leave fighting when they had fpent their arrowes, or would Toyne battell with them. But after they understood that there were a great number of camels loden with quivers ful of arrows, where the first that had bestowed their arrowes fetched about to take new quiuers: then Craffus seeing no end of their shot, began to faint, and sent to Publius his fon, willing him in any case to charge vponthe enemies, and to give an onset, before they were compaffed in on enery fide. For it was on Publius fide, that one of the wings of the enemies battell was nearest vnto them, and where they rode vp and down to compasse them behind. Wherupon Crasins sonne taking thirteene hundred horsemen with him (of the which, a thousand were of the men of armes whom Inlins C. efar fent) and fine hundred fhot, with eight enfignes of footmen having targets, most neare to the place where himselfe then was: he put them out in breadth, that wheeling about they might gine a charge vpon them that rode vp and downe. But they feeing him coming, turned straight their horseand fled, either because they met in a marish, or elicof purpose to beguile this young Crassus, inticing him thereby as far from his father as they could. Publius Crasius seeing them she cryed out, These men will not abide vs. & so spur-red on for life after the so did Censorinus & Megabacchus with him (the onea Senator of Roma Censorinus. a very eloquent man, the other a front couragious valiant man of war) both of them Crassius well and Mega approved friends, and in maner of his own yeres. trained out thus to the chase, their footmen also would not abide behind, nor shew themselves to haue leffe hope, joy and courage, then their horsemen had. For they thought all had beene won, and that there was no more to doe, but to follow the chase: till they were gone far from the armie, and then they found the deceipt. For the horsemen that fled before them, suddenly turned againe, and a number of others besides came and set vponthem. Whervpon they staved thinking that the enemies perceiuing they were so few, would come and fight with them hand to hand. How beit they fet out against them their men at armes with their barbed horse, & made their light horsemen wheele round about them, keeping no order at all: who galloping vp and downe the plaine, whirled vp the fand hils from the bottome with their horse feet, which raised fuch a wonderfull dust, that the Romaine s. could scarce see or speake one to another. For they being shut vp into a little roome, and standing close one to another, were fore wounded with the PARTHIANS arrowes, and died of a cruell lingring death, crying out for anguish and paine they felt: and turning and tormenting themselues vpon the sand, they brake their arrowes sticking in them. Againe, striuing by force to plucke out the forked arrow heads that had pierced farre into their bodies through their veines and finewes, thereby they opened their wounds wider, and fo cast themselues away. Many of them died thus miserably martyred: and such as died not, were not able to defend themselves. Then when Publius Crassus prayed and belought them to charge the men at armes with the barbed horse, they shewed him their hands fast nailed to the targets with arrows, and their feet likewise shot through and nailed to the ground: so as they could neither flie nor yet defend themselues. Thereupon himselse encouraging his horsemen, went and gaue charge, and did valiantly set vpon the enemics, but it was withtoo great disaduantage. both for offence, and also for defence. For himselfe and his men with weake and light staues. brake vpon them that were armed with curaces of steele, or stiffe leather tackes. And the Par-THIAN'S in contrary maner with mighty strong pikes gaue charge vpon these GAVLES, which were either vnarmed, or else but lightly armed. Yet those were they in whom Crasus most trufled, having done wonderfull feates of warre with them. For they received the PARTHIANS pikes in their hands, and tooke them about the middles, and threw them off their horse, where they lay on the ground, and could not stirre for the weight of their harnesse; and there were diuerle of them also that lighting from their horse, lay vnder their enemies horse bellies, and thrust their swords into them. Their horse flinging and bounding in the airc for very painethrew their masters vnder feete, and their enemies one vpon another, and in the end fell dead among them. Morcouer, extreame heate and thirst did maruellously comber the GAVLES, who were vied to abide neither of both: and the most part of their horse were slaine, charging with all their power vpon the menat armes of the PARTHIANS, and so ranne themselves in vpon the points of their pikes. At the length, they were driven to retire towards their footmen, & Publius Crasus among them, who was very ill by reason of the wounds he had received. And seeing a fand hill by chance not farre from them, they went thither, and fetting their horse in the middest of it, compassed it in round with their targets, thinking by this meanes to couer and defend themselues the better from the barbarous people: howbeit they found it contrary. For the country being plain, they in the foremost ranckes did somewhat couer them behind, but they that were behind, standing higher then they that stood foremost (by reason of the nature of the hil that was highest in the middest (could by no meanes saue themselves, but were all hurt alike, as well the one as the other, bewailing their owne miseries and misfortune, that must needs die without renenge, or declaration of their valiancie. At that present time there were two Grecians about Publius Crasus, Hieronymus, and Nichomachus, who dwelt in those quarters, in the citie of CARRES: they both counselled Publius Crassus to steale away with them, and to slie to a citie called Is chars, that was not farre from thence, and tooke the Romaine's part. But Publica answered them, that there was no death so cruel as could make him for sake them that died for his sake. When he had fo faid, wishing them to faue themselues, he embraced them, and tooke his leaue of them: and being very fore hurt with the shot of an arrow through one of his hands, commanded one of his gentlemento thrust him through with a sword, and so turned his side to him for the purpose. It is reported Cenforinus did the like. But Megabacchus flue himfelfe with his owne hands, and lo did the most part of the gentlementhat were of that company. And for those that were left aliue, the PARTHIAN'S got up the fand hill, and fighting with them, thrust them through with their speares and pikes, and tooke but five hundred prisoners. After that, they aroke off Publius Craffus

Craffus head, and thereupon returned straight to set vpon his father Craffus, who was then in this ftate, crassus the father, after he had willed his son to charge the enemies, and that one brought him word he had broken them, and purfued the chase: and perceiving also that they that remained in their great battell, did not preafle vpo him so neare as they did before, because that a great number of them were gone after the other for rescue he then began to be lively again, and keeping his menclose, retired with them the best he could by a hils side, looking ever that his sonne would not be long before that he returned from the chase. But Publins seeing himselfe in danger. had fent divers mellengers to his father, to advertise him of his distresse, whom the PARTHI-ANS intercepted and flue by the way; and the last messengers he sent, scaping very hardly, brought Craffus newes, that his fonne was but cast way, if he did not presently aid him, and that with a great power. These newes were grieuous to Crassus in two respects; first for the seare he had feeing himfelfein danger to lofe all and fecondly, for the vehement defire he had to go to his fons helpe. Thus he faw in reason all would come to nought, and in fine determined togo with all his power to the refeue of his fonne. But in the meane time the enemies were returned from his fons ouerthrow, with a more dreadfull noise and cry of victorie, then euer before and thereupon their deadly founding drummes filled the airc with their wonderfull noife. The Ro-MAINES then looked itraight for a hot alarme. But the PARTHIANS that brought Publius Craffus head upon the point of a launce, comming necre to the ROMAINES, shewed them his head, and asked them in derifion, if they knew what house he was of and who were his parents; for it is not likely (faid they) that fo noble and valiant a yong man, should be the fon of so cowardly a father, as Crassias. The fight of Publius Crassus head killed the Romaine's hearts more then any other danger they had been in at any time in all the battell. For it did not fet their hearts on fire as it should have done, with anger, and defire of revenge; but farotherwise, made them quake for feare & stroke them stark dead to behold it. Yet Crasus selfe shewed greater courage in this misfortune, then he before had done in all the warre beside. For riding by euery band he cried out a- bis soldloud: The griefe and forrow of this lofte (my fellowes) is no mans but mine, mine onely: but the bis heart noble fuccesse & honor of Rom E remaineth still vnuincible, so long as you are yet living. Now was full of if you pitie my losse of so noble and valiant a son, my good souldiers, let me intreat you to turne fortime. your forrow into furicimake them dearely buy the joy they have gotten: be revenged of their crueltic, and let not my misfortune feare you. For why, afpiring minds fometime must needs 32 fustaine losse. Lucullus ouercame not Tigranes, nor Scipio, Antiochus, but their bloud did pay for " it. Our ancestors in old time lost athousand ships, yea in ITALIE divers armies and Chiefetaines "> for the conquest of Sicilia eyet for all the losse of them, at the length they were victorious oucr them, by whom they were before vanquished. For the Empire of Rome came not to that " greatnesse it now is at, by good fortune onely, but by patience and constant suffering of trouble " and aduerfitie, neuer yeelding or gining place vnto any danger. Craffus vfing these perswafions to encourage his fouldiers for refolution, found that all his words wrought none effect; but contrarily, after he had commanded them to give the shoute of battell, he plainely faw their hearts were done, for that their shout rose but faint, and not al alike. The PARTHIAN'S on the other side their shout was great, and lustily they rang it out. Now when they came to joyne, the PARTHI-ANS archers on horsebacke compassing in the Romaines vpon the wings, shot an infinite number of arrowes at their fides. But their men at armes giving charge vpo the front of the Ro-MAINES battel with their great lances, compelled them to draw into a narrow roome, a few excepted, that valiantly, and in desperate manner ran in among them, as men rather desiring so to die, then to be flaine with their arrowes, where they could doe the PARTHIANS almost no hurt at all. So were they foone dispatcht, with the great lances that ranne them through, head, wood and all, with fuch a force, as oftentimes they ranne through two at once. Thus when they had fought the whole day, night drew on, and made them retire, faying: they would give Craffus that nightes respit, to lament and bewaile his sonnes death; vnlesse that otherwise he wisely looking about him, thought it better for his fafety to come and offer himfelf to king Arfaces mercy, then to tarry to be brought vnto him by force. So the PARTHIANS camping hard by the Ro-MAINES, were in very good hope to ouerthrow him the next morning. The Romaines on the other fide had a maruellous ill night, making no reckoning to bury their dead, nor to dreffe their wounded menthat died in miserable pain; but every man bewailed his hard fortune, when they faw not one of them could escape, if they tarried till the morning. On the other side, to depart in fiege them. The next day he brought all his armie before the citie of CARRES. There the PAR-

the night through that defert, their wounded men did grieue them much. Because, to carie them fo away, they knew it would let their flight: and yet to leaue them so behind, their pitifull cries would give the enemies knowledge of their departure. Now though they all thought Crasus the only author of their miserie, yet were they desirous to see his face, and to heare him speake. But Crassus went aside without light, and layd him downe with his head couered; because he would fee no man, shewing thereby the common fort an example of vnstable fortune : and the wisemen, agood learning to know the fruits of ill counsell, and vaine ambition, that had so much blinded him, as he could not be content to command fo many thousand men, but thought (as a man would fay) himselfe the meanest of all other, and one that possess nothing, because he was accounted inferior vnto two persons onely, Pompey and Casar, Notwithstanding Octavius one of his Chieferaines, and Cassius the Treasurer, made him rise, and sought to comfort him the best they could. But in the end, seeing him so ouercome with forrow, and out of heart, that he had no life nor spirit in him, they themselves called the Captaines and Centurions together, and fate in councell for their departure, and so agreed that there was no longer tarying for them. Thus of their owne authoritie at the first they made the armie march away without any found of trumpet or other noise. But immediatly after, they that were left hurt and sicke, and could not follow, seeing the campe remoue, fell a crying out and tormenting themselues in such fort, that they filled the whole campe with forrow, and put them out of all order with the great moane and loud lamentation: so as the foremost ranke that first dislodged, fell into a maruellous feare, thinking they had bene the enemies that had come and fet vpon them. Then turning ofte and fetting themselves in batell ray, one while loading their beasts with the wounded men, another while valoading them againe, they were left behind, having three hundred horsemen that scaped, who came about midnight to the city of CARRES. Ignatius their Captaine called to the watch on the wals, and spake in the Latinetongue. Who answering, he willed them to tell Coponius, Gouernor of the towne, that Crasus had fought a great battell with the PARTHIANS, and faid no more, neither told he what he was: but rode on stil, til he came to the bridge which Crasus had made ouer Euphrates. Yet this word Ignatius gaucto the watch to tell Coponius, served Crasfus turne very well. For Coponius thought by this great hast of his, and the short confused speech he made, passing on his way, that he had no good newes to tell them: wherefore he straight armed his fouldiers, and understanding that Crassus was returning backe, went to meet him, and brought him and his armie into the citie of Carres. The Parthians knew wel inough of the remouing of the Romaine's campe, but yet would not follow them in the night, but the next morning entring into their campe where they lay, flue all that were left behind, which were aboue foure thousand men: and riding after them that were gone, tooke many stragglers in the plaine. Among them there was Barguntinus, one of Crassus Lieuctenants, who stayed in the night out of the army with fourewhole enfignes, and having loft his way, got a hill, wherethe PARTHIAN'S befieged him, flue him and all his company, though he valiantly there defended himselfe yet twentie of them onely cscaped, who with their swords drawne in their hands, running forwards with their heads, thrust in among the thickest of the PARTHIANS, They wondering at their desperation, opened of themselues, and suffered them to march on towards the city of CARRES. In the meane time falsenewes was brought to Surena, how Crasus with al the chiefest men of his host was sled, and that the great number that were received into the citie of Car-RES were men of all forts gathered together, and not a man of any qualitie or estimation. Surena therevpon thinking he had loft the honour of his victorie, yet standing in some doubt of it, because he would know the truth, that he might either besiege the citie of CARRES, or pursue after Crassisent one of his interpreters to the wals of the citie, charging him to call for Crassus or Cassius, and to tell them that Surena would parle with them. The interpreter did as he was commanded. Word was brought to Crassus, & he accepted parlence. Shortly after also, thither came certaine soldiers of the Arabian's from the campe of the Parthians, who knew Crassus and Cassius very well by fight, having divers times feen them in their campe before the battel. These ARABIANS seeing Callius vpon the wals, told him, that Surena was contented to make peace with them, and to let them go fafely, as his mafters good friends, so that they would surrender MESOPOTAMIA into the king of PARTHIAMS hands; and how they thought that was the best way for both parties, rather then to be enforced vnto it by extreamitie. Cassius thought this a good offer, and told them, that they must appoint the day and place, where Crassus and Surena

THIAN'S maruelloufly remited the ROMAINES, and told them, they must deliner them Crasus and Callius bound hands and feete, if they would have any grace or peace with them. The Ro-MAINES were maruellously offended that they were thus deceived, and told crassus that it was no boote any longer to look for aide of the ARMBNIANS, but prefently to flie:howbeit to keep in secret in any wise from any of the CARRENIANS, till the very houre of their departure. Yet Crassus selfhad told it to Andromachus the veriest traitor & villaine in all the city, whom he had shue treas chosen to be his guide. This traitor Andromachus aduertised the enemies in euery point, of their Crassus purpose and departure. But because the Parthians do neuer vse to fight in the night, and that it was a hard matter to bring them to it; and againe that Crasus departed in the night time: An- The Parish dromachus was afraid lest the Romain's would win such ground before the Parthian's, as they and one could not possibly ouertake them the next day. Therfore of purpose he sometime brought them nicht. one way, other while another way, and at the last, brought them into a great bogge or marish, ful of deepe holes and ditches, and where they must needs makes many turnes, and returnes before they could get out againc, and yet very hardly. Whereupon, fome in the armie began to mistrust, that Andromachus meant no good, to turne and tosse them vp and downe in that sort, and therfore would follow him no more: infomuch as Cassius among others, returned towards the citie of CARRES againe, from whence they came. And when his guides (who were ARADI-ANS) counselled him to tarie there till the Moone were out of the figne of Scorpio, he answered them: I feare the figne of Sagitarie more. So as foone as he could, he tooke his way towards canius Assyria with flue hundred horsemen. And other of the army also having faithful guides, reco-gentle and ucred a country of the mountaines, called Sinnaca, and retired into a fafe place before the break for in the fraights. of day: and they were about five hundred men, whom offaulus a noble man had in charge, But the day stole upon Crassus, hunting vp and down yet in the marish, in those ill fauored places, into the which Andromachus that traitor had of purpose brought him, having with him 4 ensignes of footmen all with targets, and very few horimen, and fine fergeants that caried the axes and rods before him, with whom, with much ado and great labour he got into the right way when the enemies were almost upon him, and that he was within twelve furlongs of ioyning with Octavius. There in hast he had gotten a hill, which was not so steep for horsemen, neither of such strength as the other hils were, called Sinnaces, yet vnder them, & joyning to them by a long hil that runneth along the plaine, fo as Octavius plainely faw the danger Crasus was in. Therupon he first ran downe the hils with a few of his men that followed him: but after also came all the rest, faying they were cowards if they should tarie behind. At their comming they gaue such a hote onfet vpon the PARTHIANS, that they made them give backe from that hill: and compassing Craffus in the middest of them, covering him round with their targets, they spake nobly, that never The world; arrow of the PARTHIANS, should touch the body of their General, before they were slaine one Romaine after another, and that they had fought it out to the last man in his defence. Herupon Surena per- soldiers to ceiuing the Parthian's were not so couragious as they were wont to be, and that if night came their chief vponthem, and that the ROMAINES did once recouer the high mountaines, they could neuer possibly be met withall againe: he thought cunningly to beguile Crassus once more by this de- another that the king of PARTHIA would have no mortal war with the Romaines; but far otherwife:

he rather defired their friendship, by shewing them some notable fauour, as to vie Crasus very courteoully, And to give colour to this bruite, he called his men from fight, and going himself in person towards crassus, with the chiefest of the nobilitie of his hoast, in quiet maner, his bow to let them go fafely where they would. Althe Romaines besides Crassus were glad of Surenaes words. But Crassus that had been deceived before by their crasty fetches & devices, considering also no cause apparant to make them change thus suddenly, wold not harken to it, but first confulted with his friends. Howbeit the foldiers they crycdout on him to go, and fel at words with him: Though the Romaine's had felt the force and power of their king, it was against his will, Surera for he could do no leffe but defend himfelf; how beit that now he was very willing and defirous to make them tast of his mercy and elemencie, and was contented to make peace with them, and crasses him, faying, that he cared not though they were all flaine, and that himselfe had not the heart only to come downe and talke with the enemies that were ynarmed. Crassus proued first to pacifie them by faire meanes, perswading them to have a little patience but till night, which was at hand, and then they might fafely depart at their pleasure, and recouer the mountaines & streight passages, where their enemies could not follow them : and pointing them the way with his finger, he prayed them not to be faint hearted; nor to despaire of their safety, seeing they were so neare it. But in the end Crassus perceiuing they fell to mutinie, and beating of their harnesse, did threaten him if he went not: fearing then they wold do him fome villanie, went towards the enemie, and comming backe a litle; faid only these words: O Octavius, and you Petronius, with al you ROMAINE gentlementhat haue charge in this armie, you all see now how against my wil mainer go. I am inforced to go to the place I would not, and can witnesse with me, how I am driven with shame and force; yet I pray you, if your fortunes be to escape this danger, that ye will report wherefoeuer you come, that Craffus was flaine, not deliuered vp by his owne fouldiers into the hands of the barbarous people, as I am, but deceived by the fraud and subtiltie of his enemies. cc Octavius would not tary behind on the hill, but went downe with Crassus: but Crassus fent away his officers that followed him. The first that came from the PARTHIANS VIITO CTASUS WETE TWO mongrell Grecians, who difmounting from their horse, saluted him, and prayed him to send some of his men before, and Surena would shew them, that both himselfe and his traine came vnarmed towards him. Grassus thereto made him answer, that if he had made any account of his life, he wold not have put himselfe into their hands. Notwithstanding he sent two brethren before called the Roscians, to know what number of men, and to what end they met so many togeher. These two brethren came no sooner to Surena, but they were staid, and himselfe in the meanctime kept on his way a horsebacke, with the noblest men of his armie. Now when Surena came neare to Crasus: Why, how now (quoth he) what meaneth this? a Consull and Lieutenane generall of Rome on foot, and we on horsebacks. Therwithall he straight commanded one of his men to bring him a horse. Crassus answered Surena againe: In that they neither of both offended, following the vse and maner of their countrey, when any meeting is made for treatie of peace. Surena replied: As for the treatic of peace, that was already agreed upon between the king Hyrodes and the ROMAINES; howbeit that they were to goe to the river, and there to fet downe thearticles in writing: for you Romain es (said he) do not greatly remember the capitulations you have agreed vpon. With those words he gave him his right hand. As Crassus was sending for a horse; You shal not need, saith Surena; for look, the king doth present you this. And straight one was brought him with a steele saddle richly gilt, vpon the which his gentlemen mounted Crassis immediatly, and following him behind lashed his horseto make him runne the swifter. Ottavian sceing that, first laid hand on the bridle, then Petronius Colonell of a thousand footmen; and after them, all the rest of the Romaine's also gathered about Crassus to stay the horse, and totake him from them by forcethat pressed him on of either side. So they thrust one at another at the first very angrily, and at the last felto blowes. Then Octavius drew out his sword, and slue one of the barbarous noblemens horsekeepers: and another came behind him and slue Octavius. Petrowins had no target, and receiving a blow on his curaces, lighted from his horse, and had no hurt: and on the other fide came Pomaxathres, one of the PARTHIANS, and flue Graffus. Some fay notwithstanding that Pomaxathres slue him not, but another; yet that he cut off his head and his hand after he fel dead to the ground. But all these reports are rather coniectures, the any certaintie. For as for them that were there, some of them were slaine in the field fighting for Crasus, and other faued themseleues by flying to the hil. The Parthians followed them, and told the that Crassus had paid the paine he had deserved, and for the rest, that Surena bad them come downe with fafetie. Then some of them yeelded to their enimies, and other dispersed themselues when night came, and of them very few escaped with life. Others being followed & pursued by the ARABIANS, were all put to the fword. So asit is thought there were flaine in this ouerthrow abouttwentie thousand men, and ten thousand taken prisoners. Surena had now sent Crassus head and his hand vnto Hyrodes the king his maister, into ARMENIA, and gaue out a bruite as farre as the city of Selevela, that he brought Crasus aliue, and that he had prepared a fight to laugh at, which he called his triumph. Among the ROMAIN prisoners, there was one called Cains Pacianus who was very like Graffus: him they clothed in womans apparell of the PARTHIANS, and had taught him to answer, when any called him Crassus, or Lord captain. Him they put a horseback, and had many trumpets before him, and Sergeants vpon Camels backes, that caried axes before him, and bundels of rods, and many purses tied to the bundels of rods, and Romaines heads newly cut offtied to the axes: and after him followed all the strumpets and women minitrels of Selevcia, who went finging of fongs of mockerie and derifion of Crassas womannish cowardlinesse. Now for these open shewes, every one might see them: but besides that fight, Suwardinene. Now for there open newes, energy one might be them. Dendes that light, Sm. Arifides bookes of ritena having called the Senate of SELEVEIA together, layd before them Arifides bookes of ribookes inbaldrie, intituled The Milefians, which was no fable, for they were found in a Romains fardle similed, she or truffe called Ruffins. This gaue Surena great cause to scorne and despise the behauiour of the Milesians ROMAINES, which was fo far out of order, that even in the warres they could not refraine from doing euill, and from the reading of such vile bookes. Then the Senators of SELEVEIA found that Alope was a wife man, who faid, that enery man caried a fack on his necke, and that they put Alope wife other mens faults at the fackes mouth, and their owne towards the bottome of the facke: when faring. they confidered that Surena had put the booke of the laciniousnesse of the MILBSIANS at the fackes mouth, and a long tale of the PARTHIANS vaine pleasures and delights in the bottome of the facke, carying fuch a number of carts loden with naughty packes in his armie, as he did, which seemed an army of ermits and field-mice. For in the voward and foremost rankes, all appeared terrible and cruell, being onely lances, pikes, bowes, and horse; but all they ended afterwards in the rereward with a traine of harlots, instruments of musicke, dauncing, finging, ban- son of suqueting, and rioting all night with curtizans. I will not denie but Ruftins deserved blame: but remaistrup yet withall, I fay, that the PARTHIANS were shamelesse to reproue these bookes of the vanicies of the MILESIANS, confidering that many of their kings, and of the royall bloud of the arfacides, were borne of the Ion IAN and MILESIAN curtizans. Things paffing thus in this fort, king Hyrodes had made peace and league with Artabazes king of ARMENIA, who gave his fifter in mariage vnto Pacorus, king Hyrodes sonne, and made great feasts one to another: in the which were many Greeke verses sung, Hyrodes selfe understanding well the Greeketong, and Artabazes was fo perfect init, that he himfelfe made certaine tragedies, orations, and stories, whereof some are, yet extant at this day. The fame night Craffus head was brought, the tables being all taken vp, Ia- craffus fona common player of enterludes (borne in the citie of THALLES came before the king, and bead recited a place of the tragedie of the BACCHANTES of Euripides, telling of the misfortune of A- brought to gaue, who strak off his sons head. And as enery man took great pleasure to heare him, syllaces coming into the hall, after his humble duty first done to the king, deliuered him Crasus head before them al. The PARTHIANS feeing that, fel a clapping of their hands, and made an outcrie for ioy. The gentlemen Vihers by the kings commandement did fet Syllaces at the table. Infor casting off his apparell representing Pentheus person, gaue it to another player to put it on him; and counterfeiting the BACCHANTES possest with furie, began to rehearse these verses, with a gesture tune and voice of a man mad and beside himselse:

Behold, we from the forrest bring a stag now newly staine, A worthis bootie and reward beseeming well our paine.

This maruelloufly grudged the companie, and specially singing these verses afterwards, where the Chorus both asked and answered himselfe:

who strake this stag? None else but I thereof may brag.

Pomaxathres hearing them dispute about the matter, being set at the table with others, rose straight, and went and took the head himselfe, to whom of right it belonged to say those words, and not vnto the player that fpake them. King Hyrades liked this fport maruelloufly, and rewarded Pomarathres according to the manner of the countrey in such a case: and to lason he also gaue atalent. Such was the successe of Crassius enterprise and voyage, much like vnto the end of see therea tragedie. But afterwards Hyrodes crucltie, and Surenas foule periurie and craft, were in the end ward a tragedie. But atterwards Hyrodes crucitie, and Surenas some persurte and craft, were inches in filly reuenged vpon them both according to their deferts. For king Hyrodes enuying Surenaes septimie. glorie, put Surenato death. And Hyrodes fell into a disease that became a dropsie, after he had lost The misea. his sonne Pacorus, who was flaine in a battel by the Romain Es. Phraates his second sonne, thinking to fet his father forwards gaue him drinke of the inyce of Aconicum. The dropfie received des and the poy son, and one draue the other out of Hyrodes bodie, and set him on foot againe. Phraates perceiuing his father to amend vpon it, to make short worke, with his owne hands strangled him.

THE COMPARISON OF Crassus with Nicias:

Micias and Erasjus riches

Vt now to proceed to the comparison: first, Nicias goods were more iustly gotten, and with lesse reproach then Grasus wealth, for otherwise a man cannot giue any great praise to minerall workes, the which are wrought by lewd and ill disposed barbarous fellowes kept in irons. and toiled to deach in vnwholesome and pestilent places. But being compared vnto Grassus buying of confiscate goods at Syllaes hands, and vingentlemanlie bargaines of houses on fire, or in danger thereof, furely Nicias trade will appeare the better way of getting : for as openly did Crassus auow vsury, as tillage. And againe for other faults, where-with Crassus many times was burthened, and which he stoutly denied: as, that he tooke money of men having matters before the Senate at Rome, to winne favour for their fide: and that he preferred matters to the prejudice of the confederates of the Romaines, onely for his private profit; and therfore curried fauor with Ladies, and generally fought to cloke all foule offenders: of all these faults was Micias neuer so much as once suspected. For he to the contrarie, was mocked of enery body, because for searche maintained wicked doers by gifts: which perhaps wold not have becomed Pericles nor Ariftides, and yet was meete for Nicias, who was borne a timorous natured man, and neuer had courage in him. Whereof Lycurgus the Orator did vaunt afterwards to the people, being accused that he redeemed detractors with money: I am glad, said he. that having dealethus long in affaires of the state, it is found I have rather given then taken. And now touching expences, Nicias was thought the better and more civill citizen. For his charge and cost was, in dedicating some goodly image to the gods, or in making of publike playes or passimes to recreate the people, But all the money he spent that way, and all that he was worth besides, was nothing comparable, and but a small part of that Crassus bestowed in an open seast he made at Rome, feasting so many thousands at one time, and did find and maintaine them also for a certaine time after. Now I cannot but wonder at those men, that denie vice to be an inequalitie and disagreement of manners, repugnant in it felf, seeing men may honeftly spend that which is naughtily gotten. Thus much for their goods. For Nicias doings in the commonweale he did nothing malicioufly, cruelly, nor vniuftly, neither any thing of felfe-wil or ftomacke, but rather dealt plainely and fimply. For he was deceived by trufting of Alcibiades, and never came to speake before the people, but with great feare, Crassus on the other side was reproued for his vnconstancy and lightnesse, for that he would easily change friends or enemies; and he himselfe denied not, that he came to be Consull the second time by plaine force and crueltie, hauing hired two murtherers to kill Cato and Domitius. And in the affembly the people held for dividing of the provinces, many men were hurt, and foure were flaine in the market place: and more then that, crasus himselfe (which we have forgotten to write in his life) gave one Lucius Nicias and Cr4ffes acts in the Lucius Annalius fo fore a blow on the face with his fift, for speaking against him, that he sent him going with bloud about his cares. But as Craffus in those things was very fierce and cruell: fo Nicias womanish behauiour on the other side, and faint heart in matters of common wealth, humbling himselfe to the meanest and most vile persons, deserved great reproach. Where Crassus in this respect shewed himselfeassuredly of a noble mind, not contending with men of small account, as with Clean or Hyperbolus, but would give no place to Cafars fame and glorie, not yet to Pompeys three triumphs, but fought to go euen with them in power and authoritie: and had immediatly before exceeded Pompeys power, in the dignitic of Cenfor. For Magistrates: and Go- The duty of uernours of the commonweale, should make themselves to be honoured, but not enuied, killing Governors enuic by the greatnesse of their power. But if it were so that Nicios preferred quietnesse, and the giftates fafetie of his person about all things esse, and that he feared Alcibiades in the pulpit for orations, the LACED AMONIANS in the fort of Pyle, and Perdiceas in THRACIA: he had libertie and scope enough to repose himselfe in the citie of Athens, and might have forborne the dealing in matters, and (as R hetoricians fay) have put a hood of quietnesse vpon his head very well. For doubtlette, concerning his defire to make peace, it was a godly mind in him, and an act worthy of a noble person, to bring that to passe he did, appeasing all warre: wherein Crassus certainly was not to be compared to him, though he had in one dall the provinces to the empire of Rome, that reach vnto the Caipian fea, and to the great Ocean of the INDIAEs. But on the other fide also when one hath to deale with people that can discerne when a man ruleth according to equitic and inflice, and that he feeth he is in the prime of his credit and authoritie: he must not then for lack of courage fuffer wicked men to step in his roome, nor give occasion to preferre such to authoritie in the commonweale, as are vnworthiefor that place and countenance: neither should allow fuch any credit, as are altogether of no credit nor truft, as Nicias did: who was the onely occasion that Clean, being before but a pratting Orator, was chosen Generall. Neither do I also commend Crassus, for that in the warre against Spartacus, he made hast to give him battell, more rashly then safely or consideratly. For his ambition spurred him forward, because he was afraid left fombers coming should take from him the glorie of all that he had done in that war:as Mummius tooke from Metellus the honour of the winning of Corinth. But besides all this, Nicias fact therein was without the compaffe of reason, and can no way be excused. For he did not refigne his honour and office of Generall to Cleon his enemie, when there was hope of good fucceffe, or little perill: but fearing the danger of the journey, he was contented to faue one, and fearefulnes tooke no care besides for the common wealth. Which Themistocles shewed not, in the time of the warre against the PERSIANS. For he, to keepe Epycides an Orator (a man of no reckening befide his eloquence, and extreamely couetous) from being chosen Generall of ATHENS, lest he veriues. should have overthrowne the common weale: sccretly bribed him with money to leave off his fuire. And Cato also when he saw the state of Rome in greatest danger, sued to be Tribune of the people for the commonwealths sake. And Nicias in contrarie maner, reserving himself to make war with the citic of Minoa, or with the Ile of Cithera, or with the poore vnfortunate Me-LIANS, if there fell out afterwards occasion to fight against the LACED EMONIANS, then away went his Captaines cloke, and he left the ships, the armie and munition to the charge and gouernment of Cleons rashnesse and small experience of warre, when the necessary of the service required the wifest and most expert captaine. The which he did not, despising the meanes to make him honored but it was a plaine drawing backe, at time of need to defend his countrey. Wherefore afterwards he was compelled against his wilto be General to make wars in Sicilia with the Syracysans: because the people thought he was not so earnest to disswade the journey, for that he thought it not meet for the commonwealth, but because through his sloth and cowardlinesse he would make his country lose so good an oportunity to conquer Sicile. Yet was this a great testimony of his honesty and trust they had in him: who though he euer hated war, and did flie from the offices of honor and charge in the comonwealth, his countrimen notwith standing did alwaics chuse him, as the most experienced person and meetest man of the city. Now Crasfus in contrary maner, defiring nothing else but to be Generall, could neuer attaine to it, but in the warre of the bondmen, and yet was it for lacke of another: (for Pompey Metellus, and both the Lucullus were then abroad in the wars) although he was otherwise of great estimation and authority. Howbeit it seemeth to me, that his friends that loued him best, thought him (as the comi-

His ambition not with standing, and couetous desire of rule, did nothing benefite the ROMAINS. For the ATHENIAN'S fent Nicias to the war against his will: but Crasus led the Romaines thiprioritions ther against their wils. So that the common wealth fell into miserie by the one and the other through the commonwealth was brought into miscrie: and yet therein there is rather cause to praise Nicias, the to blame Crasus. For Nicias like a wife man, and a Captaine of great experience, could neuer formuch as be brought to thinke they should conquer Signatand therefore diffwaded his countrimen from the journey; and would give no place to the vaine hope of the people of ATHENS. But Crassus taking upon him to make wars with the PARTHIANS, as though it had been an casse matter to overcome them, found himself deceived, yet did he aspire to great things. For as Iulius Cafar had conquered and subdued to the imperiall crowne of Rome, all the countries of the West parts, to say, the Gavles, the Germaines, and England : even so did Crassus desire to go towards the East parts to conquer all to the great West sea of the India ANS, and to subdue all the regions of Asia, whereunto Pompey and Lucullus aspired, being both very noble personages, aud such as euer courteously behaued themselves to all men : notwithstanding provoked thereunto with the like defire that Crassia had. For when the charge of the wars in the East parts was affigned to Pompey by decree and order of the people, the Senate vtterly misliked it, and were against it althey could. When newes were brought to Rome that Inlins Calar in battell had ouer thrown and flaine three hundred thou fand GERMAINES, Cate perswading with the Senate, was yet still of this mind, that C.e.far should be deliuered into the hands of his enemies whom he had ouercome, for to be punished therby to turne the sharpe reuenge and wrath of the gods from Rome, vpon him onely that was the vniust breaker of peace. This notwithstanding, the people making none account of Catoes perswasions, made common feafts and proceffions fifteene dayes together, and open facrifices to the gods with great iov through the citie, to thanke them for this famous victorie. How glad may we thinke would they haue beene, and how many daies would they have feafted and facrificed, if Crassus had written from BABYLON of his victory, and that he had conquered all the realmes of the MEDES, of the PERSIANS, Of the HYRCANIANS, of SYSE and of the BACTRIANS, and that he had made new gouernments and provinces to the Empire of Rome?

If aman will needes doe wrong and iniuffice,

As Eurypides faith to them that cannot live in peace, and be contented with their owne, he must not then sticke at trifles, (as the razing of a castle of Scandia, or of a citic of Menda, or chasing of the ÆGINETES being out of their own naturall country, and hiding themselues like birds with. out nefts, in any other birds holes) but must dearely sell the wrong he doth, and not lightly contemne inflice, as athing of small account. For they that will commend the intent of Alexander the Great in his voyage, for the conquests he made in the East, and do dispraise Crassus voyage, do not well to judge of the beginning, by the events and fuccesse of the end. For executing of their offices, Nicias did many noble exploits: for he ouerthrew his enemies in diverse battels, commended and hadalmost taken the city of Syracusa: and fure they cannot justly blame him for all the misfortunes that chanced in the warre of Sicilia, but partly the plague was cause of it, and partly also the enuie of those towards him that remained at ATHENS. Wheras Crassus ranne into so many errors, and committed such foule parts in all his voyage, that he gaue fortune no levfure to do him good: fo that I wonder not fo much that his folly was ouercome by the power Stelappin of the Parthians, as that it could our come the good fortune of the Romaines, Sithence Rymainss. it fo falleth out the, that they both came to like vnfortunate end, Nicias prognosticating before what things should happen, by art and rule of divination; and Crassis contrarily distaining to observe any thing: sure it falleth out hard in judgement, which of the two proceeded with most fafery. Yea according to the best approued opinions, a fault committed of seare is more excusable, then of rashnesse and folly to breake any ancient law or custome. For their deaths, Crassus end deferued leaft reproch. For he against his wil did yeeld himselfe, and was neither bound nor mocked, but onely perfwaded by his friends, and through his enemies fraud and treason most traiterously deceived: where Nicias cowardly and dishonourably hoping to faue his life, trusting to the mercy of his enemies,

pose, the one by example of the other, as that of two men being both named Attis, both one like of them come of noble houses, the one in Syria, and the other in Arcadia, both the one and the other were flame with a wild bore. That of two called Action, the one was torne in pecces by his dogges, the other by his louers. That of the two famous Scipioes, the CARTHA-GINIAN'S Were first ouercome by the one and afterwards viterly destroyed by the other. That the citie of Tao y was first taken by Hercules, for the horses that Laomedon had promised him: the second time by Agamemnon, by meanes of the great woodden horse: and the third time by Charidemus, by meanes of ahorse that fell within the gate, and kept the Troians that they could not shurit in time. And that of two sweete smelling plants, Ios, and Smyrna, two cities were named, the one fignifying the Violet, and the other Myrre: it is supposed that the Poet Homer was borne in the one, and that he died in the other. We may also adde to this example, The sources that amongst the ancient Captaines, the greatest warriers (and that have done the noblest exploits by wit and warlike stratagemes) had but one eye : as Philip, Antigonus, Hannibal, bonneant and Sertorius also, whom we write of at this present. Whom we may truly report to have did beenemore chaft than Philip: more faithfull to his friend than Antigonus: more courteous moustains to his encomies than Hannibal: and for wifedome and indgement to give place to none of them, same that but in good fortune to them all. The which, though she shewed her spite more to him, than to his enemies that were all great mensyet in experience he was equall with Metellus, in prowes The praise and valiancie with Pompey, and in fortune with Sylla. So that being banished his country, a stran- of Sertorius ger in another realme, and having to governe a barbarous nation, he not with standing maintained warres for a time, against the power of the Romaine's. Me thinkes therefore, that of all the

GRECIAN Captaines I can liken none so well vnto him as Eumenes the CARDIAN. For both of them knew how to command, both were very valiant and politicke in wars, both were banished men out of their countrey, both were Captaines ouer strangers, and both of them were traiteroufly and villanoufly flaine by them, through whom they had before ouercome their enemies. Now for Sertorius, he came of worthipfull parents, and was borne in the city of NVR $ 1A in the country of § SABINES. His father left him a very child with his mother, who carefully brought him vp, and whom he fingularly loued and reverenced. Her name as they fay was Rhea. His first rifing and beginning grew by pleading matters in law, which he could handle very well: info much as being a yong man he came to Rome, and wan some name by his eloquence. Howbeit, the honour and estimation he atchieued afterwards by his valiant acts, made him employ all his studie and ambitious care, to armes and warres. The first time of his souldier fare was, when the CIMBRES and TEVTONS inuaded GAVLE with a mighty armie: where when the ROMAINS had been ouercome under the leading of Capio, his horse being staine under him, and himselse hurt, he notwithstanding swam ouer the river of Rone, with his corslet and target vpon him, breaking the furie and rage of the river with meere strength, fo able and lustie a bodie he had to brooke all paines and hardnesse. The second time that these barbarous CIMERES returned with an infinite number of fighting men, and with proud and dreadfull threats, the Romaines were then so afraid, that they thought him a stout man that had but the courage to keepe his rancke, and obey his Captaines. At that time was Marius Generall of the Romaine army, and then did Sertorius vndertake to go and discouer the enemies campe. And for the purpose apparelled himfelfe like a GAVLE, and learned the common words and phrases of their language, to salute one another when they met, and in this fort went among them: and having partly by fight and report learned that he fought for, he returned to Marius, who then gaue him fuch honourable reward as was due to his defert. All the time of the warre after, he did fuch valiant acts and deeds of armes, that his captaine had him in great estimation, and committed the chiefest matters to his charge. Whereupon the warres being ended with the TEVTONS and CIMBRES, Sertorins was fentinto Spaine, under Didius the Prætor, with charge of a thousand footmen, with whom he wintred in the citie of CASTVLO, in the marches of the CELTIBERIANS: where the fouldiers finding plenty of victuals', fell to gluttony and drunkennesse, and committed great insolencie, being ouercome with wine. Infomuch as the barbarous people of the city grew to fuch a misliking and disdaine of them, that they sent one night to their next neighbours the GYRISENIANS for aide, and as they came by the Romaine's lodging, flue a great number of them. Sertorius hearing the noise, went immediatly out of the city with a few of his men, and gathering them together also that fled on after another to faue themselues, went round about the wals of the citie, and finding the gate open where the Gyrisenians came in, there entred healfo: who being more carefull than they had shewed themselues, left the gates and all the parts of the citie well guarded, and then put all to the sword within that were of age to carie weapon. Now when he had executed this revenge, he commanded all his fouldiers to leave off their owne apparell #ra: 13' mo. and weapons, and to take those of the barbarous people whom they had slaine, and to follow him to the citie of the Gyrisenians, from whence they came that had on such a sudden assailed them in the night. The Gyrisenians feeing the garments and weapons of their supposed men farre off, thinking certainly they had been they, opened their gates, and a number of people went out, as to meete their friends and citizens, whom they thought had happily feed of their purpose. Thus were a maruellous number of them slaine by the Romaine seeuen hard at the gates of their citie: and the rest putting themselues to Sertorius mercy, he sold for slaues. After this exploit, Sertorius wanne great fame through all Spaine, and returning to Rome, was made Quaffor or treasurer generall of GAVLE, on this fide of the mountaines, by the river of Po. A happy chance for Kome: for even at that very present time fell out the warres of the confederates and allies of ITALIE, called the MARSIANS warre, in the which he had commiffion to preft fouldiers, and to make armour. And therein he shewed such diligence and expedition for quicke dispatch of that service, in respect of the long delay and carelesse regard other young men had of the same before: that he wonne the name to be a carefull man of his charge, and one that afterwards would atchieue great enterprises. Furthermore, when he came to be a Captaine himselfe, he would not let to venture his person as valiantly as any other private, souldier whatsoeuer, but did maruellous actes with his owne hands, euen in greatest perils and conflicts: in so much as at the length he lost one of his eyes in fight. Whereof he was noand conflicts: in 10 much as at the length he lott one of his eyes in fight. Whereon he was nothing ashamed, but continually gloried in it: for others, said he, do not alwaies carie the markes left one of his eyes in fight. about them of their valiant fervice, but leave them otherwhiles at home, as their chaines, carcanets, jauclins, and crownes, given them by their Captaines for testimonie of their valiancy: fghs. how be it that he alwaics caried the markes about him (wherefoeuer he went) of his feruice. fo that fuch as faw the blemish of his eye, did therewithall witnesse his valiantnesse and courage. The people also did honour him as became them. For when he came into the Threater. they welcomed him with clapping of their hands, and great praifes, which the ROMAINES did feantly vie vnto their oldest Captaines, and which were most honoured for their great and noble feruice. Neuerthelesse, when he sued to be Tribune, he was rejected by Syllaes practise. who hindred him : whereupon grow as it seemed, that grudge and malice which he cuer after bare vnto Sylla. For after that Mariu was fled being ouercome by Sylla, and that Sylla was gone The scale out of ITALIE to make warre with Mithridates, and that of the two Confuls, Octavim tooke one make make part with Sylla, and cinna the other Confull (which fought change and alteration) was gathe- mospila, ring mentogether to fet vp Marsus faction, that was in manner vnderfoote: Serverius tooke his part, because he saw that Octavius was but a flow and lither man, and did not besides trust any serious of Marius friends. So was there acruell conflict betweene them, euen in the market place with Ginnel within the citic felfe, where Octanias had the upper hand; and Cinna and Sectorius leaved by flying, having loft few leffe then ten thousand men in this onely overthrow. Neverthelesse, afterwards through practife and pollice, they got those fouldiers together againe that were difperfed here and therethrough Iral 15 foas in short time they made their power equall with odansus force. Marius also being aduertised of the same, tooke the sea incontinently, and returned into ITALY out of AFRICKE, and came to Cinna to ferue as a private foldier, vnder his Captaine and Confull. Now they alliked well, thate Marius should be received, saving Servorius, who was against him all he could fearing that ei her his credit and estimation should diminish, Canna Sertorius having a worther Captaine, then himfelf, to feruchim, or elfe that Marius crueltie and feueritie Linna to (who pardoned none offence) would marre alroge, ther, having no ftay in his anger, but bent yt-, receive terly to Mixed of crueltie to his enemies, if Cruna fortuned to hauethe victorie. And thereunto he added this further that now they had the victory in manner in their hands, if they once receiued Marius vnto them, he would rob them of all, he honour of ending this warre, and being alto inauthority, he was neither to be trufted nor commanded. Whereunto Ginna answered thus: that he thought the words he had alledged to be true, how beit that he was assumed; and befides could not fee with honestie how he might refuse Marins, or send him backe, fithence he had purposely sent for him, to commit part of the charge of these warres vnto him. Sertorius againe replied: Sure I thought Marius had come of his owne good will vnfent for, and therefore (as for the best in mine owne opinion) I gaine aduice not to receive him: but sithence it is so that you lent for him before, and that he is now come vpon your commandement, you were much to blame to aske counsell whether you should now receive him, or not. And therefore you must needs accept his service that is come voon your word for the bond of your promise past you, doth now cut off all counsell or other resolution. Thereupon Marius was called for: and when he came, they deuided their whole armie into three parts, and then began to charge Vpon their enemies of all hands, fo as they obtained victorie. Howbeit Cinna and Marius committed as horrible crueltie in this victorie, as could possibly be shewed: in so much as the ROMAINE s thought at the inferies they had endured in time of this war nothing, and but a play as i were, in respect of the great calamities they fell into afterwards. Now Sectorius on the other fide neuer caused manto be flaine for any prinate malice, or quarrell he had with any perfon, reither did he hurt any man when he had ouercome, but was much offended with Marins infolencie and cruel murthers, and whe he had good opportunity to speake with Ginna apart, he did qualifie him the best he could, and made him more mild and tractable through his perswafion. I fine, Sertorius seeing Marius guarded with a great number of bondmen for lacke of o. Seriarius ther fouldiers in this warre, whom he yield as executioners of his flaughter and butcherie, alwaies attending about his perfonas a guard, and suffering them also to make themselues rich, partly with that he gaue them, or commanded them to spoile, and partly also with that they violently tooke without his commandement of their owne mailters, killing them when they had done, ranishing their mistresses, and defiling their children the could no longer abide such wickednesse and villanie, but made them all to be slaine in their campe where they lay together, Sue Marius being no lesse then foure thousand persons. Afterwards when he saw that the elder Marius was dead, and that soone after Cinna was slaine, the younger Marius his sonne (against his counfell, and contrarie to the lawes of Rome) had by force made himselfe Consull: and that Carbo, Scipio, and Norbanus (which had been ouercome by Sylla) were come out of GRECE to Rome. wards, partly through the cowardlinesse of their Captaines, and partly also because they were betrayed and fold of their owne men: and further, confidering therewithall, that his person could do no good in those affaires, which waxed worse and worse, by means of the authority of fuch as had least wit and vnderstanding, and specially also seeing Sylla campe hard by Scipio, makingmuch of him, and feeding him with hope of a good peace, whilst vnderhand he wanne his foldiers from him, notwithstanding, that he was certainly warned and told of it before: Sertorius then vtterly despairing of Romes prosperity and welfare, departed from Rome to go towards SPAINE, thinking that if he could get the first possession and government of that realme, it wold at the lest be a refuge and receipt for al those of their tribe that should chance to be banished out of their country. Howbeit in his voyage thitherward, hemet with foule and rough weather; and paffing through a country of mountaines, the barbarous people inhabiting the same, demanded tribute of him, for licence to passe through their territories. Therat the soldiers of his company were maruellously offended, saying that it were too much shame and dishonour for a Proconfull of Rome, to pay tribute to vile barbarous people. Notwithstanding, Sertorius passed nor for the shame they said it would be to him, but answered them thus: that he bought time, which thing he should not reckon of that aspireth to haughtie enterprises; and so pleased the barbarous people with money. And thus he madefuch speed, as he quickly recouered Spaine, which he found greatly replenished with people, and specially of young men able to weare armour. But now Sertorius perceiuing that they had been hardly dealt withall before, through the infolency, pride, and couctous firest of the Romaine gouernours, whom they ordinarily sent from Rome and that therforethey hated all manner of gonernment : first of all songhtto win the good wils of all the whole countrimen one and other. Of the noblemen, by being familiar and connerfant with them: and of the common people, by eafing them of their taxe and subsidies. But that which bred him most love of al men generally was this: that he dispensed with them for lodging of fouldiers, and receiving of any garrison within their cities, compelling his fouldiers to let vo their tents, and to make their cabins without the fuburbs, of great cities to winter there, and cau. fing also his owne pauillion to be first set vp, and lay in it himselfe in person. This notwithstanding, he pleased not these barbarous people in all things to win their fauour for he armedall the ROMAINE citizens of age to carie weapon that dwelt in Spain, and made them make al forts of engines for battery, and a number of gallies besides, so that he had all the cities at commande. ment, being very courteous to them in matters of peace, but in warlike munition, very dreadfull to hisenemics. After Sertorius, vinderstood that Syllakept Rome, and that the most part of the tribe of Marius and Carbo was veterly ouerthrown, mistrusting that it would not be long before they sent some Captaine with a greatarmic against him: he sent Iulius Salinator betimes to keepe the mountaines Pirenei, with fixe thousand men well armed. Immediatly after Cains Annius also came thither, fent by Sylla: who feeing no possibilitie to distresse Salinator in a place of suchaduantage, was driven to stay at the foot of the mountaine, not knowing what to determine. But by misfortune one Galphurnius furnamed Lanarius, traiterously flue Salinator: whereupon his fouldiers forthwith forfook the top of the mountaines, and by this meanes Annius had easie paffage with his armie which was very great, and ouerthrew them that refulted his farther coming on into the country . Sertorius finding himselfe not strong inough to fight with him, marcheda, way with three thousand men vnto the city of new CARTHAGE, and there took sea from thence Spains into he coasted ouer into A FRICKE, and fell with the coast of the MAVRYSIANS, where his foldiers landed immediatly for freshwater, dispersing themselues without keeping any order. Therupon the barbarous people gaue charge vpon them, and flue numbers of them: insomuch as Sertorius was driuento imbarke againe, and to take his course towards Spaine, where he was kept from landing. Then was he drive to take certaine pirates boats of the Sicilians, & to faile towards the Ile of PITYVSA, where he landed in despite of Annins garrison, and put them to distresse. But shortly after came Annius thither himself with a good number of ships, and five thousand fighting men in them. Him Sertorius determined to abide, and to fight withall by fea, though he had

but small barkes, purposely made for swift sailing, and of nostrength for fight. But now the West wind rising very big, did swel the sea in such fort, that it cast the most part of Sertorins ships (being weake and very light) vpon rockes in the sea, and himselfe with a few being kept from land by his enemies, and from the fea by storme, was driven to ride ten dayes together at anker. working still for life against the danger of the furging waves and boisterous winds, which continueth roughall that time; yet in the end when it calmed again he weighed anker, and ran into certaine desolate Iles, where was no water to be had. Then hoysing faile from thence, he passed the ftraight of Gilbratar, and turning on his right hand, landed vpon the coast of SPAINE, lying toward the great Westerne sea, a litle aboue the mouth of the river of Bæris, the which falling into the sea Atlanticum, gaue name in old time to that part of Spains, which was called His-PANIA BÆTICA. There certaine failers met with him that were newly arrived from the Iles of the Ocean Atlanticum, which the ancients called the fortunate Ilands. These two Ilands are The fortunate not farre one from another, being but a litle arme of the sea betweene them, and are from the motelland. coast of Africke only tenthousand furlongs. They have rainethere very seldome, howbeita gentle wind commonly that bloweth in a litle filuer dew, which moistnesh the earth so finely, that it maketh it fertile and lustie, not only to bring forth all that is set or sowen vponit, but of it felfe without mans hand it beareth fo good fruit, as sufficiently maintaineth y inhabitants dwelling upon it, living idly, and taking no paines. The weather is faire and pleafant continually, and neuer hurteth the body, the climate and seasons of the yeare are so temperate, and the aire neuer extreame: because the winds that blow vponthat land from the other side of the coast opposite to it, as the North and Easterly wind comming from the maine, what with their long comming, and then by differfing themselues into a wonderfull large aireand great sea, their strength is in manner spent and gone before their comming thither. And for the winds that blow from the sea (as the South and Westerly) they sometime bring litle showers with them, which commonly do but moift the ground a little and make the earth bring forthall things very trimly: insomuch as the very barbarous people themselues do faithfully beleeue, that there are the Elysian fields, the The Elysian aboade of bleffed creatures, which Homer hath fo much spoken of. Sertorius hearing report of felds. these Ilands (vpon a certaine desire now to live quietly out of tyrannie and warres) had straight a maruellous minde to go dwell there. But when the pirates of Sicilia (who were no men of peace, but given alrogether to spoile and pillage) heard that, they by and by for sook Sertorius, & went into Africk E, to restore Ascalius the son of Iphtha to his realine of MAVRITANIA againe. Sertorius quailed not for all their departure from him, but determined to aide them that made warre against Ascalius, and all to the end that his fouldiers seeing matter of new hope and meanes to be imployed, should not so leave him, as being forced to be discharged of very necessitie. The MAVRV STANS being verie glad of his arrivall, he presently went on with his enterprise, o, uercame Ascalius in battell, and besieged the citie wherinto vpon the ouerthrow of his armie he was fled for refuge. Syllabeing aducrtifed thereof, fent Paccanius thither with an army to aide Afcalius Sertorius gaue him battel, flue him in the field, and wan the rest of his army, which yeelded Sometime vnto him : then took he the citie of Tingis, whereinto Afcalius was fled with his brethren. The Lybians write that Antens is buried there. But Sertorius giving no credit to the tales of the barbarous people of that countrey, by reason of the greatnesse of the tombethey shewed, made tombe and it to be broken open round; and finding there the body of a man(as they fay) of threescore cubits great nego. long, he maruelled at it, and so finishing his facrifice to honour the memory thereof, caused the tombe to be well closed vp againe. By this act he did greatly increase the honour of Anlaus memory, which the city did vnto him, and therby confirmed the countrimens report of Aniaus. For the Tingians do report, that after Antans death, his wife Tings lay with Hercules, and had a goodly fon by him called Sophax, who was king of that country, and there built this citie, giuing it his mothers name. Furthermore, it is faid also that this Sophax had a sonne called Diodorus, who conquered the most part of Africk E with an army of the Grecians, Olbianians & MYCENIANS, which Hercules brought thither to inhabite those parts. We were willing to imbrace theoccasion offred vs to speake of this matter as we went, for y honor of luba, the noblest historiographer that ever came of royall bloud; for it is thought his ancestors were lineally def- kings specific cended from Sophax and this Diodorus, Sertorius as conqueror now, having the whole country in fubicction, did in no wife hurt them that yeelded vnto him, & put trust in him, but restored them their goods, cities, and governement againe, contenting himselfe with that they offered him of their good wils. But then standing doubtfull what way to determine, the LVSITANIANS fent Ambailadors vnto him, to intreat him to be their Chiefetaine: for they stood in great need of a worthie personage, and a man expert in warres to defend them against the furie of the Ro-MAINES: and therefore they only trusted him, hearing of his honorable behaviour, by them that were conversant with him. Whose qualities as we find writte, were these. He was never greatly moued, with feare nor ioy: but as he was a resolute man without feare in most danger, so was he most temperate in greatest prosperitie. In valiantnesse inferiour to no Captaine of his time, and very quicke of execution in every imminent danger. For where any present exploit was to be done, any strong place of advantage to lodge or fight into be taken, or that he was to passe over any riuer, or scape any instant danger, where it stood vpon speedy execution, and to shew some stratageme or policy in time and place to supplant the enemie : in those matters he passingly excelled. Furthermore, he was both bountifull in rewarding good service, and mercifull in punishing of offenders: but this notwithstanding, the foule murther he did in his latter dayes vpon certaine young children that were pledges with him (which doubtlesse was an act of great cruelty, and anger that could not forgive) doth manifestly proue, that he was neither mercifull nor courteous of nature: but that he many times did finely counterfeit it, when both the time and occasion did so require it. But for mine opinion, sure I am perswaded that no missortune can haue power to make perfect vertue, grounded vpon good reason, to worke in any sort contrarie to it selfe: neither do I thinke it impossible also, but that mens good wils and gentle natures being iniured without cause, may peraduenture change their naturall dispositions. Which then proued true in Sertorius, who finding fortune contrarie vnto him, and his good hap changed into ill, grew fo crabbed and fierce of nature, that he would take cruel reuenge of them which had villianously betrayed him. But now to our matter where we left. Scrtorius departed out of A-FRICKE VPOn the LUSITANIANS offer, who chose him for their Generall, giving him absolute power and authoritie and fo foone as he arrived, he straight leavied men of war, and with them fubdued the people of SPAINE fronting vpon their marches, of which the more part did willingly submit theselues, vpon the brute that ran of him to be merciful and courteous, & avaliant man besides in present danger. Furthermore, he lacked no fine deuices and subtilities to win their good wils: as among others, the policy and deuice he had of the Hinde; which was this. There was a poore man of the countrey called spanus, who meeting by chance one day with a Hindin his way that had newly calued, flying from the hunters, he let the Dammego, not being able to take her: and running after her calfe tooke it, which was a young Hind, and of a strange haire. for she was all milke-white. It chanced so, that Sertorius was at that time in those parts, who was alwayes very glad when any man offered him fuch manner of prefents: as fruits, fowle, or venison, and would make very much of them that brought them to him, and also reward them well for the same. So, this poore man presented Sertorius with his young Hind, which he gladly received, and which with time he made fo tame, that she would come to him when he called her, and follow him where ever he went, being nothing the wilder for the daily fight of fuch a number of armed fouldiers together as they were, nor yet affraid of the noise and tumult of the camp. Infomuch as Sertorius by litle and litle made it a miracle, making the fimple barbarous people beleeue that it was a gift that Diana had fent him, by the which she made him vnderstand of many and fundry things to come: knowing well inough of himselfe, that the barbarous people were meneafily deceiued, and quickly caught by any subtill superstition, besides that by art also he brought them to beleeue it as a thing very true. For when he had any secret intelligence giuen him, that the enemies would inuade some part of the countries and provinces Subject vnto him, or that they had taken any of his forts from him by any intelligence or sudden attempt, he straight told them that his Hind spake to him as he slept, and had warned him both to arme his men, and put himselfe in strength. In like manner if he had heard any newes that one of his Lieutenans had wonne a battell, or that he had any aduantage of his enemies, he would hide the meffenger, and bring his Hind abroad with agarland and coller of no legayes: and then say, it was a token of some good newes comming towards him, perswading them withall to be of good cheare; and so did sacrifice to the gods, to give them thanks for the good tidings he should heare before it were long. Thus by putting this superstition into their heads, he made them the more tractable and obedient to his will, in so much as they thought they were not now gouerned any more by a stranger wifer than themselues, but were stedfastly perswaded perfiyaded that they were rather led by some certaine god; and so much the more, because that his deeds confirmed their opinions, seeing his power so daily to increase beyond the hope and expectation of man. For with two thousand and fine hundred souldiers, which he called Ro- sertorius MAINES (although the most of the indeed were Africans, which came ouer with him out of arme. AFRICKE into SPAIN) and foure thousand Lycitanians, with seuen hundred horsemenalso, he made war against foure great Captaines of Rome, which had the leading of fixe score thou- The armie fand footmen, two thousand archers and sling-men, with a world of cities and countries besides. of the Ro-Where Sertorius at the first had not aboue twentie at the most, and yet with this small power to by some maintaine this warre withall, he did not onely conquer great countries and many goodly cities, Captaines. but tooke some of the Captaines prisoners also, whom the Romaines sent against him. Healfo ouercame Fidius in battel, being gouernor of Spaine Bætica, by the riner of Bæris, where he flue two thousand Romans, by histreasurer likewise he ouercame Lucius Domitius Proconsull of the other province of Spaine. And another time he discomfited Toranss another Captaine, one of Metellus Lieutenants, whom he flue in fight with all his armie. And Metellus felfe, being taken at that time for one of the most expertmen of warre, and chiefest Captaines among the ROMAINES: him he put also so oft to distresse, that Lucius Lollius was faine to come out of GAVLE NARBONENSIS (now Languedocke) to his aid. And they were furthermore driven to fend Pompey the great with all speed fro Rome with a new army, because Metellus knew nor what course to take, having to fight with a most valiant man, and one whom he could never either bring to any fet battell, nor yet intrap in the plaine field (fo eafily could he cast himselfe into all kind of formes) by reason of the dexteritie and swiftnesse of his Spanish Thinglace foldiers being lightly armed. Where he cleane contrary, was wont to fight a pitched field, without removing a foot, and to leade an armie heavy armed, which could keepe their rankes, and taken two fighting fleadily could ouerthrow their enemies with hand-ftrokes, and march vpon their beleither of lies. But to climbe vp the mountaines, and to be continually (as it were) charged in the rere-buhallow. ward with these menarmed as light as the wind, and to pursue them in chase that sled still and according neuer kept place, it was impossible for them to do it; and much lesse to abide hunger and thirst, to liue without a kitchin and fire, and likewise to lie on the bare ground without tents or paullions, is might be as Sertorius fouldiers did. Furthermore, Metellus being growne an old man (hauing spent all his Romaine youth in feruice of the warres, and taken and fuffered great paines and troubles, giving himfelfe entents now to quiet and pleasure) was matched with Sertorius, being then eyen at his best age, and lufliest of body; besides that nature had made him both strong, active, & temperate withall. For he the raliant was neuer giue to his belly, nor to be a great bibber, when he was at most quiet, and out of wars, he was likewise acquainted with paines and hardnes from his youth, could away with long iournies, watch many daies and nights without fleepe, cate litle, and content himfelfe with any meat warlike that came to hand. And had he neuer fo litle leifure, he would continually be on horsebacke, riding a hunting vp and downethe fields, which made him very ready and expert to know how to wind himself out of danger whe he was distressed, and contrarily also to compasse in his enemy vponany aduantage: and befides, to fee where he might enter, and where not. For this cause was Metellus driven (who was still desirous to fight) to abide the losses and discommodities which they suffer that be vanquished: and Sertorius on the other side refusing battell, and slying before him, had all the vantage of him that they have which chase their enemies whom they have overcome. For he cut off his victuals on every fide, tooke away his water, and kept him in from foraging. When he thought to march further forward, Sertorius stated him: and when he lay still in his camp, Sertorius came and gaue him alarums, and draue him to dislodge. If Metellus laid siege to any place, Sertorius straight besieged him for want of victuals: so that his souldiers were even weary of altogether. Whereupon, when Sertorius challenged the combat of Metellus: Oh, well faid, criedall the fouldiers, let Captaine fight against Captaine, and R o M A I N B against Ro- Metellus MAINE. Howbeit Metellus refused him, and the souldiers laughed him to scorne. Neuerthelesse practigeth he did but smile at them, and therein shewed himselfe a wise man: for as Theophrastus saith, A the Lange. Captaine must die as a Captaine, not like a private souldier. Furthermore, Metellus considering briter, and that the Langourites (who gaue aide vnto Sertorius in all services) were easie to be taken for lacke of water, (hauing but one onely well in all their citie) and that who foeuer did befrege that for lacke of fame, should straight be master of all the spring heads of the suburbes about it hoping therby to water, Eee make the citie yeeld vnto him within two daies at the vtmost, he commanded his soldiers to victuall themselues for fine dayes onely. But Sertorius having intelligence thereof, gaue good direction & speedy order to preuent him. For he caused two thousand goates skins to be filled with water, and promifed round fumes of mony for every skin brought thither. Many Spaniards and MAVRVSIANS ftraight tooke vpon them the enterprife. Thereupon Sertorius chusing the luftiest men among them, sent them away through the mountaine, commanding them withal, that when they deliuered their goates skinnes with water vnto the citizens, they should cause them forthwith to put out all their idle people, that the water might last the the longer which defended the city. Metellus receiving advertisement herof, was much agrieved withal, because his foldiers victuals were welneare spent, which they had brought according to his commandement:& therfore he sent Aquinus one of his Lieutenants, with fix thousand men to get victuals. Sertorius having intelligence of his purpose, presently layed an ambush for his returne in a valley full of wood, and bestowed there three thousand men to set vpo the rereward, whilest he himself gaue charge on the voward. Thus made he Aquinus flic, flue the most part of his men, and took the rest prisoners. Howbeit Aquinus selfe the Captaine, having lost his weapons and horse, by slying recouered Metellus campe: who thereupon was driven with shame to raise his siege, being mocked of all the Spaniards. For these valiant deeds was Sertorius wonderfully beloued and ho. noured of all the barbarous people, and specially because he had made them good souldiers. brought them from their former rude and beaftly fight, and had taught them to be armed after the Romain E fashion, to keepe their rankes when they fought, to follow their enfigne, and to take the fignall and word of the battell; infomuch as he made them then appeare a goodly armie weltaught and trained being before a confused multitude of theeues and robbers. Furthermore he deuided great store of gold and silver among them, shewing them how they should gild their head-peeces, fet out their shields and targets with fine workmanship, and also brauely apparell themselues with rich clokes, and sleeuelesse cassocks upon their armor, teaching them to be fine, and furnished them with mony, whereby he maruellously wanthe hearts of the barbarous people. Yet did he farther bind them vnto him, by that he did vnto their children: for he fent generally for all the noblemens yong fons, through althe countries and provinces subject vnto him, and brought them to the goodly citie of Osca, where he prouided them of schoolemastersto teach them the Greeke and Latine tongue: bearing their parents in hand, that it was to no other end, but to make them (when they came to be men) meete to be employed in the feruice of the commonweale, albeit indeed it was but a fine deuice of him, to have them as hostages for their faith and loyalty towards him. Then were the fathers of these childreglad men to see their sons apparelled like Romains, infaire long gownes garded with purple, to go civilly to the schools, that Sertorius payed for their learning, and that oftentimes he went thitherto apposethem, to see how they profited : and how he gaue rewards vnto them that were the best scholers, hanging iewels about their neckes, which the Romaines call Bulla. Infomuch as they having a custome at that time in Spaine, that such as were about the Prince or their Chieftaine should die with him when he died: that custome of voluntarie vow to die with their Lord, being called by the barbarous people, denotion; there were very few of their followers and familiars that would vow to die with other Captaines, but on the other fide, thousands commonly followed Sertorius, having vowed to lose their lives with him. And for proofe hereof it is reported, that when his army on a time was ouerthrowne by a certaine citie of Spaine, the enemies eagerly pursuing him, the Spaniards not regarding their owne lives to saue his, tooke him vpontheir shoulders, and so passed him from man to man vpon them, till they put him into the citie, who being fafe & out of danger, they then looked by running to faue themselues the best they could. Thus was Sertorius not onely beloued of the Spaniar Ds, but of other fouldiers also that came out of ITALIE. For when Perpenna Vento, being of the same faction, arrived in Spaine full of money, and with a good number of fouldiers, intending to make warre in his behalfe against Metellus, his fouldiers fell out with him, and had none other talke in his campe but of Sertorius: the which spixed Perpenna to the heart, being proud and stately by meanes of his wealth and cflate, comming of a noble house. Newes being come that Pompey was past ouer the mountaines Pyrenei, the foldiers armed themselues, & plucked up their ensignes that were fast in the ground, and cryed outvoon Perpennato leade them to Sertorius, threatning him that if he would not they would leauthim alone, and feeke them a Captainethat could both faut himselfe and them. So was Perpenna forced against his will to follow their minds, and to leade the three and fiftie en fignes he had with him, to joyne with Sertorius force. Thus became Sertorius armie very great, and specially after all the cities on this side the river of Ebrus had yeelded vnto him. For then Ebrus A came fouldiers to him out of all parts, how beit they were a rash confused multitude of Omnigatherum together, having no reason nor patience to abide time, but cried out in furie, to set vpon their enemies. This troubled Sectorius much, seeking first to quiet them by reason and perswasion. But when he saw they fell to mutiny, and would needs have their wils, and both without reafon and all good order would so go set vpon their enemies: he gaue them the head, and let them go as they would, knowing well enough they would pay for their folly; but yet took fuch order and direction, as they should not veterly be cast away, hoping after that to have them the more obedient vnto him. And indeed they had their payment as he coniectured: notwithstanding he went to rescue them, and so brought them safe into his campe. Now to take away the feare and perplexity from them, which this ouerthrow perhaps had striken into them, immediatly after he caused his whole armie to assemble, as purposing to vse some speech vnto them. At which time he caused two horses to be brought and set in the middest among them, the one an old and secble A fine deiade, and the other a goodly lufty horse, which besides other things, had a maruellous faire thick toriusto taile. Behind the old leane iade, he fet a lufty tall fellow: and behind the goodly horsealso, he placed a litle wearish man, and seeming to fight to have but small strength. Now vpon a signe gi- the benefits uen them which he had made them privieto, the strong man tooke the leane horse by the taile persent with all his might, as if he would have pluckt it off by the stumpe; and the other wearish man fell rance. to plucking off haire by haire from the great horse taile. So when the strong man had tugged and fwet a great while in vaine at the leane horse taile, thinking to have plucked it off, and in the end did nothing else but make the lookers on laugh: and that the wearish wretch on the other side in a short space (and at ease) had left the great horse taile with neuer a haire on it: Sertorius then rifing vp, spake in this fort to his foldiers: Do ye not see(my friends & companions) saith he, how time and perseuerance exceedeth force ? and that things vnlikely at the first to be ouercome by force, are yet in time by litle and litle obtained? For continuance ouercometh all things, and word solds there is no force nor power, but processe of time consumeth & bringeth to nought, being a most certaine helpe to them that can take oportunitie, and abide time: as in contrariwise hast and rashnes is as dangerous an enemy as may be to the that do things of a head without regard. By these of his commo devices wher with Sertorius dayly acquainted the barbarous people, he taught them to abide the oportunity of time. But of all the stratagems he vsed in warre, that onely exceeded all other, which he shewed vnto a people called y CHARACITANIANS. The people do dwel on the other fide of the river of Tagus, and have neither cities nor villages for their comon abode, but only agreat high hil, full of hollow caues and deep holes among the rocks, looking towards the the chara-North. At the foot of this mountaine the valley is a great flimie ground, and so rotten, that it is not able to beare a man, but being troden on, crumeth like white lime, and turneth to dust vider they be. his fect. And therfore by meanes of the fame, when those people were afraid of any enemics, or Tigor fi that they had conuayed the goods they had robbed and stolne from their neighbours into those caues, they thought themselves safe, if they were once gotten into themsfor it was impossible to compel them to come out. Now it chanced that Sertorius flying from Metellus, came and encamped hard by this hill which thefe barbarous people inhabited, who made no reckoning of him, imagining Metellus had ouerthrown him. But Sert orius, being in a rage with them, & because he would shew that he fled not took his horse-back the next morning, and rode as neare to the hill as he could to view the nature and fituation of the place: and when he faw there was no way to bring a man into it, he fretted, & walked vp & down, vainly threatning them to no purpose. Yet going and coming to & fro, he perceived the wind raised a great dust, of that britle earth we have ipoken of, and caried it ful into the CHARACITANIANS holes, the mouthes wherof as we faid before, lay full vpon the North. This Northren wind which some call Cacias, is the only wind of all other that most keepeth in that quarter, and riseth from the moores and mountaines therabouts, which be continually couered with fnow, and then in the heat of fommer is nourished desire and inforced by the melting of theyee and fnow, and so bloweth a jolly coole wind, which barbarous refreshed the barbarous people and beastes all the day long Sertorius marking this with himselfe, people, caland vnderstanding by the inhabitants thereabouts, that this wind blew commonly among led the chathem: commanded his souldiers to gather a great quantitie of this light brittle earth together

The next morning by breake of day there was a prety litle wind flirring, that only against Pompey, by the citie of Sveron and in another he wanne against Pompey and Metellus blew off the top of his forced mount, and the highest part of that masse of earth, as chasse when both by the city of TVTTIA. And as for the ouerthrow of SVCRON, it is thought it came through they winnow corne; and as the Sun began to haue any power, the North wind also rose which Pompeys ambition, making the more haste for feare Metellus should be partaker of the honour of forthwith filled all the hill with dust. And with all came Sectorius fouldiers, who threw downe his victoric; and that was the thing Sertorius looked for, to fight before Metellus came to ioyne the hill to the bottome, which they had gathered the day before, and brake all those drie clods of with him; and therefore he fought the battell with Pompey towards night, Supposing the darknes twist See. clay in peeces. The horsemen on the other side, they still managed their horses vp and downe in of the night would trouble his enemies much, be a helpe to faue themselues if they were ouer- torius and it, to raife vp the greater dust, which the wind caried as soone as it rose; and blew into the caues come, and also to chase the enemies if it so happened they had the upper hand, because they were of these barbarous people, full in their faces, through their holes and rifts of the rockes. When both battels came to give charge, Sertorius at the first having no other vents nor ayreany way, but there where the wind blew vpon them: it did fo was not directly against Pompey, but against Afranius who led the left wing of Pompeys battell, blindfold their eyes, and filled their caues with fuch a hot fluffing ayre, that they were almost and himselse was in the right wing of his owne battell. Howbeit Sectorius being aductised that choaked withall, notable to take breath. For when they should draw their breathes, this stuffing the left wing of his ownearmie against which Pompey fought, was in such distresse as they gaue ayre and dust came in at their mouthes so fast, that they had much ado to hold out two dayes; back, and could abide no longer, if they were not presently aided, straight left the leading of the and on the third yeelded themselues vnto Sertorius mercy; the which thing did not so much inright wing, which he affigned ouer to other of his Captaines, and ranne with all speed possible crease his power, as it wanne him honour, by policy to have wonne such an vnlikely conquest. vnto the left wing, which were then even as good as flying. Sertorius also comming thither vpon the and ciries subject vnto Sertorius, were halfe in mind to yeeld vnto Pompey: but afterwards they instant, finding Pompeys men in disorder, flue a number of them, and the next morning betimes altered againe, vponthe chance that happened vnto the citie of LAVRON, beyond all expectaarmed his men againe, and brought them out into the field to fight once more with Pompey. But tion. For Sectorius being gone to lay fiege toit, Pompey in hafte went thither with his armie receining intelligence that Metellus was at hand, he founded the retraite, and dislodged from Serterius to raise the siege. Neare vnto the citie there was a litle hill very commodious to lodge a campe the place he incamped faying Had not that old woman come, I would have whipped that yong misters in, and also to distresse them of the citie: whereupon the one made haste to get it, and the other to boy to Rome with rods. and certainly hoped that their affaires shold prosper daily better & better. Another time having straighted his enemies with scarsitie of victuals, in the territorie of the SAGVNTINES, he was by force compelled to fight against his will, for that they sent great troupes of men to forrage the countrey, to get victuals. Vpon the encounter it was valiantly fought of either fide, where Memmius was flaine, (the valiantest Captaine Pompey had) couragiously fighting in the middest of limienant. the battell. Sertorius finding himselfe the stronger, followed his first wing, making great slaughter of those that withstood him, vntill he came vnto Metellus selfe, who taried his coming, defending himselfe more valiantly then was either hoped or looked for in a man of his yeares: in fo much as he was at the last hurt with a partizan. Which was such a dishonor to the ROMAINSA not vnto them onely that faw it, but vnto fuch also as heard of it, that being all ashamed to forfake their Captaine, and turning their shame into anger against their enemies, they couered Metellus round about with their shields and targets, and getting him out of the presse and furie of the fight, gaue such a fierce onset, as they draue the Spaniar Ds to flie. Thus fortune changing the victorie, Sertorius to giue his scattered mentime to saue themselues, and leasure also for a new fupply (which he caused to be presently leaused) to come at their pleasure, fled of purpose into a citie of the mountaines of strong situation, and there setting a good face of the matter, repaired the rampiers and fortified the gates, thinking nothing leffe then to abide there to be befleged, but onely to lay a bait for his enemies, coming to be flege the citie, hoping they should easily win it, and in the meane time left pursuing of the barbarous people, which had thereby good leisure given them to sauethemselves. Furthermore, they tooke no order to suppresse the new supply that was comming to Sertorius, who had sent out his Captaines to the next cities and shires adioyning to leauiemen, with expresse commandement, that when they had mustered a convenient number together, they should fend them vnto him, as they did. So when he vnderstood of their comming, he casily passed through his enemies to meete them, and with them sodainly came backe againe, and harried his enemies worse then before, sometime cutting their victuals from them by land, through his ambushes and continual subtill policies, being quickly in every place whither they thought to go, with his light armie, and on the sea also with certain pirats pinnaces, with the which he scoured all the coaft vpon the sea side. By this meanes both the Captaines his enemies were compelled to seuer themselves farre one from the other, in To much as Metellus went to winter in GAVLE, Pompey remained in SPAINE (in great scarsity of all things for lacke of money) to winter in the territories of the VACCETANS, and wrote to the Senate of Rome that he would return with his army into ITALY, if they fent him not money out of hand, for that he had spent all his owne, daily fighting for the defence of ITALIE. Thus it was certainly thought at Rome that Sertorius would be in ITALY before Pompey, because he had through his valiancie and great skill brought two of the most famous Captaines of their time to great extremitie and diffresse. Then did Metellus shew how much he feared Sertorius, and how he thought him a greatand dreadful enemy. For he proclaimed by found of trumper, that if any ROMAINE could kill him, he would give him a hundred filuer talents, and twentiethousand Iugera of land: and if he were a banished man, he promised he should be restored to his countrey and goods againe, buying his death by treason, whom he could not ouercome by force. And furthermore being his chance once to winne a battell of Sertorius, he was so iocond and proud for this victorie, that he would needs therefore be called Imperator, to fay, Prince, or foueraigne Captaine and was contented the people should fet vp altars and do sacrifices vnto him in eueric citie where he came. And it is furthermore reported of him, that he wore garlands of flowers on his head, and would be bidden to diffolute banquets, fitting at the table in a triumphing robe: and they made images of victorie go vp and downe the hall, moued by certaine secret engines carying triumphs of gold, and crownes and garlands of triumph, and dauncers of goodly young boyes and faire girles following of them, with fongs of triumph in his praise. Wherin doubtlesse he descrued to be laughed at, shewing himselfe so much carried away withio and vaine glorie, for one overthrow given vnto him, whom himselfe was wont to call Syllaes fugitiue, and the remnant of the banished men of Carbo. On the other side, Sertorius noble courage was eafily difference; first, for that he called the banished men which were escaped from Rome, and come to him, Senators and having them about him, called them the Senate, making some of them Treasurers, others Prætors, directing and ordering all things according to the manner of his country. And in this also, that making warres with the fouldiers of the cities of Spaine, and defraying the same at their owne charges, yet he neuer gaue them any authority, so much as in word, butruled them alwayes with ROMAINE officers and captaines: faying ftill, that he fought for the libertie of the people of Rome, and not to increase the glorie and power of the Sectorius, Spaniar Ds, to the hurt & dishonor of the Romains. Forto say truly of him, he cuer loued his reput ye country wel, and longed much to be fent for home againe and yet in his greatest troubles, when things thwarted him most, then was his mind greatest, yeelding no maner of shew or appearance to his enemies, of any faint heart or discouragement in him. Againe, when he was in best pro- mind greatsperitie, and had most advantage of his enemies, he sent vnto Metellus and Pempey both, letting testinad urstite. them understand that for his part he was content to lay armes aside, and to live at home like a private man, fo that he might be lawfully restored and called home by edict: and that he had Sertorius rather be counted the meanest citizen in Rome, then being a banished man out of his countrey, affection to to be called Emperour of the world. And it is faid, that one of the chiefest causes which made him defire fo much to be called home againe, was the tender loue he bare vnto his mother (that had broughthim vp from the time of his fathers death) vpon whom he cast all his love and delight: infomuch as after that his friends in Spaine had fent for him to come to be their captaine. and that he had been a while among them, receiving newes that his mother was departed out of natural the world, it fo ftrake him to the heart, that he had almost died for forrow. For he lay seuen daies lone to his together continually on the ground weeping, and neuer gaue his fouldiers the watchword, nor mother, would be feen of any of his friends; vntill that the other noblemen and captaines of his owne effare, came to him to his tent, and were fo importunate of him by intreatie and perswassion, that they got him out of his tent to flew himselfe to his souldiers, to speake to them, and to take order for his affaires, which prospered very well. By these signes many haue judged, that he was of a courteous and pitifull nature, and that naturally he was given to be quiet and peaceable: howbeit, that he was forced of necessitie to take charge of men of warre, because he could not other wife line quietly nor fafely, being purfued by his enemies, which would never let him rest, and thereupon entred into warre, for his owne guard and safety. The treatie selfe he made with king Mithridates, argued his noble mind. For when Mithridates whom Sylla had our come was recoursed againe (like a wrestler that being ouerthrowne, getteth vp on his feet to trie another fal with his enemy) & took vpon him to inuade As IA. Sertorius fame was then fo great, that he was spoken of through the world, by merchants coming from the West, who blew abroad the report thereof all the East parts over, even into the Realme of Pont, like to merchandizes which they went to feeke for in strange countries. Whereupon Mithridates being perswaded by the vaine vaints of his fauoured Courtiers, who compared Sertorius to Hanniball, and himfelfe vnto king Pyrrus, faying, that the Romain's being fet vpon by them both, could not withfrand two fuch exceller natures, & great powers together, whe the noblest captain of the world shold be joyned with the greatest and most puissant Prince that euer was: sent therupon his Ambassadours into Spain E vnto Sectorius, with full power and commission to promise him money and tessens ships towards the maintenance and charge of this warre, in recompence whereof he defired that Sertorius would redeliuer him the possession of As I A againe, the which he had surrendred vp vn- Sertorius in to the ROMAINES vpon the peace made betwixt him and Sylla. Sertorins hereupon called his spaine. Councell together (which he termed the Senate) to confult vpon this matter. And when they were all of opinion that he should accept Mithridates offers, and were exceedingly glad of the fame confidering that they asked them nothing but a title in the ayre, and a name of things which were not in their power, offering them therefore things prefent, whereof they had greater need: yet would Sertorius neuer agree therunto. Notwithstanding, thus much he granted Mithridates that he should enjoy CAPPADOCIA and BITHYNIA, which had ever been countries subject vnto Sertorius kings, and wherunto the ROMAINES had neuer any right: excepting this specially that he would prothie and neuer fuffer him to your pany country, vnto the which the ROMAINES had any just title; and fiver to Mi the which he had lost in wars by force of armes vnto Fimbria, and had afterwards also willingly thridates. furrendred by agreement made betwixt him & Sylla. For he faid he wold enlarge the Empire of Rom Ethrough his victories, but not impaire or hurt it by his coquests. For avaliat man (said he) Sertorius should couet to conquer with honour, but in no wife defire life with dishonor. His answer being fajing. reported vnto king Mitbridates, did much amaze him and some haue written, that he then said vnto his familiars: What would Sertorius commaund vs then, ifhe fate among them in the Senate at Rome, who being an exile now, & remaining in the farthest part of the world by the sea

Atlanticum doth take voon him to bound the certaine confines of our kingdome, threatning vs also with wars, if we attempt any thing against As IA? All this notwithstading, they were agreed vpon othes taken between them; that Mithridates should enjoy the countries of CAPPADOCTA and BITHYNIA, and that Sertorius should fend him one of his Captaines with aide of men of warre; and that vpon performance thereof, the king should give him the summe of three thoufandtalents, and forty ships of warr. So Sertorius sent thither one of his Captaines called Marcus Marius, a Senator of Rome, who fled to him for fuccour with whom Mithridates distressed certainecities of As 1A. And when Marius entred into them, with his sergeants carying the bundels ofrods and axes before him, as before a Proconsuli of the Romains, Mithridates gaue him the vpper hand, as his better, & followed after him. Furthermore, Marius did fet certaine cities at liberty, and wrote vnto others, declaring vnto them, that Sertorius of his grace and goodnesse did release them of their taxe and customes they paid fo that poore Asia which had ben oppressed Marius by the couctous field taxe and current and Farmers of the Romaines, and also by the pride & infolencie of the fouldiers which lay in garrifon among them, beganne to have fome hope of change, and to defire the alteration of gouernement, which Sertorius offered. But on the other fide, the Senators of Rome that were in Spaine as banished men in Sertorius armie, and of the like dignitic and estate that himselfe was of, they hearing say that all was well againe at Rome. and perswading themselues that they shold be strong enough for their enemies, having no cause The enay of to feare any more danger, began then to enuie Sertorius greatnesse and authority; but Perpenna fpecially among other, who by reason of his nobility, being puft vp with a vaine presumption and ambitious selfe will, practised to make himselfe chiefe of all the army, and to that end threw forth amongst his friends and familiars such kind of seditious wordes. What curfed fortune The fediti-tan words of (quota he) my friends doth daily haunt vs worse then other, making vs that were vn willing to obey sylla (commanding at this day both land and sea at his will) to choose rather to for sake our lands and countrey. And now being come hither in hope to line at liberty, we willingly make our felues flaues, becomming Sertorius guard for defence of his person in exile: who to requite vs withall, payeth vs with faire words, calling vs the Senate, whereat enery man laugh-" eth to heare vs fo called; and in fine we must abide this dishonour to be at his commandement, 23 and drudge and take as much paines, as the Spaniards and Lvsitanians doe them-³⁹ felues. Hereupon the more part of them being caried away with these mutinous words, durst " notyet shew themselues in actuall rebellion against Sertorius, being affraid of his authoritie: 39 howbeit fecretly vnderhand they ouerthrew his doings, by shewing extreame cruelty vnto the barbarous people, by pretext of inftice, impofing great payments vpon them giving out it was Sertorius commandement. By which their leud practifes, many cities revolted against him, and put themsclues into his enemies hands; and they dayly also raised new mutinies and rebellions vpon him. Furthermore, those whom he sent to pacifie the tumults did handle themselucs in fuch fort, that where they should have quieted the grudges and rebellions of the people, they set them farther out, and procured new tumults. Hereupon was Sertorius gentle nature and former goodnesse so altered, that he committed a most cruell act vpon all the noble mens children of that land, which he brought vp at schoole in the citie of Osca: for some of them he put to death, and others he fold as flaues. Thus Perpenna having many affociates in his wicked confpiracy against Sertorius, brought into his confederaciealso one called Manlius, who had chiefest charge in all the armie. This Manlius loued a yong boy exceedingly, and because he wold let him know he loued him well, he rold him on a time the whole plot of this conspiracie, willing him not to reckon any more of others loue but of his, and to loue him onely; for he should fee him a great man before it were long. The young boy louing another better then him, called Aufidius, went and reuealed vnto him all that Manlius had told him. Aufidius maruelling to heare the boy made priny to it, seeing himselfe also was of the confederacie, and knew not yet that Manlius was one of them. And when the boy also named Perpenna, Gracinus, and some other whom Aufidius knew well to be of counsell, he was worse affraid then before, but yet seemed to make litle of it, and told the boy: for that matter it was nothing, and counfelled him not to credit Manlius words, who was but a vaine man, and boasted of that which was not true, and did it onely but to deceive him. This notwithstanding, departing thence, he went forthwith vnto Perpenna, and told him how their practife was discouered, declaring further what danger they were in, if it were not speedily put in execution. All the confederates agreed it was true that he said, and thereupon they deutled this treafon. They had fuborned a meffenger to bring counter- The treafon feit letters to Sertorius, faining in the same that one of his Lieutenants had wonne a great battell, deuifed in the which he had flaine a maruellous number of his enemies. Sertorius being very glad of the good newes, made facrifice vnto the gods to give them thankes. Whereupon, Perpenna taking the present oportunitie, inuited Sertorius to supper-to-him, and all other his friends that were prefent (enery one of the conspiracie with him,) and was so importunate with Sectorius, that in the and he promifed him to come. Now Sertorius did ever vie great modestie at the board, and wold fuffer no diffolute talke nor light parts at his meate, and had acquainted them also that vsed Section his table, to talke of graue and wife matters, & yet one to be honeftly merry with another, with. out any playing or vincomely talke. In the middest of suppersthey that sought occasion of quarrel begantospeake leud words, counterfetting to be drunke, and to play many vile parts, of purpose to anger Sertorius. Whereupon Sertorius, whether it was that he could not abide to see those villanous parts, or that he mistrusted their ill will towards him, by fumbling of their words in their mouthes, and by their vnwonted irreverent maner shewed vnto him; fell backwards you the bed where he fate at meate, feeming no more to marke what they did or faid, Perpenna at that instant tooke a cup full of wine, and making as though he dranke, let it fall of purpose. The cup falling downe made a noise, and that was the figne given among them. Therwithal Antonius that the fate about Sertorius at the table, stabbed him in with his dagger. Sertorius feeling the thrust, strong ther of to rife; but the traiterous murtherer got vpon Serterius breaft, and held both his hands. And thus Serterius was Sertorius cruelly murthered, not able to defend himfelf, all the confpirators falling vp6 him. Sertorius death being blowne abroades the most part of the SPANIAR DS fent Ambassadours immediatly vnto Pompey and Metellus, yeelding themselves vnto them and Perpenna with those that remained with him, attempted to do fomething with Sertorius armic and preparation; but all fell out to his vtter destruction and ruine, making the world know that he was a wicked man, who could neither command, nor knew how to obey. For he went to affaile Pompey, who had ouerthrowne him straight, and was in the end taken prisoner. And yet in that instant of his calamitic, he did not vie himselfe like a valiant minded man, and one worthy to rule; for, thinking to Pampy faue his life, having Sertorius letters and writings, he offered Pompey to deliver him all Sertorius letters fent him from the chiefest Senators of Rome, written with their owne hands requesting Sertorius to bring his armie into ITALY, where he should find numbers of people desirous of his coming, and that gaped still for change of government. But here did Pompey shew himselfe a grave and no young man, delivering thereby the citic of Rom a from great feare and danger of rentiges change and innouation. For he put all Sertorius letters and writings on a heape together, and wildows in burnt them enery one, without reading any of them, or fuffering them to be read. And moreouer, he prefently put Perpenna to death, fearing he should name some, which if they were named, tearn. would breed new occasions of trouble and sedition. And as for the other conspirators, some of them afterwards were brought to Pomper, who put them all to death and the rest of them seed present into Africk B, where they were all overthrowne by them of the country, and not a man of fute death them scaped, but fell vnfortunatly vpon the edge of the sword, Aufidius onely except, Manlius companion in loue. THE LIFE OF

Vristhe Historiographer writeth, that Eumenes was born in the citie of Cardia in Thracia, being acariars sonne of the same countrey. (who for pourty earned his living by carying merchandizes to and fro) and that he was notwithstanding honestly brought vp, aswell at schoole, as at other comely exercises. And furthermore, how that he being but a boy, Philip king of MACEDON chancing to come through the citie of CARDIA, where having nothing to doe, he tooke great pleasure to see the young men of the citie handle their weapons, and boyes to wrastle : and among them, Eumenes shewed such activitie, and camero pre- performed it with so good agrace withall, that Philip liked the boy well, and tooke him away with him. But sure their report seemed truest, which write that Philip did advance him for the loue he bare to his father, in whose house he had lodged. After the death of Philip, Eumenes continued his service with King Alexander his sonne, where he was thought a wise man, and as faithfull to his mafter, as any : and though he was called the Chancellor or chiefe Secretary, yet the King did honor him as much as he did any other of his chiefest friends or familiars. For he was fent his Lieutenant general of his whole army, against the Indians, & was Perdiccas succeffor in the gouernement of his prouince, Perdiccas being preferred vnto Hephaftions charge after his death. Now because Neoptolemus (that was one of the chiefe Squires for the bodie vnto the King) after the death of Alexander told the Lords of the councell of Mace Don, that he had scrued the King with his shield and speare, and how Eumenes had followed with his penne and paper: the Lords laughed him to scorne, knowing that besides many great honours Eumenes had received, the King efteemed so well of him, that he did him the honour by mariage to make him his kinseman. For the first Ladie that Alexander knew in Asia, was Barfine Artabazus daughter, by whom he had a sonne, and called his name Hercules: and two of her sisters he maried the one of them called Apama vnto Ptolomie, and her other fifter also called Barsine, he bestowed vpon Eumenes, when he distributed the PERSIAN Ladies among his Lords and fami-Eumenes. liars to marie them. Yet all this notwithstanding, he often fell in disgrace with King Alexander, and stood in some danger by meanes of Hephastion. For Hephaston following Alexanders Court on a time, having appointed Euius a fife-player alodging, which Eumenes fervants had taken up for their maister: Eumenes being in a rage, went with one Mentor unto Alexander, erying out, that a man were better be a fife and a common player of Tragedies, than a fouldier, fithence warres. Alexander at that present time was as angry as Eumenes, and roundly tookevo Hebbeltion for it: howbeit immediatly after having changed his mind, he was much offended with Eumenes, because hethought him not to have vsed that franke speech so much against Hethastion, as of a certaine prefumptous boldnesse towards himselfe. And at another time also, when Alexander was fending Nearchus with his army by fea to cleare the costs of the Ocean, it chanced the king was without money; whereupon he fent to all his friends to take vp money in press, and among others, vnto Eumenes, of whom he requested three hundred talants. Eumenes lent him but a hundred, & faid he had much ado to get him fo much of all his tenats. Alexander faid nothing to him neither would be fuffer them to take his hundred talants; but commanded his officers to fet Eumenes tent on fire, because he wold take him tardy with a lie, before he could give order to cary away his gold and filter. Thus was his tent burnt downe to the ground, before they could make shift to faue any thing: the which Alexander repented afterwards, and was forry it was burnt, because al his letters and writings were burnt withal. Howbeit, after the fire was quenched, they found in niggots of gold and filter mingled together, about a thoufand talants, & yet Alexander tooke none of it away but more then that he fent vnto all his Lieutenants, Captaines, and Gouernours of countries, wher focuer they were, that they should send him copies of all the letters which they before had fent unto him, because all those which he had were burnt, and commanded Eumenes to take them againe. After that, Eumenes and Hephaftion fell at variance againe, by reason of a gift that was given him, infomuch as very foule words passed betwixt Hepheltion and him . yet did not the King give Eumenes any ill countenance at that time. Notwithstanding, shortly after Hiphaftion was dead, the King taking his death grieuously whom he loued so dearely, gaue no good countenance (and was very briefe besides) vnto those whom he knew bare any grudge to Hiphestion whiles he lived, and that he thought were glad of his death, but specially vnto Eumenes of all other, whose malice towards Hephaltion was knowne to him well enough in fomuch as he would oft twit him withall, remembring him of the iniuties he had offered Hepheflion. But Eumenes being very wife, and one that could take his time, procured his helpe by the Telfe fame meane that did him hurt: and deuised (to further Alexanders desire, seeking to honour Hephelions funerall with all pompe possible) new inuentions to set forth the same, of more magnificence then had before beene feene sparing for no cost, laying on mony bountifully, to make him a rich and stately tombe. Againe, when Alexander was dead, there fell out great variance betwixt the Mac BDONIAN footmen, and the noble men that had been nearest about him: and in that quarrell, Eumenes in good will stucke to the Lords, but in words he feemed aneuter &friend to both parts, faying, It was not for him being a stranger, to thrust himself into the quarrels of the MACEDONIANS. And when the other Lords were departed from BABYLON, Eumenes tarying behind pacified the greatest part of the soldiers, and made them more tractable and readie to agree with the Lords. Whereupon, after the Lords and Captaines had confulted together, and taken order for these contentions, they divided the government of the provinces among them, which they called Satrapes: in which partition Eumenes had CAPPADOCIA, made Go-PAPHLAGONIA, and all that coast vpon Mare Ponticum, vnto the citie of TRAPEZVNTE, the Mernour of which at that time was not subject to the Empire of MACEDON, for Ariarathes kept it then as of Cappaking. Howbeit it was faid, that Leonatus and Antigonus would put him in possession of it, with a docta and great and puissant armic, and make him gouernour there. Yet afterwards Antigonus made none Paphla. account of Perdiceas letters vnto him, putting him in the head of great imaginations to conquer all, despissing all other. And Leonatus also came downeinto Phrigia, and vndertooke the journey of this conquest for Eumenes sake. But when he was in his iourney thirherward, Hecataus tyrant of the Cardians, went to him to his army, and prayed him rather to go helpe Antipater and the other MACEDONIANS, which were belieged in the citie of LAMIA. So Leonatus being willing to take fea, & go thither, went about to perfuade Eumenes alfo to like of it, & to reconcile him with Hecations; for they were not friends one with another, by reason of a quarrell that Eumenes father had with this Hecateus, about the gouernement of their city. Besides that, Eumenes had many times complained of him openly vnto King Alexander, faying that he was a tyrant, and befought the King that it would please him to set the CARDIAN'S at liberty. And therefore Eumenes refusing that journey against the Grecians, alleadged that he was affraid of Antipater, who had been his enemic of long time, doubting that for the old grudge he bare him, and also to gratifie Hecateus, he would put him to death: Leonatus then reuealed himselfe and his purpose to him, and how he made as though he would passe ouer the seato aide Antipater, where indeed his meaning wasto take the kingdome of MACEDON. Thereupon he shewed him letters fent from Cleopatra, willing him to come to the citie of PELLA, and there she would marrie him. When Eumenes was made private to his purpose either because he feared Antipater, or else for that he had no great good opinion of Leonatus, knowing him to be a fond man, and very rash and vnconstant in his doings, he stole away from him by night, with those few men he had (being about three hundred horfemen, and two hundred footmen well armed) taking all his gold with him, which amounted to the fumme of fine thousand talants; and fled with them vnto Perdiccas, vnto whom he bewrayed all Leonatus intent and mind: whereupon he was immediatly of great credit about him, and called to counsell. Shortly after Perdiccas brought him into CAPPADOCIA, with a great armie which he himself did leade. Where Ariarathes was taken prifoner, and Eumenes established Gouernor of the country, who deliuered the charge of the great cities vnto his friends, and left them there Captaines of garrifons which he appointed, placing euery where Iudges, Receiuers, Gouernours, and all fuch other officers necessary as he thought meete, Perdiccas medling with nothing at all. Notwithstanding, Eumenes went away with Perdiceas againe as well to wait vpon him, as also because he would ever be about the king. But Perdiccas thinking with himfelfe that he alone could well enough performe the enterprise he went about: and confidering also that the realme he left behind him stood needfull of a wise and skilful Gouernor, whom he might trust with the safety of his state: whethey were in CILICIA, returned Eumenes backe againe, vnder colour to fend him to his gouernment, but indeed to keepethe realme of ARMENIA in obedience, the which confined vpon the frontires of his country whereof he was Gouernour, because Neoptolemus did under-hand practise some alteration. Now though Neoptolemus was a proud and infolent person, yet Eumenes still deuised to hold him in, & kept him from attempts by gentle and faire words. Furthermore, perceiuing also that the regiment of the MACEDONIAN footmen were growne exceeding from and infolent, he for a strength and defence against them, set vp a company of horsemen; and to bring it to passe. released all the countrimen from paying of tribute or taxe, being meete to serue on horsebacke. and brought a great number of horie of service, which he gave amongst them that were about him, in which he put his most trust and affiance, making them couragious, by honors and gifts he gaueto them that served wel; and so by continuall exercise and often remouing them fro place to place, made them very ready and seruiceable. Thus were the noble men of Macedon, some much amazed, some others very glad when they saw how by this diligence Eumenes had in so short a time gotten about him such a number, as sixe thousand three hundred horsemen. About that time, Craterus and Antigonus having subdued the GRECIANS, came on with their army into As 1A to ouerthrow Perdiceas greatnesse and power and newes also, that shortly they wold inuade CAPPADOCIA. Whereupon Perdiccas being otherwise occupied in warres, fighting against Ptolomy, made Eumenes his Lieutenant generall, and gaue him commission and full authority ouer alhis foldiers that were for him, either in CAPPADOCIA, or in ARMENIA, and wrote letters vnto Neoptolemus and Alcetas, commanding them by the fame that they should be obedient vnto Eumenes, and suffer him to order all matters according to his discretion. Now for Alcetas, he flatly answered, that he would not be at this warre: for the Macedonians under his charge were ashamed to take armes against Antipater; and moreover they wold not fight against Craterus, but contrarily were bent to receive him for their Captaine, fo much good will they bare him. Weoptolemus on the other fide, was as ready to play the traitour, and to do Eumenesa shrewd turne, as Alcetas was. For being sent by Eumenes to come to him, where he should have obeyed him, he set his me in battel ray to fight with him. There did Eumenes reape the first fruite of his wife forefight of the horsemen, which he had set up to make head against the footmen of the MACEDONIANS. For when his owne footmen were broken and ouerthrown, he ouercame Meoptolemus, and put him to flight with his horfmen, and took al their cariage. Then he made the march in order of battel against the MACEDONIANS, who were dispersed every where, following the chase of his footmen, who they had ouerthrowne. Thus coming vpon them in this disorder, he draue them to throw away their weapons, and to yeeld vnto him : and moreouer, euery man to take his oath to serue him faithfully in this war, whersoeuer he would leade them. Now Neoptolemus gathering a few together that fled, went with them vnto Craterus and Antipater: who fent vnto Eumenes to pray him to take their part, with condition that he should not onely enjoy the countries and provinces still which he had in government, but furthermore that they would give him others vnto them, and make him stronger then ever he was: besides that by the acceptation of the offer, he should be taken for Antipaters good friend, where before he was euer reckoned his enemie. Whereunto Eumenes made answer: that having alwayes beene Antipaters enemy, he could not of a fudden become his friend, specially seeing him vse his friends as enemies: howbeit otherwise that he was very willing to make Craterus peace with Perdiccas, and to restore him againe to his fauour, vpon reasonable and indifferent conditions. And furthermore, that if he meant to affaile him, that then he would aide him so long as he had any breath in his bodie, and would lose his life before he would breake his promife. This answer being brought vnto Antipater, they fell to confult at leisure what was to be done. In the meane space, Neoptolemus that fled vpon his ouerthrow, was come vnto them: who told them how the battell was fought, and befought them both very instantly (but Craterus chiefely) to give him aide if it were possible. For the MACEDONIANS were so farre in lone with him, that if they did but see his hat, and heare him speake, they would all arme themselues and follow him. For to speake a troth, Craterus was had in great estimation among the MACEDONIANS: insomuch as after Alexanders death, he was more defired of the common fouldiers, than any other Captaine, remembring how often he had for their fakes incurred Alexanders difgrace and difpleasure, because he went about to perswade him to leave the king of Persiaes manner, wherunto Alexander by litle and litle gaue himselfe; and also for that he maintained and defended the custome of the countrey of MACEDON, the which every man through pride and excesse beganto forsake and contemne. At that time therefore Craterus sent Intipater into CILICIA. and he himselfe with Neoptolemus, went against Eumenes with the best part of his army, hoping to take him tardie and altogether vnprouided, supposing he would give himselfe to pleafure and pastime, after so great a victorie. But Eumenes, like a wise and valiant Captaine, had taken such order, that he heard newes time enough of his enemies comming, and had thereupon prepared his men in readinesse to resist him. Yet was not this the chiefest point of his skill Eumenes in warre: for he looked so precisely to his doings, that he did not onely keepe his enemies from soll in. knowledge of any thing that he did; but making his men alfo to kill Craterus in battell, before warre. they knew against whom they should fight, and to keepealso so dreadfull an enemie from their knowledge, that of all other shewed the passing skill of an expert Captaine. And to worke this feate the better, this was his policy. First, he made a rumor to be spread in his hoast, how Neoptolemus and Pigres were againe come against him, with certaine horsemen of all forts gathered together, CAPPADOCIANS and PAPHLAGONIANS. And when he thought to haue remoued in the night, a great desire of sleepe came vpon him, in the which he had a maruellous strange dreame. For it seemed vnto him that he saw two Alexanders preparing to fight one with another, either of them leading a battell of footmen, ranged after the MACEDONIAN dreams. fashion: who coming to give chargethe one vpon the other, the goddesse Minerua came to aide the one, and Ceres likewise to aide the other. Then he thought that after they had fought a long time together, he whom Minerua aided was ouerthrowne, and that Ceres had gathered eares of corne and made a crowne of them, to give him that had wonne the field. Hereupon Eumenes perswaded himselfe that this dreame made for him, and promised him victorie, for that he fought for a fertile countrey of corne, where was great plentie of it. For all the fields were sowne with corne in euerie place, that it was a pleasure to behold it, shewing the benefite of long peace, to see all the corne fields how greene they looked. But when he vnderstood that the enemies had given their fouldiers for the fignall of battell, Minerua and Alexander, then was his first imagination confirmed morethen before. Whereupon, he gaue Geres and Alexander for fignall of the battell to his fouldiers, and commaunded every man to make him a garland of wheate eares to weare on their heads, and that they should wreath flowers and no legaies about their pikes. He was in mind many times to make his trustiest Captaines privile against whom they should fight, and not alone to trust himselfe withall, to keepe so necessary athing as that fecret: yet in fine, he kept his first resolution thinking it the safest way, not to commit this danger, but to himselfe. Now when he came to give battell, he would place never a MACEDONIAN directly against Craterus, but set two companies of men at armes that were strangers against him, the which Pharnabazus (Artabazus sonne) and Phanix Tenidian did leade. Then he fpecially commaunded, that so soone as they saw the enemies before them, they should straight giue charge, giuing them no leifure to speake nor retire, neither to hearken to any Herauld or trumpet that they should send vnto them: for he feared much that the MACEDONIANS would turne against him, if they once came to know Craterus. Now for himselfe, he led the right wing of his battell, with a troupe of three hundred men at armes, the chiefest men of all his armie. where he would meete full with Neoptolemus front. When they had passed a litle hill that stood betweene both battels, Eumenes horsemen following his commaundement, ranne with full carriere to fet vpon their enemies. Craterus feeing that, was amazed withall, and banned and curfed Neoptolemus that had deceiued him in that fort, informing him that the MACEDONIANS would turne of his fide, if they might but once fee him: not with standing, he prayed them that were about him, to shew themselves like valiant menthat day, and therewithall siercely set spurres to his horse to meet with his enemies. The encounter was very cruell on either side, and their staues being broken, they fell straight to their swords: but that day did not Crateria dishonour the memorie of Alexander, for he flue many of his enemies round about him, valiantly repulsed them that did affaile him, and many times ouerthrew them. Yet in fine, one of the men of armes of Thracia gauchim fuch ablow on the fide, that he turned him off his horfe, and when he was downe, many passed ouer him. But Gorgias, one of Eumenes Captaines know. ing him, lighted from his horse, and appointed men about him to guard him: howbeit it was too late, for he was drawing on, and even in the very pangs of death. Eumenes and Neoptolemus on the other fide, which had bin mortall enemies of long time, being on fire with an old malice, they fought vp and downe the one for the other. And at the two first courses they could not one light vpon the other, but at the third meeting, when they knew one another, then they fet fpurres to their horses, their swords drawne, and with great cries gaue charge vpon each other. And their horses met so siercely together, as if two armed galleys had met with their prowes: and both the Captaines laying the bridles in their horses neckes, closed together, and with both hands striued to plucke offeach others head peece, & to rent their polrons from their shoulders. Whilest they were thus tearing each other their horses ran fro them, and they felto the ground, one holding the otherfast as if they had wrastled together. Neoptolemus got vp first : but as he rofe, Eumenes cutthe ham of his legge, and raifed himfelfe vp withall. Neoptolemus staying himfelfe vpon one knee, his other legge, being very fore hurt, defended himfelfe on the ground the best he could, from Eumenesthat was on his feete, but he could give him no deadly wound: neuertheleffe himfelfe had a blow on the necke, that layed him flat on the ground. Then Eumenes inflamed with choler against him, went about to strip him, and fell a reuiling of him, and being in that furious mood, remembred not that Neoptolemus had his sword yet, who hurt him vnder his curaces, euen about his groine, not farre from his prinie parts; how beit the wound made Eumenes worse afraid then there was cause of hurt, for that Neoptolemus strength was gone before the stroake came, dying presently upon it. Eumenes having stripped him, found himselfe very ill(by reason of his wounds) on his armes and legges, which had many a sore gash: notwithstanding, he got vpon his horseagaine, and rode towards the other wing of his battell, thinking his enemies had beene fighting still. But there being told that Craterus had his deaths wound, he went straight to the place where he lay, and found him yet aliue, not past knowledge. Then Eumenes lighted from his horse, and wept, and taking him by the right hand, accursed Neoptolemus that had brought him to that pitifull state, and had also forced him to be in battell against one of his deerest friends, to make him the instrument of his veter vndoing. This second battell Eumenes wanne ten daies after the first battell obtained, which got him greathonour, for that he had discomfited one of his enemics through wisedome, and the other by valiantnesse. But yet this bred him muchill will, not onely of his enemies, but of his friends also that tooke his part, when they bethought them, that he being a stranger, had with the weapons and power of the Macedonians themselves, slaine the greatest and most famous Captaine among them. Now if Perdiccas had been so happy, as to have lived and received the advertisement of Craterus death, no doubt he had been the greatest person of all the MACEDONIANS. But as ill lucke would haue it, within two dayes after that Perdiccas was flaine in a mutinie of his men in A-GYPT, newes came to his armie of Eumenes victory, and also of the death of Craterus. Whereupon the Macedonians were so offended with Eumenes, that incontinently they condemned him to die, and gaue Antigonus and Antipater commission to execute the reuenge. When Eumenes

Eumenes passing by mount Ida(where the king kept a race and breed of horses) had taken away with him as many horses as he would, and had sent letters of aduertisement therof to the kings riders: Antipater, as it is reported, finiled, and in mockerie faid, that he maruelled to fee Eumenes greateare, to thinke that he should either give or receive any account of the kings goods. So Eureenes thought good to fight in the great plaines of Lydia, especially neare vnto the chiefe citie of SARD is because he was the stronger in horsemen, and for that he wold make Cleopatra see the power of his armie. Howbeit, being intreated by her (who feared blame of Antipater) he sadiuste TVCHT further into high PHRYGIA, and wintred in the citie of CEL ANES. But there Polemon Al- observation cetas and Decimus, fell in contention with him for leading of the armie, faying that they had as of Lyais. much right to leade the armie as he. Eumenes answered them. Truly here is the common saying vp and downc: Desperate men regard no danger. Now Eumenes having promised his fouldiers pay within three dayes, to keep his promife, fold them all the farmes and caffles of that country, together with the men and beafts of the same, wherof the province was fully replenished. Therupon his Licutenants of the bands having bought certaine of them, went and tooke them perforce, through Eumenes engines of batterie which he suffered them to cary with him: and having taken them, they went and divided the spoile, paying every fouldier ratably his wages due. This deuice brought him againe in fauour among his fouldiers. For certaine papers being found in his campe cast abroad by his enemies promising great offices, and a hundred talents besides to any man that killed Eumenes: the Machdonians that ferued vinder him were so offended withall. that they presently set downe an order, that from that time forward a thousand of the best souldiers among them (which also had charge under them) should alwaies guard his person, keeping watch enery night about him, as fell out by turnes one after another. Wherunto they all agreed: and Eumenes gaue them those honors and rewards which thekings of Macedon were wontto give vnto their friends, and which they gladly received. For through their grant he had authoritic to give purple cloakes and hats to whom he thought good, which was the honorablest gift the king of MACEDON could give. It is true, that prosperity maketh simple men high minded. wherby they feeme (though they be not) very honorable, but specially whe fortune hath raised them to honor and wealth. But indeed he that is of a noble mind and frout courage, is best discerned in aductfity; for he neuer yeelded to any troubles, as appeareth by Eumenes. For when he had lost a battel among the ORCYNIANS, in the realme of CAPPADOCIA, through the treasonof one of his fouldiers he being purfued, yet neuer gaue the traitor any leisure to flie to his enemies The confor fafety, but took him and truffed him vp. And after he had fled for a time, he turned his horfe Eumtra in head upon a fudden, and leaving his enemies fide-hand of him that had him in chafe he closely admission. ftole by them without their knowledge, and held on journeying fo long, vntil he came to the felf fame plaine where the battell was fought. There he camped, and gathering vp the dead bodies (the captaines by themselues, and the souldiers apart) he burnt them with the doores, gates, and windowes of all the villages and townes thereabouts that he could get together; and in feed of tombes for them, he raised up great heapes of earth. Insomuch as Antigonus coming thither immediatly after he wondered much at his valiantnesseand inuincible courage. Removing thence, he met with Antigonus cariage, and might eafily without danger haue taken a number of prifoners as well free as bond, and haue gotte all the riches and treafure which they had spoiled in so many fundry warres, townes and countries howbeit he was afraid that if his fouldiers were loden with that spoile, it would make them more heavie to march, and vnable to flie, but specially frategine more tender to abide to runne from place to place a long time together, being the onely meane wherein he trufted to come to end this warre. For he made account that Antigonus in the end would be wearie in following him follong a time, and therefore that he would turne some other way. Moreouer he perceived that it was impossible for him by his authority to keepe the MACB-DONIANS from taking such a prey, as offered it selfe vnto them: whereupon he commaunded them to fray a while, and bait their horse first, and then that they should go straight to spoile the enemies cariage. But in the meane time he fecretly fent a messenger to Menander (who had the charge and conduct of all the carriage) to will him to flie with all speed out of the plaine, & to get him to the hanging of a hill not far from thence, and fafe from horsemen, where they could not be enuironed, and there to fortifie himfelfe, fending him word also, that he sent him this aduertisement, for the old friendship and acquaintance that had been betweene them afore. Menander hearing what danger he was in, made his mentruffe vp their cariage straight, Therupon Eumenes openly fent certaine light armed mento discouer, and to bring him newes; and therewithall commanded them to arme, and bridle their horses, as if he had meant to have led them against the enemies. His scouts were now returned, and told him that it was vnpossible either to diffresse ortake Menander, for that he was fled into a place of fuch strength, and therefore was not to be come by. Eumenes feemed to be very forry for it, howbeit heled his army from thence notwith. standing. Menander afterwards reported this matter to Antigonus, and the MACEDONIANS that were in his army, who did greatly commend Eumenes, and after that loued him better then euer they did before: because that having their children in his hands who he might have made slaves. and their wives also whom he might have defiled he spared them all. Howbeit Antigonus to put them out of this humour, told them, Ye are deceived, my friends: for it was not for your fakes, nor yetto pleasure you, that Eumenes tooke not your wines, your children, and your goods, but only for the feare he had to haue shackles on his heeles, to let him from speedy slying. So Eumenes departing from thence, fled still before Antigonus, and wandring vp and downe, did himselfe wish his souldiers to get them somewhere esse; either indeed for that he was carefull of them, or for that he was vnwilling to have such a number about him, being too few to fight a battell, and too many to hide his flying. In fine, he went to a strange place of situation, called Nora, in the confines of Lycaonia and Cappa Docia, with five hundred horsmen, and two hundred foot. men well armed: and when he was come thither also, he gaue every one leave to depart that asked him licence, because they could not have abidden the discomodity of the place, which was very ftraight, and the lack of necessary victuals, which they must need shaue wanted, if the siege did continue long: and thus departed from them with very good words and louing countenance. Shortly after came Antigonus before the fort, but would not beliege it, before he fent for Eumenes to come to him vpon his word. Eumenes answered him, that Antigonus had many of his friends about him, that after him might come to be the heads of his tribe, and that himselse on the other fide had not a noble man for whom he fought; and therefore if Antigonus would have him come and speake with him, that he should send him one of his chiefest friends in hostage. Againe, Antigonus being earnest with him, and telling him, it was reason he should come to him, for that he was the better man, and of greater power; Eumenes answered him: I will acknowledge none better then my felf, folong as I can hold my fword in my hand. In the end, Antigonus (according to Eumenes request) fent his owne nephew Ptolomie into the fort, and then came Eumenes out. At their meeting they both embraced & faluted each other, as friends of old acquaintance and familiaritie, and to fell in talke of divers matters; but all this while Eumenes neuer once made request to depart in safety, neither yet demanded pardon, but onely desired the goarimity. confirmation of his charge and gouernment, and that he might be restored to that which was giue him. They that were present at that meeting, maruelled much at Eumenes, and greatly commended his stoutnesse. Now whiles they were thus in talketogether, the MACEDONFANS came out of all parts of the campe, to see what maner of man Eumenes was: because that after the death of Craterus, there was no talke among the MACEDONIAN fouldiers of any Captaine but of Eumenes. Neuerthelesse. Antigonus fearing they would do Eumenes some mischiefe, commanded them aloud to give backe, and made stones to be throwne among them to keepe them off him. All this notwithstanding he was faine in the end to put them off with his guard, and to take Eumenes in his armes, and had much ado to deliuer him fafely into his fort againe. After this impar. lance, Antigonus compassed this fort of Nora round about with a wall, and left a sufficient number of men to continue the fiege, and so went his way with the rest of his army. In the mean time Eumenes remained befieged within this fort, where there was plenty of wheate, water, and falt, but of no other thing that was good to eate, nor of sweete taste, to sustaine them with their bread. Yet with such as he had he kept them in good likeing that were in house with him. For he made them every one after another sit at his boord with him, and withall did fashion out that maner of diet, with a certaine life and familiaritie of pleasant deuices to entertaine them at their meare. For besides that he sought to shew them as pleasant a countenance as he could, yet naturally he had a sweete faire face, not looking like a man of warre, that all the dayes of his life had been trained vp in it: but like a fresh youth, being of such a constitution of body, that the excellentest workman that euer was could not better set out all the parts and proportion of a man, then were naturally to be seene in him. His speech was not harsh nor churlish, but very milde and pleasant, as appeareth by the letters he wrote. Now for the siege, there was nothing that more annoyed the befreged then the narrownesse of the fort wherein they were, which was not aboue two furlongs compaffe about; and their houses so litle and narrow, that they could scant turne them in them, and did eate and drinke without any manner of exercise for themselves, or Eamone their horse. Now Eumenes to take away the sluggishnesse that groweth by idlenesse, a thing most the free for hurtfull to them that are acquainted with trauell and paines, to keepethem in breath, and to market make them the lighter to flie, if occasion were offered, put his men into the longest and widest hall he had in his house (being fourteene cubits long to walk vp and downe in) and taught them first of all to march faire and fostly, and then by litle & litle to hasten their pace; for the horses he had them he made to be girt before, one after another, & the did foftly trife them vp with long pulleys fastned to the beames, their hindmost part standing on the ground, and their formost being aloft. The horses being trised up in this maner, their riders came with loud cries behind them and some with whips in their hands to lash them, that the horse being mad withall, yerked out behind, & sprang forward with his formost legs to touch the ground, that they did but euen rafe italitle, fo as enery veine and finew of them were strained by this meanes, that they blew, and were all of a fome withall, so good an exercise to them it was, as welto put them in breath, as to keepe their legs supple to run. After that, they had their oates very cleane pickt and dresied, that they might digeft them the fooner. Antigonus having long continued this fiege, newes came vnto him that Autipater was dead in MACEDON, and that the realme was in a great broile, through the factions of Callander and Polypercon. Antigonus whose head was straight full of great imaginations, greedily coueting with himfelfe the whole kingdome of Mace Don, thought good to make Eumene, his friend, that through his help he might attaine his defired purpole. Therupon he fent Hieronymus vnto him to treat of peace, & gaue him the forme of the oath which he wold have him sweare vnto him. When Eumenes had seene it, he would not be sworne in that maner, but corrected it, and faid: that he did referre himselfe to the judgement of the MACEDONIANS which kept him befieged, to judge which of those two formes was most meetest, that which Antigonus hadfent him, or the fame which he had corrected. For in Antigonus forme of oath, there was a litle mention only made at the beginning of the bloud royall, but in all the rest following, he bound Eumenes particularly to himselfe. But Eumenes in his forme of oath, did first of all put Olympias the mother of king Alexander, & the kings his fons afterwards and for the relt he fwore he would be friend of the friends, and enemy of the enemies, not of Antigonus onely, but of the kings, and of Olympias. The MACEDONIANS being at the fiege before Nora, did better like the forme of Eumenes oath, then they did that of Antigonus. So having given Eumenes his oath, and made him sweareaccording to that forme, they raised their siege, and sent also vnto Antigonus to take his oath. Allthis accomplished, Eumenes redeliuered the Cappadocians their hostages, (which he had kept in Nora with him) and they that came for them, gave him in their stead, horse of warre, beasts of carriage, tents and paulions. Thus he began to gather his men againe together, which were dispersed abroad after his ouerthrow, so that in few dayes he was aboue a thousand horsemen, with whom he fied, fearing yet Antigonus: and he did wifely. For Antigonus had not onely commaunded them to flut him vp againe straighter then he was before: Thin we but besides that wrote sharpe letters, and veric angrily vnto the MACEPONIANS, which dridens, had accepted the correction of the oath. Whilest Eumenes wandred up and downe flying still, the sen of he received letters from certaine in Macedonia (fearing Antigonus greatnesse) and special-futher to ly from Olympias, which fent vnto him to come into MACEDON, to take the charge and gouetn- alexander ment of her young sonne Alexander, whom they sought to put to death. Furthermore, he likewiferceined letters from Polyperchon, and from king Philip, who commanded him to make war ed Philip. with Antigorus with his armie he had in CAPPADOCIA, and to put in his purse of the kings fine Exments hundred filuer talents (which had been taken from him before) which were in the citie of Cys Philip. DES: and besides, to defray the charges of the warres, as much as he thought meet. And there- Lientemant withall also they wrote vnto Antigenes and Teutamus, the two Captaines of the Argyraspides, Argyraspi to wit, the fouldiers with the filuer shields, or shields filuered, which were of the old bands of det alwa. Alexanders armie. These two Captaines having received these letters, did vie Eumenes with dry soul. very good words, and shewed him great countenance: yet a man by their lookes might easily deristo coniecture that they enuied him; for either of them both thought themselves men inflicient, the other fluor and worthy to commaund Eumenes, notto aid him. Howbeit Eumenes behaued himselfe ve-edshaid. rie wisely, for as touching their enuic, he pacified that, because he tooke not the money which temperance, Fff 3 ne was commanded to take for his owne vie, for that he had no need of it. And as for their armsition and prefumption, diffdaining to be commaunded by him, though they could neither tell how to command nor obey, he did reclaime them by a superstition he layd before them, which was this. He made them beleeue that Alexander did appeare to him in his sleepe, and that he shewed him a paulion sumptuously set out in the state and magnificence of a king, in the which was a royall throne: and told him, that if they would keepe their councell place in that paullion, he would be present among them, and aide them in all their counsels, and conducts of their warres, so that they would alwaies begin by him. He casily perswaded Antigenes and Tentamus to beleeve that which he spake, who would not go to him to consult of any matters: neither did he thinke it honorable for himself to be seene to go to other mens gates. Wherfore with al their confents they incontinently fet vp a goodly rich pauillion, which was called Alexanders pauilion and there they kept their councels and affemblies for dispatch of all their weightiest causes. After this, they went towards the high countries, & met with Pencestas on the way (Eumenes ve. ry great friend) who loyned with them, and other great peers of the realme, with all their power besides. This didgreatly strengthen the army of the noblemen of MACHDONIA, as touching the number of men, and their braue armours and furniture: but for their owne persons, because they had no man to command them fince the death of Alexander, they were growne selfe willed by diffolute liberty, and effeminate in their manner of life; and moreover they had gotten a tyrannicall fiercenesse, nourished and increased by the vanities of the barbarous people. So that many of them being then together, could not be quiet one with another, but shamefully flattered the old bands of the MACEDONIAN fouldiers, giving them money, and making them banquets and feasts of sacrifices. And thus in short time, of a campe they brought it to be a dissolute tauerne, where the noblemen got the fouldiers fauour that they might be chosen Chieftaines of all the armie: like as the common peoples voices are bought in free cities (where the people doe rule) to be preferred to honourable states and offices of the common wealth. Now Eumenes found straight that these peeces of the realme disdained one another, howbeit that they al seared and mistrusted him, and sought but for oportunitie to kill him. Wherefore to preuent this, he made as though he had occasion to occupie mony, and so borrowed a great summe of them specially whom heknew most hated him, to the end that from thenceforth they should no more feleout of distrust, but trust him, standing in feare to lose the mony they had lent him. And therof followed a strange thing : for other mens mony and goods was the safety of his life. For where others giue money to faue their liues, he by taking of money faued his owne life. Now for the foldiers of the MACEDONIANS, whileft they faw they were without danger of enemies to make them afraid, they still hung vpon them that gaue them, being defirous to be made Generals, and came eucry morning to their vpriling to waite upon them, and follow them wherefoeuer they went. But when Antigonus was come to campe hard by them with a great and puissant armie, and that their case required then a valiant Captaine and skilfull leader: not the souldiers alone, but all the pecres and states besides (which in peace did braue it out) did then willingly (without motion made) submit themselues vnto Eumenes, to be at his commandement. For when Anticonus Passigniss affayed all the waies he could to passe ouer the river of Pasitigris, the peeres which were laided in divers places to let him from passing over , heard nothing of it, so that there was none but Eume-Eumenes nes onely that refifted him, and fought with him, where he flue fuch a number of his men, that he filled the river with them, and tooke foure thousand of them prisoners. Againe, when Eumenes was ficke, these old bands did more plainly shew what opinion they had of him, and of others, to wit, that they could banquet them, and make them good cheere at their houses; yet victorie. that Eumenes onely of all other was worthiest to be their Captaine, and to command them. For Peucestas having feasted them in the kingdome of PERSIA, and given every souldier a mutton to facrifice, thought he had won great fauor and credit among them. But shortly after, as the army marched against their enemies, Eumenes by misfortune fell dangerously sicke, and therfore foldiers ar- would needs be carried in a litter farre from the campe, to be out of the noise, because he could take no rest. Butthey had not gone farre, before they faw their enemics, which having passed ouer certaine litle hils betweene them, were comming downe into the valley. When the foldiers faw the glistering of the gilt armours of their enemies that glared in the Sunne, and the good order they marched withall in battell ray, the Elephants with the towers vpon their backes, and the men at armes with their purple coates vpon their armours (which was the apparell they were when they went to fight with their enemies) then the foremost staid upon it, and cried out, willing them to fend for Eumenes to leade them; for they would elfe go no further if they had not him for their Generall. And therwithal they raifed their pikes, and laid down their shields at their feet, calling from one to another to stay, and to their private Captaines also: and told them plainely, that they would not stirre a foot from thence, nor fight at all, vnlesse Eumenes were among them to leade them. Eumenes hearing of it, came to them with great speed, hastning his flaues and littermen to bring him thither; and then opening his litter on every fide, he held out his right hand to the fouldiers, and told them he was very glad of the good opinion they had of him. The fouldiers also as soone as they saw him, saluted him in the Macedonian tongue, and tooke up their shields, clapping them against their pikes with a great shout, bidding their enemics come when they would, they should be fought withall, now that their Captaine was among them. Antigonus on the other fide, being informed by certaine prisoners which his fouldiers had taken in skirmish, that Eumenes was fallen very fore sicke, and by reason therof was caried in a litter, thought now he should have no great ado to discomfit the rest of the army, and therefore made all possible speed he could to fight. But when he came so neare, that he might eafily fee the order and countenance of his enemies, who were fet in fuch good order of bartell, that it could not any waies be amended, he was much amazed withall, and pawfed a great while; and in the meane time spied Eumenes litter a farre off, caried from one end of the battell to the other, whereat he laughed out aloud, as his manner was, and turning himfelfe to his friends, faid: See, faid he, I beleeue it is that litter that maketh warre with vs, and doth offer vs battell. But Antigonna with those words, he sounded the retraite, and brought his men backe againe into his campe. When this feare was a little passed ouer, the MACEDONIANS fell to their old trade againe, the Pecres to flatter the foldiers, and the foldiers to waxe braue and floute against their Captaines: fo that when they came to take their garrifons for the winter time, they divided in maner among them the whole countrie of the GABENIANS, the first from the last being lodged almost a thoufand furlongs off. Which Antigenus vnderstanding, determined to set vpon the, they mistrusting nothing; and fo went fodainly towards them, by a fhorter way then that he had alreadic come, but the worser way a great deale, and where no water was to be had:in hope that if he metthem thus difperfed afunder, their Captaines could not readily affemble them all together. But while he was in this his journey, in the defert crooked way, he was so ouertaken with such boisterous winds and extreame bitter cold, that his fouldiers couldgo no further, but were forced to tarrie still, to prouide them present remedy against the surie of the time. Now the only remedy they had, was to make numbers of fires: and by them their enemies knew of their comming. For the barbarous people inhabiting the mountaines, towards the defert, being amazed to fee fuch a number of fires in the valley, fent prefently with speed vpontwo camels light loden, to aduertise Pencestas, who being nearest vnto the mountaines was so scared with these newes, that he was at his wits end, not knowing what to do. For feeing his other companions as much afraid as himselfe, he fled upon it, and caried all them with him which he met in his way. But Eumenes quieted this great feare, affuring them that he would flay the fudden attempt of their enemies, and that they should come three dayes later then they looked for: which they beleeued. Then did Euments send messengers into every quarter to all the Captaines, commanding them specdily to put their men in readines, and to meet him in a certaine place which he appointed. Himfelfe in the meane time went with other Captaines to chuse a fit ground to lodge a campe, the which might easily be seen from the top of the mountaines which they must passe that come fratageme from the defert : and there fortified the same with trenches, and divided it out into quarters, ma- against king fire in every place, such a distance off one from another, as they vse commonly to make in a campe. It was no sooner done, but Antigonus came to the top of the mountaines, and saw these fires afarre off, which grieued him much: for he thought that his enemies had long before knowne of his comming, and that they came against him. Being affraid therefore less his enemies would compell him to fight, comming fresh vpon him, his owne men being wearie and done with the paines they had abidden, comming through that defert countrey: he tooke his way to leade backe his army, not the nearest way by the which he came, but through the country richly inhabited and replenished with great cities and good townes, to refresh his ouer-wearied people. Yet feeing he had none alarmes giuen, nor any skirmishes offered him, (as they had seene none other armie but his, sauing that round about there was store of fires: then he ftraight mistrusted that it was one of Eumenes stratagemes of warre, wherewith he had deceived him. And therewithall he was in such a rage, that he went straight to the place where he thought to find him, determining no more to steale vpon him, but to put all to the hazard of a battell. But in the meane time, the most part of the hoast was gathered about Eumenes, for the great estimation every man had of his wisedome and sufficiencie: insomuch that they agreed and ordained. that he onely as their Lieutenant generall should command the whole armic. This spited the two Captaines of the ARGYRASPIDES, Antigenes and Tentamus, who bare him fuch an inward grudge, that from that time forth they practifed his death: and affembling together with many of the States and particular Captaines, they fate in councell to know when, and in what fort they should kill him. Howbeitthe most voices affembled in this councell, were whole of opinion. that they should take the benefit of his service in leading the battell, and that immediatly after they should put him to death. This being thus resoluted vpon, Eudamus Captaine of the Elephants, and another called Phadimus, went fecretly and told Eumenes what they had concluded vpon in the affembly against him, not for any good will that they bare him, or for that they foughtto pleasure him, but onely because they were afraid to lose the money they had lent him. Eumenes gaue them great thanks, and commended their fidelity, and then reported it vnto his best friends, and told them: You see how I am enuironed with a troope of wild & brutish beasts. That done, he made his Will, and tore all the letters and writings that had ben fent him, because he would not have them fuffer for him after his death, that had Ient him fecret advertisements. zers to keep. Afterwards when he had disposed of all his private matters in this fort, he stood in a doubt whether he should lose the battell, giving his enemies the victory, or whether it were better for him to flie into Cappado Cia, through Media & Armenia. Howbeit herefolued of nothing before his friends. But when the mischiefe he was in had put divers thoughts into his head, in fine, he determined to fight, and did fet his army in battel ray, perfwading the GRECIANS as well as the barbarous people to stand to it like men. And as for the old soldiers of the Macedonians. they fo litle needed exhortation, that they themselves did exhort Eumenes to be of good courage faying that their enemies wold neuer abide them, because they were all the oldest souldiers, and of greatest experience that had been in all the conquests of king Philip, and of his sonne Alexander; and that it was neuer heard that they had been ouerthrowne in any fet battell, the most of them being threescore and ten yeares old, and the youngest no lesse then threescore. Whereupon, when they ran with great furie to give charge vpon their enemies, they cryed out aloude speaking to the souldiers of the MACEDONIAN'S that were under Antigonus: Ah wretches, come ye to fight with your fathers: And so affailing them with a lustie courage, and in rage withall, in a short space ouerthrew the squadron of their enemies, and slue the most part of them in the field. Thus was Antigonus armie cleane ouerthrowne on that fide : but on the other fide where his men'of armes were, through Pencestas cowardlinesse (that handled himself very ill at that battell) he had the upper hand and wanne all their carriage, through his forefight in the greatest fury of the battell, and the strength of the place where the battell was fought. For it was a maruellous great plaine of length, neither too deepe, nor yet too hard vnderfoot, but couered ouer with a finall fine fand, much like to a drie fand the fea casteth vp, and leaueth vpon the shore. This sand being feattered abroad by riding and going too and fro of so many thousands of men and horses during the time of the battell foughten, had raifed fuch a mighty dust and white smoke in the elem et, as if they had ftirred or tempered white lime together: which troubled their fight fo fore, as they could fee nothing before them: in respect whereof Antigonus might easily seize all their cariage, themselues being neuer a whit the wifer. The battell being come to this passe you have heard, Teutamus sent presently vnto Antigonus, to pray him to redeliuer them their cariage again. which he had taken and caried into his campe. Antigonus made him answer, that he would not only redeliver the goods vnto the ARGYRASPIDES, but would moreover vie them with all the fauour he could fo farforth as they deliuered Eumenes into his hands. Whereupon the Argy-RASPIDES tooke prefently a wicked resolution, to deliuer him aliue into § hands of his enemies. berned by And with that determination they came neare vnto him, not making any countenance as though they would lay hands on him, but rather feeming to guard and defend his person, as their maner was:fome of them lamenting that their goods were gone: others telling him that he cared not now that he had won the battell and others accusing the noblemen of cowardlines, saying, that the fault was in them that they had not the whole victorie. But in fine, one of them having spied his time, flew to him, and tooke his fword out of his hand: the others straight laid hold of him. and bound both his hands behind him with his owne girdle. Antigonus vnder standing it, fent Nicanor thither to take him out of their hands, and to bring him to him. Then Eumenes having made request ynto them to suffer him to speake, as they brought him through the bands of these old MACEDONIAN fouldier, it was granted him with condition, that he should make no motion vnto them to turne from that they were determined to do, but to tell them of things, which (as he faid) tended greatly to their benefit. Whereupon filence being made, he got vp vpona little hillocke, and there spake vnto them, putting forth his hands being bound. O wretched and faithlesse men, the wickedess that ever Mace on bred! What so great triumph or victory, hath ener Antigonus wonne of you, having fought it fuch infinite wayes, as you your selves doe now to the train put into his hands, deliuering him your Captaine bound and manacled? Willnot this be to your terous Argy great shame, that being masters of the field, you will grant the honour of the victory vnto your his popular enemie, only for a litle couetousnesse of money and paltarie stuffe which you have lost. And yet is not this all but the worst behind to send your Captaines as you do to pay the ransome of your baggage. For my felf, though now they leade me bound, yer do I remain free vnouercome, van- 33 quiffer of mine enemies, and fold by them that should be my friends. Well, yet this request I >> onely make vnto you in the name of Inpiter, protector of armes, and for the honour of the gods, 35 (vnto whom all vowed othes ought faithfully to be kept) I pray & conjure you to kill me your >> felues in this place. For all commeth to one end. To be flaine in Antigonus campe by the hands » of mine owne enemies, will euer be counted your deed; and you may be affured he will not be >> angry withall, for he onely defircth Eumenes death, and not his life. If you will needs hold your hands from this attempt, vnloofe yet one of mine onely, that shall suffice to do the feate. And if ... for feareye will not put a fword in my hand, throw me bound yet hand and feete vnto wild » beafts: which if ye performe, then do I discharge you of your oth taken between both my hands ... which we have Iworne vnto your Captaine, as holily & perfectly performed. Vpon this speech >> of Eumenes, all the rest of the army had compassion of him, that they wept for tender affection. But the Argyraspides cried out to cary him away, and not to give eare to his preaching and >> that it was a good deed to punish this wicked Choerrones IAN according to his deferts, confidering that he had surmoiled the MACEDONIANS with endlesse warre and battell. And moreouer, that it were too much shame that the worthiest souldiers that euer serued king Philip and Mexander, so painfully in al their warres, shold for recompence of their service in their old age be turned a begging, their wines having now lienthree nights with their enemies. With those words, they violently draughim on towards Antigonus campe, who fearing left the multitude of people that ranne to fee him, would smoother him in the presse, because every man ranne out of the campe, he fent thither ten of the strongest Elephants he had, and a good number of men at armes of the Medes and Parthians, to make way for him in the preffe. When Eumenes was now come into Antigonus campe, his heart would not ferue him to fee him in that miferable flate, for that they had once been familiarly acquainted together. Whereupon, such as had him in their cuftodie, came to Antigonus to aske him, how he would have him kept: who answered Antivonus them: Like a Lion or an Elephant. Yet within a while after he tooke pitie of him, and dischar- answer for ged him of his weightiest irons, and sent one of his houshold servants to him to see him well v- keeping of fed, and suffered his friends to come and bring him any thing he lacked. Thus did Antigonus being prideferre many dayes before he would determine ought of Eumenes, hearing euery man speake, soner. and pondering their purposes and seucrall opinions. Wearchus CRETAN, and his owne sonne Demetrius spake for Eumenes, and made suite to saue his life, contrarie to all the other Lords and Captaines that were about Antigonus, who would in any case have him die. Eumenes standing In these termes, asked his keeper Onomarchus one day, what Antigonus meant, that having his enemie in his hands, he did not quickly rid him out of his paine, or nobly deliuer him? Onomarthus churlishly answered him againe, that the time was past now to shew his courage, as though Emerses. he feared not death: and that he should have shewed it in the field at the battell. So helpe me Inpiter (quoth he) fo haue I done, and if thou beleuest not me, aske them that set vpon me: for I neuer met with man yet more strong then my selfe. Onomarchus replied againe: sith now therfore thou hast found a stronger then thy felf, why then canst thou not abide his pleasure. In fine, whe Antigones had refolued of his death, he commanded them to give him no more meate; and thus taking his fustenance from him. Eumenes was three daies a dying. In the meane time came fuch newes, that fuddenly the campe remound, and therfore before their departure, a man was fent to Eumenes to dispatch him out of his paine. Antigonus licenced his friends to take his body & burn it, and then to gather his affect and bones to fend them to his wife and children. Eumenes being flaine in this manner, the gods appointed none other judges to reuenge the difloyalty and treafon of the ARGYRASPIDES and their Captaines, for betraying Eumenes, but Antigonus selfe: who detesting them as cruell murtherers, and periured persons to the gods, appointed Ibyrtius Gouernor of the province of ARACHOSIA, to kill them every mothers for what way he could, that none of them might euer fee MACEDON agains, nor the Greekish sea.

THE COMPARISON OF

Thegouern-Sertorius.

Ere have we fer downe the things worthy memorie of Eumenes and Sertorius. Now to compare them together, in this they were both alike: that they being strangers in a strange countrey, and banished out of their owne, had alwayes been Captaines of divers nations, and chieftaines of great and warlike armies. But this was proper to Sertorius, that all those of his faction gaue him the chiefest place of authoritie, as the most sufficientest man among them, and worthiest to commaund: where Eumenes having many that contended against him for the chiefe rule and conduction of the armie, through his noble deedes, obtained the chiefe place and authoritie in the same. So that they obeyed the one, desiring to be gouerned by a good Captaine; and for their ownefafety gaue place to the other, feeing themselues vnableto command. For Sertorius being a ROMAINE, gouerned the SPANIARDS and Lysi-TANIANS and Eumenesa Choer Ronesian, the Macedonians. Of the which the Spani-ARDS of long time had beene fubicat to the Empire of Rome: and the MACEDONIANS at that time had fubdued all the world. Furthermore, Sertorius being then of great estimation, for that he was a Senator of Rome, and had had charge of men of warre before, came to the dignity and eftate to be chieftaine of agreat armie. Where Eumenes came with small reputation, diffained for that he was but a Secretarie; and when he began to come forwards, had not only leffe meanes to preferre him then Sertorius had but greater lets and impediments also, to hinder his rifing and estimation. For many openly stood against him, and secretly conspired his death : and not as Sertorius, whom no man contraried from the beginning, vntill his latter end, when certaine of his companions secretly conspired against him. Therfore Sertorius end of all his dangers, was to ouercome his enemies: where Eumenes greatest dangers came through his victories which he wan of his owne men, through the malice of them that enuied his honour. Now for their deeds of armes, they are both in maner alike: but on the other fide for their conditions, Eumenes naturally loued warre and contention, and Sertorius embraced peace and quietnesse. For Eumenes that might have lived in safety with honour, if he would but have given place to his betters, and for faken the warres; liked better with the daunger of his life to follow martiall feates, with the greatest personages of MACEDON, and in the end so came to his death. Sertorius contrarily being vnyilling to come in trouble, was forced for the fafety of his person to take armes against them that would not let him live in peace. For had not Eumenes been so ambitious and flour to strive against Antigonus for the chiefest place of authority, but could have been contented with the second. Anticonus would have been right glad thereof: where Pompey would never formuch as fuffer Sertorius to liue in rest. So the one made voluntarie warre onely to rule, and the other against his will was compelled to rule, because they made wars with him. Whereby it appeareth that Eumenes naturally loued warre, preferring the couetous defire of a better estate, aboue the fafety of his life; and the other as a right fouldier, yled the warres onely for a meane to fauchis life by valiant defence of armes. Furthermore the one was flaine, mistrusting no treason against him: and the other, looking enery houre for present death threatned him: Whereof the one argued a noble mind, not to mistrust them whom he thought his friends: and the other shewed a Sertorius faint heart, being taken when he meant to flie. So Sertorius death dishonoured not his life, suffering that of his owne companions, which his deadly foes could neuer make him suffer. The output the state of his owne companions, which his deadly foes could neuer make him suffer. ther having no power to avoide his destinie before he wastaken, and having sought meanes to death of liue being in prison and captiuity, could neither patiently nor manfully abide his death. For begging life at his enemies hands, he gaue him his heart with his bodie, who before had but his bodie in hispower. The end of Eumenes life.

him about all others of his estate, that he came to the dignitie and honour to commaund, hauing from his youth learned to obey. The which vndoubtedly was the cause, that he knew better then any other king, how to please and beare with his subjects, helping his royall state and princely behauiour grafted in him by nature, with that courtefie and familiaritie, which he had attained by education. At that time when he went in company with the boyes which were brought vp together, Lyfander fell in loue with him, wondering at the modesty of his wit. For hauing better spirit, and being more constant in his opinion than any of the other children, striuing euer to excell in all things, with such a vehemencie he tooke all trauels in hand, that it was vnpossible to ouercome him, much lesse to compell him. He was on the other side so mild and gentle, that every courteous word wrought in him better obedience then any feare could doe: because it grieued him more to be reproued, then to take vpon him any paine or labour. And for the deformitie of his legges, the one being shorter then the other, in the flower of his youth, through his pleasant wit, he vsed the matter so pleasantly and patiently, that he would merrily mocke himselse: which manner of merrie behauiour did greatly hide the blame of the blemish. Yea further, his life and courage was the more commendable in him, for that men faw that notwithstanding his lamenesse, he refused no paine nor labour. Of his person we have drawne no counterfeite, because he would not in any wife haue it drawne, and did expreshy command by his will, that they should neither draw his picture nor make any mould or image of his body Howbeit we find that he was small of stature, whereby his presence promised no great matters to them that beheld him. Yet for that he was ever merry and pleafant, and never penfive nor troublesome in word nor look, euen to the last end of his life he was better loued, then the most faire creature that lived. Not with standing, the Ephori (as Theophrastus writeth) did condemne king Archidamus in a summe of mony because he maried a little woman: saying that he would beget them demy kings, no kings indeed. In the time that his eldeft sonne Agis reigned king, Alcibiades being banished ATHENS, fled out of SICILE into LACED EMON, and had not long reecommuteth mained in Sparta before they suspected him that he kept king Agis wife, called Timea, for which cause Agis would not acknowledge the child she brought to be his sonne, saying that Alcibiades had begotten him. But Timea cared not much for it, as Duris writeth: for otherwhile as she sate amongst her women, softly she called him Alcibiades, non Levrychides. On the other side they report, that Alcibiades himselfe sayd, it was for no hurt be incant to any man, that he lav with Queene Timea, but onely for the defire he had that fonce of the kings of LACED ÆMON should be begotten of his feede. Neuerthelesse at the length he was driven to for sake LACED #-MON, mistrusting king Agis, who ever after doubted of the child, and thought him a bastard : vntill fuch time as being on his death bed, Leosychides falling on his knees, wept, and fo behaued himselse, that Agis before many witnesses, said he did acknowledge him for his sonne. This notwithstanding, when king Agis was dead, Lyfander that had then ouercome the ATHENIANS by sea, and was more in credit and authoritie in the citie of Sparta then any other, practifed to put the crowne vpon Agesilaus head, saying, that Leotychides had no interest vnto it, because he was a baftard. The like did divers other citizens fay of him, which loued Agefilaus vertue, and liked him paffingly; for that he had been brought vp from his childhood among them. But on the contrarie part also, there was a Soothsayer or wisard in Spart a called Diopithes, that had a number of old prophecies without booke, and was accounted a very skilfull man touching prophecies and divinations. He maintained that it was not lawfull for any lame man to be king of Sparta; and for proofe thereof he told this ancient oracle before the Councell. As stately as thy stomacke is, O Sparta take good heed, And stand upon thy guard, and looke about thee, I thee reed.

For halting one day downe will cast thine Empire to the ground, By meane of warres and troubles great that shall inclose thee round.

Lyfander replied against it, saying, that if the Spartans were afraid of this oracle, they should rather beware of Leotychides. For y gods cared not, if any man lame of a foot aspired to be king: but rather if he were a bastard, and not lineally descended of the race of Hercules. For that, said Agefilam he, were to make the kingdome halt. Agefilaus furthermore alleadged, that the god Neptune himproclaimed felfe had witnessed, that Leotychides was a bastard : for he draue Agis by an earthquake, to runne Leotychides out of his wives chamber, and that ten moneths after that, and more, Leotychides was borne. So abahard. was Agesilaus vponthese allegations not onely proclaimed king of Sparta, but he had given him moreouer, as lawfull heire, all his brother Agis goods, and Leotychides reiected as a baftard. Notwithstanding, considering that his parents by his mothers sidewere very poore(yet honest men)he left them the moitie of all the goods: by which act, Agefilaus wonne all their good wils, where elfethey had enuied him for his fuccession in the kingdome. And (as xenophon faith) by obeying his countrey, he grew to fuch power that he might do whatfoeuer he would. The Ephori and Senators at that time bare all the fway and gouernment of the commonwealth; the Ephores office changing yearely, the other being for life the which Ephori were onely ordained Ephori were to bridle the infolencie of the kings, for that they should not (as we have more amply written in seriaulto-Lycurgus life) haue absolute power in their hands. Vponthis occasion, the kings that succeded rised conin the government, had (as it were) by inheritance a present grudge and malice against them. troll the This notwithstading, Agesilaus took a contrary course to all his predecessors. For whereothers levels and presently quarelled with the Ephori and Senators, Agesilans did honour and reuerence them, inchine, if and would neuer dispatch any matter without their primitie, but was alwaics ready to goe when their yeld find him IXI has been feed. they did fend him. When he was fer in his chaire of frate to give audience, if any of the Ephori chanced to come in, he would rife vp vnto them: and at the election of any new Senator, he would for honours fake prefent him a gowne and an oxe. And thus cunningly feeming to honor and increase the dignity of the Senators, winning their good wils, he made his power great; and the realme much greater. Furthermore, his behauiour towards the rest of his countrimen was Agestilaus fuch, as his enmity was leffe faulty then his friendship. For he did neuer hurt his enemies without inst cause, but he aided his friends euen in vniust causes. And whereas he thought it a share even it an not to honour his enemies when they had done well, he could not find in his heart to rebuke a friend. his friends when they did amiffe, but rather gloried in fuccouring and helping of them in their euill doings. For he thought it no shame to serue his friendsturne, howsocuer it were. Againe, when any of his aduerfaries offended, he was as fory for it as any man, & as ready to be are with it if he were intreated; wherby he allured and wan the hearts of all men. The Ephorifeeing that, and fearing his power, punished him in money, for that he made the common loue of his countrey private to himself. For as naturall Philosophers hold opinion, that if contention and strife were taken out of nature, it would come to passe that the heavenly bodies should stand still, and also that the generation of all things should be at a stay, by reason of the mutual agreement be- whether tweene the world and them: even to, the law-maker of LACED AMON feemed to have allowed contention ambition and strife in the commonwealth, as a spurre to vertue, by procuring alwaies some contention and emulation among great persons. And his reason was that this base and effeminate problem. fauour, in winking one at another when men are to be rebuked, ought not of right to be called manufalls. by the name of concord. And fure fome think that Homer also faw the same, for he would never else haue made Agamemuon to haue rejoyced to see Viisses and Achilles at great words together, if he had not been of opinion, that enuic and contention among great men, were very availeable for the commonwealth. Yet is not this thus simply to be allowed: for contentions are hurtfull to cities, where they are violent, and do bring great dangers with them. Now when Agefilaus was entred into his kingdome of LACED EMON, newes were brought him out of As 1A, that the king of Perrsia prepared agreat nauy to conquer the Laced & Monians fignoric by fea. Lyfander being glad of this occasion, longing to be fent againe into As rato fuccour his friends whom he left there as gouernours and Lieutenants of cities and prouinces, (of the which, fome of them were driven away by their citizens, others also put to death for abusing of their authoritie, and ruling ouer cruelly, perswaded Agesilaus to go into As 1 A, to make war vpothis barbarous king, far from GREECE, before his army were gathered together. And to compaffe this the cafilier, he wrote vnto his friends in Asia, that they should fend vnto Sparta to require Agestlaus for their Captaine, and so they did. Therupon Agestlaus going to the assembly of the people, accepted the charge, with condition that they would give him thirtie Captaines of the SPARTANS to be counsellers and affistants to him in these warres, two thousands free Ir or Es, and 6000 of the confederates of LACED EMON. All this was immediatly granted through Lyfanders friedship towards him, and he was fent away straight with the thirty Captaines which he had requested: of the which Lyfander was the chiefest, not onely for his riches and authoritie, but also for the immersions good will he bare vnto Agefilaus: who thought himselfe more beholding to him for procuring .4fa. him this charge, then for his friendship he shewed him in bringing him to be king. Now Agestlaus army being affembled at the hauen of Gerestæ, himself with certain of his friends went vnto

the city of AVLIDE, where in his fleepe he dreamed that one faid vnto him: O king of the LA-CED EMONIANS, thou knowest that neuer none but Agamemnon, and now thy selfe, was chosen Generall of all GRECE: confidering therefore that thou commandest the same people he did. that thou makest warrs with the selfe same enemies, departing from the selfe same place to goe thither, it is reason that thou make the selfe same sacrifice vnto the godd esse, the which he made at his like departure. Agestlans straight vponthis vision, remembred that Agamemnon through the perswasion of the Soothsayers did sacrifice his owne daughter in the same place : yet this made him not afraid, but the next day he told it to his friends, and faid, he wold facrifice that vnto the goddesse, which he thought would please her well enough, and that he would not follow that cruell deuotion of this ancient Captaine Agamemnon. And with that, he brought a Hinde crowned with a garland of flowers, and commanded his Soothfayers to facrifice her; and would not suffer him to have the honour to do the facrifice that was appointed for the same purpose by the gouernours of Bo for 14 according to the custome of that place. The Gouernours of BOEDTIA vnderstanding it were much offended, and sent their officers to will Agesilans not to do any facrifice there, contrarie to the law and custome of their country. The officers that were fent, performed their commission; and finding that the beast was slaine, and the quarters of it vponthe altar, they tooke and flung them off the altar enery way. This vexed Agefilans, being ready to imbarke, and depart thence in choler against the THERANS, and mistrusted much his good successe by this valuckie prediction, which seemed to prognosticate vato him, that he should not preuaile according to his desire. Furthermore, when he was arrived at Ephesys, he presently misliked the honor he saw done vnto Lysander, and the great traine that waited on him. For all the countrimen there repaired continually to his house; and when he came abroad, they all followed him wherefoeuer he went; as though Lyfander had indeed been in authoritie to do what he would, and that Agesilaus only had but the name to be General, so appointed by the law of LACED AMON, For in truth there was never GRECIAN Captaine in those parts that had won him fuch estimation, nor that was more feared then he; nor there was neuer man that was more beneficiall to his friends, neither also that was more hurtfull to his enemies. All these things being freshin memory, the countrimen of that country perceining the simplicitie of Agesilans, and how he was given to please the people, and caried no great maiestic nor countenance with him, and observing in Lysander that wonted roughnesse and sharpe speech wherewith they had beene acquainted before; cuery man obeyed him, & nothing was done but what he commanded. This first of all made the other Spartan sangry, for that it appeared they were come as it wereto ferue Lyfander, and not as to counsell the king : but after that, Agefilaus himself also grew mifcontented, although of his owne nature he was not enuious, nor forieto-fee others honoured befides himfelf. Yet being a man ambitioufly giuen, and of a noble courage, fearing if he should do any noble exploit in this war, that they would impute it vnto Lyfander, for the great estimation he was of he began to deale in this fort with him. First he contraried all his counsels : and what matters soeuer he preferred, which he was desirous shold hauetaken essect. Agesilaus wold none of that, but tooke some other in hand. Furthermore, if any of Lysanders followers came to make fuite to him for his fauour, perceiuing that they did leane vnto Lyfander, he fent them away without any thing done for them. In like case also in matters of judgements, if Lysander were against any, they were fure to have the matter passe on their side. On the contrary part also, if Lysander bare good wil to the partie, and fauored the cause to gratifie him, they hardly escaped fro setting a fine on their heads, Agefilaus continuing these shewes ordinarily of purpose, not by chanceto one or two, but indifferently to all: Lyfander looking into the cause, dissembled not with his friends, but told the plainly, that it was for his fake they had those repulses & wrongs, and therfore did counsell them to wait vpon the king, and those that had more credit then himself. Now Sacrie Vie Agestlans supposed he gaue that aduice to make every man to malice him: wherfore, to despite him the more, he made him distributer of his victuals: & hauing done so, some say that he spake these words in open presence of many: Now let them go and honor my flesh distributer, Lysander being grieued withall, said vnto the king: My Lord, you know how to oppresse your friends. And so do I, said Agesilaus, how to keepe them vnder that would be greater then my selfe. It may be yet (replied Lysander) I haue not done as your Grace doth say: yet if you so conceine of me, put me I befeech you in some place of charge or office, where I may do you good service without offence. After this talke betweene them, Agefilans fent him into Hellespont, where AGESILAVS. 615 by practife he tooke prisoner anoble man a Persian, called Spithridates, out of Pharnabazus province whereof he was governor, and brought him to Agesilans with a great summe of gold and filter, and neare about two hundred horsemen with him. All this not with standing, he forgat not his grudge to Agelilaus, but being offended still, sought oportunity and means to defeate the two houses of the priviledge of the kingdome, and to bring it in common to all the other houses of Sparra, and furely he had made great broile (in my opinion) in the citic of Sparra, had he not been preuented by death, in a journey he made into Bo Fot 1A. Thus we fee, that ambitious minds observing no meane, are in a common weale of times more hurtfull then beneficiall. For Ambitions though Lyfander was indeed intollerable, to shew himselfe so ambitious, and out of time: yet beaders was not Agefilaus ignorant neither, that there were divers other meanes leffe reproachfull to punish such anoble man, that offended onely by greedinesse of honour. But to tell you my opinion they were both blinded with one felle passion; the one not to know his Princes power; and the other not to beare with his friends imperfection. Now Tifaphernes at the first being afraid of Agestlaus, made league with him, colourably letting him vnderstand that the king would be content to fet the cities of GRECE in ASIA at liberty:notwithstanding, when he thoughthe had gathered force sufficient to fight with him, he proclaimed war. Agefilaus was very well content withall; for the expectation was great of him through all GRECE, that he would do some noble exploit in his journey. Moreouer he thought himself dishonored for ever that the tenthous and GRECIANS which were returned back from the furthest part of Asia, even vnto the sea Maior (vnder the conduct and leading of Nenophon their Captaine) had our come the king of PER-SIAES armie as ofcas they lifted themselves; and that he which was the Lieutenant generall of the LACED AMONIANS (who at that time commanded both fea and land) should not do some deed worthy memoricamong the Grecians. Prefently therefore to reuenge Tifaphernes periury by iust deceit, he made a countenance as rhough he would first inuade the countrey of CA-RIA. Whereupon this barbarous person Tisaphernes gathered all his power together. But Age-deeds in Glaus on a Sudaine returned backe againe, and entred into Phryora, tooke there many cities, Afa, who and wan great spoile, making his men see by experiece, that to infringe and breake a league made fallhad of and anowed by oath, was a facriledge, & contemning of the gods. On the other fide alfo, that to beguile his enemies, it was not onely just and honourable, but also profitable and pleasant. Now Agefilans being weaker in horsementhan his enemies, and finding the liners of the beasts which he had facrificed, without heads, he returned into the city of Er HESVS, and there gathered horfmen together, letting the rich men vnderstand (which would not themselves serve in person) that he did dispence with their persons, so that they did set out a horse and man furnished for seruice in their place. Many of them took that course, and by this means Agestlaus within few daies had leavied a great number of men at armes, in stead of footmen that could do small service. For Azostan they that were vnwilling to go to the wars, did hire the that were willing to ferue in their place; eaft. and fuch also as would not ferue a horsebacke, did gine them pay that were defirous to serue in their steeds. In this he wisely followed king Agamemnons example, who did dispense with the person of a rich coward for going to the warres, by taking a good mare of him. Then Agestians commanded them that fold the prisoners by the drum taken in the warres, that they should strip them naked, and so fell them, which they did. And fundry persons willingly bought their spoils and raiment, but they fcorned their bodies, because they faw them white skinned, foft and delicate: for that few men would out-bid the price for them, for that they thought those men vnprofitable and good for nothing. Agefilaus also being present at this fale of purpose, said thus vnto his men: See, my friends, quoth he, these be the men against whom ye are to fight, and here be the spoiles for the which ye shall fight. Time being come now to put himselfe into the field, and to inuade his enemics countrey againe, he gaue it out that he would enter Lydia, not meaning to deceive Tisaphernes againe, but Tisaphernes deceived himselfe. For he being deceived before by Agefilaus, gaue no credit to this fecond rumor, but perfwaded himfelfe that doubtleffe Agefilaus meant then to enter into CARIA, and the rather for that it was a woody courty, very ill for horfmen, in the which he was the weaker. This notwithstanding, Agesilans inuading (as he had given Sardinsta it out) the champio country, in the which stood SARDIS the capitall citie of Lydia, Tisaphernes, cliefe city was copelled to come to refeue it in haft; and being comethither with great speed with his horf. of spia. men he ftole vpon many of his enemies whom he found stragling out of order, spoiling the contry, and put the most of them to the sword. Agesslaus having intelligence of this, imagined with

himselfe that the sootmen of his enemy could not yet be arrived, and considering also that he had his armie whole about him, thought it best forthwith to bid him battell, rather then to delay time any longer. Therupon he thrust in among the horsemen his light armed footmen, and commanded them fraight to charge the enemy, whileft he caused the heavier armed mento follow attheir heeles, as they did. But the barbarous people fled vpon it immediatly: and the GRE-CIANS luftily following the chafe, took their camp, and made great flaughter of them that fled. After this field foughten, they had leisure enough not only to spoile and ouerrun the kings country at their pleasure, but also to see the reuenge taken of Tisathernes, that was a vile mã, & a cruell refigures enemic to the Grecians. For the king of Persia made another his Lieutenant immediatly in his roome, called Tithraustes, who firake off Tisaphernes head, and sent vnto Agestlaus to pray him to take peace with them, and to offer him ftore of gold & filuer to depart out of his courty. Thereto Agestlaus answered, that for peace, it was not in him to make it, but in the LACEDEMO-NIANS; and that for his owne part, it was an easier matter to enrich his fouldiers then himselfe. And furthermore, that the GRECIANS thought it dishonor to them, to take any gift of their enemics, other then spoiles. This not with standing, to gratific Tithronftes somewhat, for that he had taken reuenge of a common enemy of al the GRECIAN s; for the fum of thirty takents given him to defray his charges, he withdrew his army out of Lydia, and went into Phrygia. In his jourmade Gene nev he received from the councel of LACED ALMON the Seytala or serole of parchmet wreathed about, aducrtifing him that the citizens had made him also their Generall by sea, as he was by land. Agefilaus onely of all men obtained this honour, who without comparison was of all other the worthiest man of fame in his time, as Theopompus witnesseth; and yet gloried rather to be commended for his vertue, then for the greatnesse of his authoritie. In this notwithstanding he was to be blanted, when he made choise of one Pifander his wines brother, to be Lieutenant of the natie, and forfooke other Captaines of better experience and elder yeares: seeking rather to please his wife, and to aduance one of his kinne, then to regard the weale and safety of his country. Afterwards he led his army in to Pharnaba us countrey which he had in charge, where he found not onely plenty of all forts of victuals, but gathered together also a wonderfull masse of money. From thence he went into the realme of PAPHLAGONIA, and made league there with king Cotys, who for his vertue and constant fidelitie was very desirous of his friendship. The like did Spythridates, forfaking Pharnaba Zus, and came vnto Igefilaus: & atter he was come to him, he neuer went from him, but alwaies followed him wherefoeuer he went. Spithridates had a yong fon that was passing faire, called Megabetes, (of whom Agesilans had great liking) and likewise a faireyoung woman to his daughter, of age to be maried, whom Agesilas caused king Cotys to marry Sotaking of king Cotys a thousand horsemen, and two thousand footmen light armed, he returned backe into PHRYGIA, and there destroyed Pharnabazus countrey which he had in gouernment, who durst not meete him in the field, nor trust to his holds, but still sled from him, carying all his chiefest things with him, slitting from place to place, vntill that Spubridates under accompanied with Erippidas the Spartan, followed him fo neare, that he tooke his campe, and of his zeros. all his treasure in it. But there did Erippidas shew himselfe so hard and cruell, ouer-straightly fearching out part of the spoile that had bin imbezeled, compelling the barbarous people to deliner it againe, ranfacking enery corner for it; that spithridates was fo offended withall, that on a Todaine he tooke the PAPHLAGONIANS with him, and went backe vnto the citic of SARDIS. This more grieued Agestlausthen any thing that happened to him in all his iourney, for that he had lost so valiant a man as Spithridates, and such a number of good souldiers as he caryed away with him. Moreouer, he was afraid left they would detect him of miserable couctousnes, a thing which he euer was carefull to avoid, not only in his owne person, but also to keepe all his countrimen from it. But besides these knowne causes, the loue he bare to Spithridates son pinched him nearely, though when the boy was with him, he striued with his owne nature to subdue that naughty affection and defire he had of him. For when Megabetes on a time came to make much of him and to kiffe him, Agefikus turned his face from the boy. The boy being ashamed of the repulfe, durst no more come so familiarly, but saluted him aloose off. Agesilans then repented him that he had not fuffered Megabetes to kiffe him, made as though he maruelled why he did not kiffe him as he was wont to do. Then answered some of his familiars about him: Your selfe, O king, is in fault, because you durst not tary, but were afraid to kisse so faire a boy : for if he knew your mind, he would come againe, fo that you turned your face no more away. When Agesilaus Angeliaus had heard them, he paused a while, and faid neuer a word, but in fine answered them. It shall not need you say any thing to him, for it would do me more good I could refuse such an other kisseagaine, then if all that I see before me were gold. Thus was Agesilans disposed when Megabates was with him: but in his absence he did so loue him, that I dare scantly say, that if the boy had come againe into his prefence, he would have refused a kiffe at his hands. After that, Pharnabazus fought to speake with him, and one Apollophanes a CYZICENIAN brought them together, that was a friend vnto them both. Agefilaus, was the first that met at the place appointed with his friends, and tarying for Pharnaba Tus comming, he laid him downe vpon the deepe Themest graffe in the shadow, under a faire great tree. Pharnabazus also came thither, and they spread soft and sufficient skins long haired, and tapestry excellently wrought, of diuers colours, for him to sit on vpon the and Pharground. But being ashamed to see Agesilaus laid on the bare ground in that fort, he also lay down makazus. by him, though he had vpon him a maruellous rich gowne, of excellent tiffue and paffing colour. Now when they had embraced one another, Pharnabazus began first to speake, and lacked no good perswasions & inst complaints, for that he having been (as he was) a friend vnto the LACE-DEMONIANS in the warre against the 'ATHENIANS, was then spoiled and sacked by them. Agesilaw then finding that the SPARTANS that were about him at that meeting, hung downe their heads for shame, not knowing how to answer him, considering that Pharnabazus had injurie offered him, began to speake in this manner: Heretofore when we were friends with the king (my Pharna-Lord Pharnabazus) we have vsed his goods like friends, but now that we are his enemies, like e- bazus nemics we vie them: and fince we fee that thou wilt needs be a flaue of his, maruell not though we hurt thee for his fake. But when thou shalt like rather to be a friend of the GRECIANS then a flaue to the king of Persia, then make account that all these souldiers, this armor, our ships, and all we, are to defend thy goods & libertie against him, without which, nothing that is honest can be looked for of mortall men. Thereupon Pharnabazas told him his mind plainly: Surely, faid he if the king do fend hither any other Captaine to be his Lieutenant, be fure I will then take your part straight; but on the other side, if he make me his Lieutenant in this war, trust to it, I will do him the best service I can against you. This answer passingly pleased Agesilans who taking him by the hand, and rifing vp with him, faid vnto him: I would wish (my Lord Pharnabazus) hauing so noble a mind as thou hast, that thou wert rather our friend then an enemie. So Pharnabagus departing from thence with his men, his sonne being left behind, ran to Agefilaus, and similing told him, King Agesilaus, I will make thee my friend; and therewith gaue him a dart he had in his hand. Agefilaus tooke it of him, and liking well the beautie of the young youth, and the courtefie he had offered him, looked about him if any man in his companie had any proper thing that he might bestow on him. At the last he spied his Secretarie Adens horse, which had a rich caparison on the straighttooke it from him, and gaue the horse and furniture to this lively youth Pharnabazus son, who neuerafter forgate it. For it chanced afterwards, that being driven out of his countrey by his brethren, and flying into Pelloponnesvs, Agefilaus made very much of him, and did not sticke to further him in his love abroad. For he had a great fancy and liking to a boy of Athens, whom they brought up in wrestling, one day to play for the best games. But when he was growne a big man and ftrong, and that he came to offer himselfe to be billed with them that should wrastle at the games Olympicall, being in some perill to be veterly refused; this decilars Persian that loued him, went vnto Agefilaus, and befought his helpe, that this wreftler might not receiue the foyle to be reiected. Agestlans being desirous to please him, performed his request with some difficultie. Thus Agesilans in all things else was a strict observer of the law: out respecta but in his friends causes to be straight laced in matters of instice, he said that was but an excuse friend, for them that would do nothing for their friends. To this effect, they find a letter of his written deleter in the vnto Idrian Prince of CARIA, for the deliucric of his friend. If Nicias haue not offended, let him behalfe of go; if he have offended, then pardon him for my sake: but how soeuer it be, let him go. This was Agefilaus maner in the most part of his friends causes. Notwithstading, occasions fell out often-other reads times, that he rather inclined to the benefit of the commonwealth. As appeared one day when whome pro he was driven to remove in haft on a sudaine, and to leave one sicke behind him whom he loved wife, dearely: the sicke man calling him by his name as he was going his way, besought him that he Agestian wold notforsake him. Agesilaus (as Hieronymus the Philosopher reported) turned backe againe sand said: O how hard is it, both to loue and to be wise! Now had Agesilaus spent two yeares retuen. in this warre, and was spoken of throughout Asia, being maruellously commended to the king himselse, for his great honestie, his continencie, his courtesse, and plaine dealing. For when he rode out into the countrey with his owne traine onely, he would ever lie in the holiest remples of the gods, because he would the gods themselves should be witnesses of his private doings; whereas commonly we are loth that men should see what we do. Furthermore, among st fo many thousand fouldiers as were in his camp, there could hardly be found a worse mattresse then that himselfe did lie vpon euery night. And as for heate and cold, he could as easily away with either of both, as if by constitution of bodie he had been borne to abide any weather and feason. But about all, it was a pleasant fight to the Greetans that dwelt in Asia, when they faw the great Lords, the kings Lieutenants of Persia (which before were proud, cruell, rich, and given to all lust and pleasure) to honour and feare a man that went vp and downe in a poore cape, being afraid of enery short word that he spake like a LACONIAN: insomuch as many of them called to mind the Poets verses, who said:

AGESILAVS.

As Mars hath no mercie, fo Greece Scorneth rold. Now all Asia being vp and in garboile, they willingly yeelded to him in energy place, after he had taken order with the cities, and had established the libertic of their commonweale, without any bloudshed, or banishment of any person; hee determined to go further into the land, and transporting the wars from the sea coasts of GRECE, to fight with the king of PERSIA in proper person, and with the wealth and happinesse of the Ecbatanians and the Svsianians, and by that means to take his leifure from him, who fitting still before, made the GRECTANS make war one with another, by force of money corrupting the governours of every citie. In the meane time came Epycidas LACONIAN vnto him, and brought him newes how Sparta was grieuoufly troubled with wars, enforced on them by the other GRECIANS: and that therefore the Ephoric did fend for him home, and commanded him to returne to defend his countrey.

Ab wretched Greece, how cruell staughters hast Thoubrought upon thee, for to lay thee wast?

For how should a man otherwise call this enuie, treason, and civill conspiracie among the GR E-CIANS, who ouerthrew their good fortune that made them happy before, turning their wars against the barbarous people out of GRECE, and now to bring it against themselves. I am not of Demaratus opinion the CORINTHIAN, that faid the GRECIANS delight was taken from them, which faw not Alexander the Great fitting in Darius royall throne; but rather I would think they should have wept to have left this honor vnto Alexander and the MACEDONIANS, fondly lofing fo many famous Captaines of GRECE, at y battels of Levetres, of Coronea, of Corinth and of ARCADIA. Neuerthelesse, Agestlaus neuer did better act in his life, nor euer shewed betobedience to ter example of obedience and inflice due to his countrey, then he did in his returne home. For fith Hannibal that began to have ill fuccesse in his warres, being in manner driven out of Ira-LIEsthought neuer (but compelled) to returne againe into his countrey, to obey his countreymen, which called him home to defend the warresthe Romaines had madeat their owne doores: and that Alexander the Great also being sent for home vpon the like occasion, did not onely refuse to returne into Macedon, but made a lest at it, when newes was brought him of the great battell which his Lieutenant Antipater had fought with king Agis, faying: Me thinkes when I heare these newes, whilest we are our coming of king Darius here, there hath beene a battell of Rattes fought in ARCADIA. Sith then (Ifay) these two famous Captaines haue made so litle account of their countrie, may we not thinke the citie of Sparta bleffed to haue had fuch a king, that fo much reuerenced his countrey and obeyed the law, as receiving onely a litle scrole of parchment commaunding him to returne, he for sooke a world of goods and wealth that he quietly enjoyed, (with affured hope and certaintie of more) and imbarked forthwith, leaving all the allies and confederates of his country very forrowfull, for that he had giuen ouer so noble an enterprise, which he had so happily begunne. Yes sure. Nay furthermore he passed notion the saying of Demostratus PH AACIAN, who said, that the LACED AMONIANS, in publicke matters were the worthiest men, and the Athenians in private causes. For as he had shewed himselfe a good king and an excellent Captaine to the Common wealth, fo was he alwaies courteous privately to his familiar friends. And because the Persian coine was stamped on the one side, with the print of an Archer; Agesilaus being ready to depart, faid, that ten thousand Archers draue him out of As IA. For so much was brought vnto THEBE & and ATHENS, and distributed among the Orators and Gouernours there, who through their

Orations made both those great cities to rise, and make warre against the Spartans. In his returne Agesilaus having passed the straight of HELLESPONT, tookehis way through the country of Thracia, and neuer intreated barbarous king nor people to suffer him to passe, but onely fent ynto them to know whether they would he should passe through their country as a friend, or an enemy. All countries and nations else received him very honourably to their power, saue the people called the THROCHALIANS, vnto whomking Xernes himselfe gaue presents that he Acellaus might passe friendly through their countrey: who sent vnto Agesilaus to demand a hundred silner talents, and a hundred women, to suffer him to passe through their countrey. But Agesilans deceining the barbalaughing them to fcorne, answered again; Why, how chanceth it that they came not themselves rous people, to receive them. So therewithall he marched forward against these barbarous people who were returned ranged in battel ray to stop his passage: howbeit he overthrew them, and slue a great number of through them in the field. The like demand he made vnto the king of Macedon, whether he should their country passe through his countrey as a friend, or an enemie. The king made him answer, he would "". confider of it. Well, lethim thinke of it, quoth Agefilaus: we will go on in the meane time. The king then wondering at his great boldnesse, and fearing lest he would do him some hurt as he went, fent to pray him that he would passe through his countrey as a friend. Now it chanced fo that the THESSALIANS at that time were in league with the enemies of the LACE-DEMONIANS: therefore as he passed through their countrey, he did spoile and forrage it as his enemies countrey, and sent Xenocles and Seythato the citie of LARISSE, hoping to perswade them to take part with the LACED AMONIANS. These two Ambassadours were retained there as prisoners. The Spartans were maruellously offended withall: and thought good that Agesilans should be siege LARISSE with his armie. But he answered them, he would not lose one of thosemen, to winneall Thessalle and therefore found meanes that he redeemed them againe by composition. Peraduenture this is not to be maruelled at in Agestlans, that newes being brought him on a time, that in a great battell fought by the citie of CORINTH, where were many worthy and valiant Captaines slaine of the enemies, & but few of the Spar-TANS, he seemed not to reioyce at it, but rather to fetch a grieuous sigh, saying: O poore GRECE, how vn fortunate art thou, to have flaine with thine owne hands fo many valiant Cap- Acellaw taines of thine owne people, asioyning together, might at one field have overcome all the overcame barbarous people. The Pharsalians harrying and troubling the rereward of Agestlans army, the Pharsalians, he put forth flue hundred horsemen which gaue them so lustic a charge, that he ouer threw them Marthaela by force. For this victorie, he set vp tokens of triumph vpon the mountaine called Narthacium, um mons. and this victorie pleased him aboue all the rest, because with the small number of horsemen which he had gotten together of himfelfe, he had ouerthrowne the glorie and pride of the encmies horlemen in battell, whereof they had vaunted many yeares before. Thither came Diphridas one of the Ephores vnto him, fent of purpose from Sparta, to command him immediatly to inuade Boeotia, with his armie. Now though Agefilaus intended fome other time with a greater power to enter Boeotia, yet because he would not disobey the counsels commandement of Sparta, he told his men straight, that the battell for the which they returned out of Asia was at hand, and therefore he fent for two companies of them which lay in campe by Corinth. The Laced Emonians that were at Sparta, to honour Agefilaus for that he had obeyed their commandement for eadily, proclaimed in the city, that as many young men as were desirous to goe aide the king, should come to enter their names. Notwithstanding, they onely chosebut fifty of the valiantest among them, and sent them vnto him. In the meane time, Agesilaus passed through the countrey of THERMOPYLES, and coasting over the land of PHOCIDE, confederates to the Laced EMONIANS, he entred into Bosoria, and camped by The scibile the citie of CHERONIA: where immediatly after his arrivall, he fuddenly faw the Sunne eclip- of the Sun. fed, and darkned in the fashion of a new Moone. Euen withall, came the newes of the death of Pifander, Pisander vnto him, who was flaine in a battell which he had lost by sea, fighting against Pharna- the name bazus and Conon, hard by the Ile of GNIDOs. These newes were very heavie vnto him, both for flaine in respect of the person his kinsman whom he lost, as also for the great losse that happened to the battell.

The tland commonwealth. Neuerthelesse, fearing his souldiers would be discouraged with the newes, of Gnides. and become faint-hearted, being ready to ioynebattell, he commanded them that came from the sea, to brute abroade a contrary tale to that they told him: and he himselfe to make good

the gods, as thanking them for the good newes, fending to every one of his friends a peece of flesh facrificed, as he commonly vsed to do, in any publike cause of ioy. The marching forward, he straight discovered his enemies farre off, and they likewise him : and thereupon put his men in battell ray, and gaue the left wing vnto the ORCHOMENIANS, leading himself the right wing. The THEBANS on the other fide, placed themselves in the right wing of their army, & gave the left vnto the AR GIVES. Xenophon being at that battell on Agefilaus fide, writeth that he neuer knew of the like field fought. At the first onset, the conflict was not great between e both, neither heldlong, because the THEBANS brake y ORCHOMENIANS straight, and Agesilaus the AR-GIVES. But whe either fide understood that the left wings of their battels were in great distresse and that they turned their backes, they returned suddenly againe. And where Agesilaus might cafily have had the victory without any danger, if he had fuffered the fquadron of the enemies to paffe by him, and afterwards to have charged the in the rereward: of a noble courage to fliew his valiant neffe, he gaue charge upon the yoward, to have honour in ouercoming them. The THEBANS on the other fide no leffe valiantly received him, & fought luftily on all hands: but the cruellest fight was about Agesslaus person, with the fiftie young menthat were sent to guard him, who showed themselves very valiant. Agestlaus was fore hurr, notwithstanding their valiant resiflance, his armour being paifed through with their pikes and fwords in fundry places: Whereupon they enuironed him round amongst them, and kept him from the enemies, killing a great number of them, and many of themselves also being killed. In fine, finding the THEBANS too firing in the yourd, they were forced to do that which they refused at the first and opening themselues, gauethem passage through them. So when they were passed them, the Spartans perceiuing how loofely & diforderly they marched, as thinking the felues out of all danger, followed them, and gaue charge youn their flanke. But all this could not make the THEBANS flic. for they rejoycing for their victorie atthis battell, retired faire and foftly vnto the mountaine Helicon. But Agefilans, notwithflanding he was verie fore hurr, with many a grieuous wound, would not go into his pauillion to be dreffed, before he had been first at the place where the bat-The simple tell was fought, and had feen his men that were flaine brought away in their armours. As many of Minerua of his enemies as were fled into the temple of Minerua Itonian, which was not farre from thence (where also were set up tokens of triumph offered unto her long time before by the Theedans. when they had ouercome the armie of the Athenians, under the conduct of Sparton their Captaine, and had flaine also Tolmides their Captaine in the field) he commanded his menthey should let them go where they would. The next morning by breake of day, Agesilaus desirous to see if the Thebans had any courage to come downe to fight againe commaunded his souldiers to put garlands vpon their heads, and his musitions to found their shalmes or pipes, whilest he did set up a token of triumph as victorious. Moreouer, his enemies sending to him to aske leaue to take away their dead men, he granted them truce for the time, and thereby confirmed his victorie. After that, being caried to the city of DELPHES, where the Pythian games were played, he made a folemne procession and common facrifice vnto Apollo, and offered him the tenth part of all his spoiles which he had brought out of Asia, which amounted to the summe of an hundred talents. This thing done, he returned into his countrey, where he was greatly honoured and effected of all his citizens and countrimen, for his orderly life and noble behaujors for he was no changeling, but the felfe fame man in state and condition that he was before he tooke his journey. He transformed not himself into strangers maners, as commonly other Captaines do, that returne out of a farre countrey where they have made wars : neither did he scorne his countrey fashons, or shewed himselfe disobedient to the lawes thereof, but alwaies kept and observed them, without any manner of alteration in his meate and drinke, in washing or bathing, in his wives apparell, in his armorie or any way else in his houshold stuffe, as if he had neuer passed ouer the river of Eurotas. Yet further, he left his old gates standing, that were of so great continuance, that they were thought to be those which Aristodemus had set up. Xenophon alfo faid, that his daughters Canathrum was nothing more fumptuous than any others were. A Canathrum in LACED EMON, is a kind of coach or chariot after the likeneffe of Griffins. Harts, or Goats: vponthe which they caried young wenches in folemne procession in the citic. Xenophon wrote not what was the name of this daughter of Agefilaus: and Dicearchus alfo was much offended, that they neither knew Agefilaus daughters name, nor yet the mother of Epaminondas. Yet we find in the LACONIAN Chronicles, that Agesilans wives name was Moreover, Agefilans speare is cleraste feene to this day in the citic of Sparta, even like vnto others, and no manner of difference. wfeefking Now Agaillaw perceiting certainecitizens of Sparta to fland upon their reputation, and effect. Again, and ming themselves above others, because they kept horse in their stable, perswaded his sister Frotzia Cynifcato fend her coach and coach-horses to the Olympian games to runne for the best prize, carghers. onely to let the GRECIANS fee, that it was no act of any vertue, but fimply of riches and coft. Furthermore having Xenophon the Philosopher about him, whom he loued, and made great Xenophon, account of he perswaded him to send for his somes to Laced mon, that they might be Justian brought vp there, where they flould learne the noblest science that men could possibly learne, to wit, to obey, and to command. When Lyfander was dead, Agefilaus at his returne out Thepratife of Asia, found a great faction and configuracie raifed by his meanes against him in Sparta: of Lifander of Lifande and because, it might appeare what manner of citizen Lylander was when he liued, he was ration of co likely to have openly shewed and declared an Oration which he found among his writings werkness. (the which the Orator Cleon Halicarnaffeus had written for him, and Lysinder should have cunned without booke, to have spoken in open assembly) that was to stirre innovation, and in manner have made a change of the whole government of the common wealth of Lace-DAMON. Howbeitthere was a grave Counfellour that having read the Oration, and doubting Themife the apparant reasons and pertivations alleadged, told him, that he would wish him not to plack Senater at vp the dead againe out of his grane, but rather to bury this Oration together with his bodie. Sparta. Agefilaus liked the counfell, and proceeded no further. And for them that either were, or had been his enemies, he did them no hurt openly: but found the meanes to make fome of them to be fent as Lieutenant of armie, or otherwife to have charge in the warres. In fine, he made it o win his penly knowne, what couetous and wicked men they had been in their charges: fo that when enemies. they were accused of it before the councell, he would then helpe and intreate for them. By this meanes he made them againe his friends, where they had been his enemies: infomuch as in the end end end end end, he had not one enemie at all. For the other king Agefipolis his colleague, whose father had pain line been banished, he being a very young man, and of gentle nature, medled not greatly with of Laceda government of the common wealth. Neuertheleffe, he so behaved himselfe vnto Agesilaus that he made him his verie good friend: for both the kings when they were in the citie, did cate together in one hall. Then Agestlaus knowing that Agestpolis (as himselfe) was ginen to loue, would euer minister talke to him of the goodly young boyes of the cirie, enticing him to loue fome one of them, which he himselfe did loue: and therein he was both his companion and helper. For in these LACONIAN loues there was no manner of dishonestie offered, but a true affection and honest regard to frame the boy beloued vnto vertue and honest conditions: as we have more amply declared in the life of Lycurgus. Agestlaus by this meanes, having the whole authoritic (about all men in the citie) in his hands, made his halfe brother Teleutias Generall by sea, and himselfe with the army by land went to bessege the citie of Co-RINTH, where with his brothers helpe by fea he took the long wals of the fame. The ARGIVES she made which kept Corint atthattime, at Agefilaus arrivall there, were folemnizing the feast of the the amount Ifthmian games who made them flie, even as they came from facrificing vnto the god Neptune, Jea. driving them to leave all their preparation and folemnitic. Then divers banished men of Co-RINTH that were in his army, befought him that he would keepe these Isthmian games; but he denied them, yet was contented they should themselves solemnize them; and so himselfe remained there, during the time of the feaft, for their fafety. Afterwards when Agefilaus was gone thence, the Angives returned, and did celebrate the Isthmiangames, and there were some of them which having wonnethe game at the first, did also winne it at the second time; and others that were victors before, were this fecond time ouercome. Whereupon Agefilans faid, that the Argives shewed themselves ranke cowards, that esteeming so much (as they did) these playes and facrifices, they durst not once offer to fight with him for defence of the same. For himselfe, touching such like sports and games, he euer thought it good to keepe a meane, and not to be too curious. For he was contented to honour such solemne assemblies and common feasts with his presence, as were commonly vsed in Sparta, and tooke great pleafure to fee the sports betweene the young boyes and girles of Sparta: howbeittouching the games, he feemed not to be acquainted with fome of them, wherein others had great delight. power) by his iuftice, as by the beame of princely ballance. When peace was concluded, the king of Pensia having fent him a private letter defiring his friendship, Agestlans refused it, saying:

that common friendship was inough betwixt them, and that they should need none other, to long as that was kept. But this notwithstanding, when it came to the point of performance, he went from his first good opinion, and gaue place to his will and ambition, specially against the

THEBANS, at that time when he did not onely faue Phabidas, but also procured the city of Spar-

TA to take the fault vpon them which he had committed, and to inflifie it, by keeping the castle of Cadmea still, and making Archias and Leontidas Gouernors of the citie of THEBES, by whom Phabidas came by the castle of Cadmea, and possessed it. Thereupon enery man thought ftraight, that Phabidas was he that had put the matter in execution, but that Agefilans gaue the counsell to do it: as things falling out afterwards, did manifestly proue the suspition true. For, after that the Therans haddriuen the garrifon of the LACED EMONIANS out of the castle of Cadmea, and restored their city againeto libertie, burthening them that they had trayteroufly flaine Archias and Leontidas (who indeed were tyrants; though in name Gouernours) he made warre with them and Cleombrotus, reigning then king with him after Agespolis death, more to the wars, by reason of his age, for that he was fourty yeares old from the first growth of haire on his face, & therfore went not that iourney being ashamed that the THEBANS shold now fee him fight to reuenge the tyrants deaths, who had but a litle before taken armes for the banithed men, against the Phliasians. At that time there was a Laconian called Sphodrias, of the the hauen of Pirma, fuddenly stealing vpon the Athenians by land, cutting them off by that meanes from all trade by sea. It was thought commonly that this was a practise deuised by Pelapidas and Gelon, Gouernours of BOEOTIA, who had allured certaine mento faine themselues very denoutand friendly to the Laced Emonians. These men praising and extolling sphodrias to his face, put him in the head that they knew none fo worthy as himselfe alone, to take in hand so noble an enterprise. Thus by their perswasions they trained him onto this attept, which for vilenesse was nothing inferiour vnto that treacherous winning of the castle of Cadmea at Thebesialthough it was attempted with lesse hardines and diligence. For day was broken whe he was yet in the plaine of Thriasivm, where he made account to have bin at the wals of Pi-ræa by night. Furthermore it is reported, that the men he brought with him, seeing certaine fires from the temples of the city of ELEVSIN, were all afraid and amazed: yea he himself also fainted perceiving he was discovered, and so returned backe with shame and dishonour to the citie of THESPIES, without any exploit done, fauing only a litle spoile taken. Therupon accusers were vnto them to condemne him of high treason. But he durst not returne to Sparta, fearing the furic of his countrimen, thinking indeed that they would feeme as though the wrong had been done to them, because it should not be thought that they had caused it to be done. This

GRECIANS for a fingular man in that art) meeting Agefilaus on a time, at the first did his duty to him, and then arrogantly thrust himselfe among them that walked with him, thinking the king would have made much of him : but perceiving he made no countenance to him, in the end he asked him: O king Agestlaus, do you not know me: Agestlaus looking voon him, anfwered: What, art not thou Callipides the stage player; and so made no further account of him. Another time being defired to heare a man that naturally counterfeited the nightingales voice. he would not heare him, faying, I have oftentimes heard the nightingale it selfe. Another time also when Menecrates the Physitian (having by good fortune cured adesperate disease) called himfelfe Inpiter, and arrogantly vsurped that name, prefuming in a letter he wrote vnto Agest-* Meaning laus, to subscribe it in this manner, Menecrates Iupiter, vnto king Agesilaus, greeting: Agesilaus wrote againe vnto him, Agesilaus vnto Menecrates * health. So, whilest Agesilaus was in the territorie of Corinth (where he had taken the temple of Iune) beholding his fouldiers for raging and spoyling the countrey round about, Ambassadours came to him from THEBES, to pray him to make peace with the THEBANS. But he that alwaies hated the THEBANS, and besides that thought it then verie requifite for the good fucceffe of his doings, to make light of it, seemed as he neither heard nor faw them that spake vnto him. But even at that very instant, as by divine reuenge to cry quittance, there fell a great mishap vpon him: for before the Ambassadours were gone from him, he had newes that one of their bands called the Mothers, were slaine enery man by Iphicrates: which was the greatest losse that they in long time before had sustained. For they loft a great number of valiant fouldiers, all naturall LACED EMONTANS: who being well armed cuery man, were flaine by naked or light armed hirelings. Thereupon Ageflaus went straight into the field with hope to saue them, or at the least to be reuenged; but receiuing certaine intelligence by the way that they were all flaine, he returned against to the temple of Iuno from whence he came, and then fent for the Ambassadours of the BOBOTIANS, to give them audience. But they, to requite his former distaine vnto them, made no manner of speech of peace, but onely requested him to suffer them to enter into Coninth. Agestlaus being offended, answered them: If it be to see your friends triumph of their victorie, ye may safely do it to morrow. Thereupon the next morning taking the Ambassadours with him, he destroyed the Corinthians country, eventothe wals of their citie. And when he had made the Ambaffadours fee, that the citizens of Corinth durft not come out into the field to defend their countrey, he gaue them leaue to depart. Then taking the remaine of that band that was ouerthrowne, which by flight had escaped, be brought them into LACED AMON againe, alwaies remouing his campe before day, and neuer encamped till darke night, because the ARCADIANS (their mortall enemies) should not rejoyce at their losse. After this voyage, to gratisfie the A-CHAIANS, he entred with them into the countrey of ACARNANIA, and brought great spoyles from thence, after he had ouercome them in battell Moreouer, when the Achaian's belought him to remaine with them all the winter, to keepe their enemies from fowing of their ground, he made them answer, he would not For, faid he, they will be afraid of warre the next yeare, when all their fields shall be fowen with corne; and so indeed it came to passe. For the army returning againe, they made peace incontinently with the ACHAIANS. About that time, Pharnabaxus and Conon, with the king of PERSIAE'S armie, being Lords of the fea, without let of any destroiced and spoiled at the coast of Laconia. Moreover, the city of Athens did reare up her wals againe by the helpe of Pharnabazus money, wherewith he had furnished them. Thereupon the LAGED EMONIANS thought good to make peace with the king of PERSIA, and to that end fent Antalcidas Ambassador vnto Tiribazus, most shamefully and cruelly betraying to the king, the GRECIANS inhabiting in Asia, for whofelibertie Agefilans had made warres with him before. So, it was Agelilaus hap not to be foiled with any part of this shame; for Antalcidas that was his enemie, fought all the meanes he could to conclude this peace, for that he faw warre did dayly increase the authoritic, honour, and fame of Agesilaus. Notwithstanding, he answered one of them, that reproued him for that the LACED EMONIANS did fauor the MEDES: NO, faid he, they do not fo, but the MEDES do play the LACED EMONIANS. Neuertheleffe, threatning warre to all the GRECIANS, which would not agree to the conditions of this peace, he compelled them to yeeld vnto that y king of P B R S I A liked. But furely he did this chiefely for respect of the THEBANS, to the end that they being enforced by the capitulations of the peace, to let the countrey of Bo a o T 1 a at libertie againe, should be so much the weaker. This plainly the other GRECIANS (and the SPARTANS themselves also not being very well pleased withall, Phebidas and those specially which were Agestlaus enemics) Phabidas being asked in great anger, at whose the castle of commandement he had done that fudden enterprife, to lay all the suspition of the fact vpon Cadman. him, Agesslaus for Phabidas discharge, letted not openly to say, that the qualitie of the fact was to be confidered of, whether it were profitable for the commonwealth, or not,: and that it was well done of him, the thing falling out profitable for his country, to do it of his owne head withoutcommandement. All this not with standing he was wont to say in private talke, that instice was the chiefest of all vertues, and therefore that valiantnesse without instice was of no validitie. Agestian and that if all men were inft, valiant nesses were of no estimation. And to them that told him, the greatking will have it fo: Why, faid he, and wherein is he better then my felfe, if he be no inftere-

Sphodrias had a sonne called Cleonymus, a very faire boy, with whom Archidamus (Agestlans fonne) was farre in loue; who then was maruellous forrie to fee this boy he loued, in fo great danger to lose his father, and yet durst not be seene to helpe him, because Sphodrias was one of Agefilans adverfaries. Notwithstanding, Cleonymus making his mone to him with the teares in his eyes, and praying him to pacifie his father Agefilaus, (whom they feared about all men elfe) Archidamus followed his father three or foure dayes together, and durft not breake the matter to him in fine, the day of the next fession being at hand, when judgement should be given of Sphodrias, he boldly ventured to tell him, how that Cleonymus had prayed him to be an humble futer to him touching his fathers fact. Agefilaus vnderstanding that his sonne loued Cleonymus, would not withdraw him from louing him, because the boy even from his childhood gave alwayes good hope that one day he would fure make as honeft a man as any other who foeuer: neither made he any countenance to his fonne, as though he would do any thing at his fuite, but onely answered him, for that, he would doe as became him in such a case. Whereupon Archidamus being bashfull, left comming any more to Cleonymus, where before he would see him oftentimes in a day. This made sphodrias friends despaire of his life more then before, vntill Etymocles, one of Agesslaus familiars talking with them, told them that for the fact it selfe. Agesilans thought it a shamefull deed, and as much misliked it as might be: but for Sphodrias selfe, that he tooke him for a valiant man, and faw that the common wealth had neede of men of fuch feruice. This was Agefilaus commontalke to please his sonne, when any man came to speak to him of Sphodrias accusation. Insomuch that Cleonymus found straight how Archidamus had dealt as faithfully and friendly for him as might be; and then Sphodrias friends also tooke heart againe vnto them, to folicite his cause, and to be earnest suters for him. A gestians among other had this endered bis speciall propertie, that he loued his children dearly: and a tale gooth of him, that he would play with them in his house when they were little ones, and ride vpon a little cock-horse, or a reed, as on horsebacke: insomuch as a friend of his taking him one day with the maner, playing among his children, he prayed him to fay nothing, till he had litle children himfelfe. In fine, Sphodrias was quit by his ludges. The ATHENIANS vnderstanding it, sent to proclaime warrewith the LACED EMONIANS. Wherupon Agestaus was much reproued, because that to please the fond affection of his fonne, he had hindered inflice, and brought his citie to be accused among the GRECIANS for fuch grieuous crimes. Agefilaus perceiuing that king Cleombrotus his companion Went with no verie good will to make warre with the THEBANS, he breaking the order fet downe for leading of the armie, which was kept before, went to the warres himfelfe in person, and fo inuading Borotia, he both received and did great hurt. Whereupon Antalcidas feeing him hurt one day, Nowtruly (faid he) the THEBANS have payd you your deferued hire, for teaching them against their will to be souldiers, that neither had will nor skill to fight. For indeed they fay the THEBANS became better foldiers and warriors than they were before, being dayly trained and exercised in arms through the continual inuations of the LACED EMONIANS. Alfothis was the reason, why the old father Lycurgus his lawes called Rhetra, did forbid them to make warre too oft with one selfe people, because that by compulsion they should not be made expert fouldiers. Forthis cause did the confederates of LACED EMON hate Agestlans, saying, that it was not for any knowne offence to the state, but for very spice and private malice of his owne, that he fought to vindo the Thebans in this manner: and that to follow his humor, they confumed themselues going yearely to the warres one while this way, another while that way, without any necessity at all, following a few LACED EMONIANS, themselves being alwaies the greater number. Then it was, that Agefilans defiring to make them see what number of men of warre they were vied this deuice. On a time he commanded at the allies to fit down together one with another by themselves, and the LACED EMONIANS also by themselves. The he made a Herauld proclaime that all pot-makers should stand up on their secte. When they were up, he neffect the made them cry to the Brafiers to rife also. After them in like manner, the Carpenters: then the Masons, and so consequently all occupations one after another. So that at the length the consederates obeying the proclamation, were all in manner on their feete. The LACED EMONIANS, not one of them role; because all base mechanicall crafts were forbidden them to occupie. Then Agefilans laughing at them: Lo, my friends (faid he) do you not fee now that we bring moe fouldiers to the field than ye do. At his returne from this journey of THEBES, paffing by the city of MEGARA, as he went vp into the councell-house within the castle, there suddenly tooke him a great crampe in his left leg, that fwelled extremely, and put him to great paine, menthinking that it was but bloud which had filled the veine: a Physitia of Syracvsa in Sicile being there, straight opened a veine under the ankle of his foot, which made the paine to cease; notwithfrading there came fuch abundace of bloud, that they could not franchir, for that he fwounded off, and was in great danger of prefent death. In fine, a way was found to frop it, and they caried him to LACED EMON, where he lay ficke a long time, for hat he was past going to the warresany more. The Spartans in the meane time received great overthrowes both by fea and land, and among other, their greatest ouerthrow was at the battell of Levetrees, where the THEBANS outcrame and flue them in plaine battell. Then the GRECIANS were all of one mind Examinor. to make agenerall peace, and thereupon came Ambassadours and Deputies from all the cities Thebassem of GRECE, and met at LACED AMON to that end. One of these Deputies was Epaminondas, a The hange notable learned man, and a famous Philosopher, but as yet vnskilfull in warres. He seeing how dernited the other Ambaffadors curried fauor with Agefileus, only he of the reft kept his gravity to fpeak estenon. freely, and made an Oration, not for the THEBANS alone, but for all GRECE in generall, declaring to them all, how warrs did only increase the greatnesse and power of the citie of Sparta. and contrarily did minish and decay all other cities and townes of GRECE; and for this cause, that he did counsel them all to conclude a good and perfect peace indifferently for all to the end it might continue the longer, when they were all alike. Ageflaus perceiving then that all the GRECIANS prefent at the affembly gaue him good care, and were glad to heare him speake thus boldly ofpeace, asked him openly, if he thought is meete and reasonable, that all BOEOTIA should be set cleare at libertie againe ? Epaminordus presently and boldly againe asked him, if he batters de batters de thought it inst and requisite to set al LACONIA cleare againe at libertie? Agesilans being offended which and therewith, stood up on his feer, and commanded him to answer plainly whether they would fet all Boforia at liberty or not Epaminondas replied vnto him with the felfe speech againe, and liberties asked him whether they would fer all Laconia at liberty or not? That netled Ageflians fo, that Booms, (being also glad of such a cloake, for the old grudge he euer bare vnto the THEBANS) he prefently put the name of the Thebans out of the bill of those which should have been comprised within the league, and cried open warres upon them in the market place. For the rest he licensed the other Deputies and Ambassadors of the people of Grece to depart, with this conclusion, that they should louingly take order among themselues for the controversie betwist them, if they could peaceably agree together, & they that could not fall to fuch agreement, that then they should try it by warrs, for it was a hard thing to take vp all quarrels among them. King Cleombrotus by chance was at that time in the country of Phocida with his army, vnto whom the Ephori wrote, that he should forthwith spoile the Theban's country; and therwith also they sent to all their confederates to come and aide them, which had no great fancy to the journey, and were loth to make war with them, but yet durft not refuse to go, nor disobey the Lace be Emo-NIANS. And notwithstanding that there were many signes presigning ill lucke, as we have written in the life of Epaminondas, and that Prothous LACONIAN was against the enterprise of this warre allthat he could, Agefilaus would needs forward, hoping he had now found oportunity to be reuenged of the THEBANS, fith all GRECE befides was in peace & at liberty, themselves only exempted from treatic of peace. If there had been no other thing in it but the very shortnesse of time, that made it manifest enough that this warre was begun in a geere, without any manner of reason. For the generall peace amongst the GRECIANS was concluded at SPARTA the foure- The Laceteenth of May, and the LACED EMONIANS were ouercome at the battell of LEVETRES the flaine at the fifth of Iune: foas there was but twentie dayes betweene them. There were flaine a thou-bastellef fand LACED EMONIANS with their king Cleombrotus, and the choicest and the valiantest SPAR - Combro TAN'S about him. Among them was also flaine that goodly young man Cleonymus, Sphodrias tus King of fonne, of whom we spake before: who having been beaten downe thrife at the kings foote, the Lacede. three times got vp againe, but at the length was flaine, valiantly fighting against the THEBANS. butrather more, ought noblemens words to be weyed, and their countenances marked, as well in aduersitie as in prosperitie. At that time by chance there was a common feast day in the citie of Sparta, which was full of strangers that came to see the daunces and sports of them that shewed naked in the Theater, when as the messengers arrived that brought the newes of the battell loft at Lever Res. The Ephori knowing then that the rumor flraight ran all about, that they were all vindone, and how they had loft the figniorie and commaundement ouer all GRECE. would not suffer them for all this to breake off their daunce in the Theater, nor the citie in any thing to change the forme of their feast; but sent vnto the parents (to every mans house) to let them understand the names of them that were slaine at the battell, they themselues remaining still in the Theater to see the daunces and sports continued, to judge who caried the best games away. The next morning when every man knew the number of them that were flaine, and of those also that were escaped, the parents and friends of them that were dead, met in the market place, looking chearefully of the matter, and one of them embraced another. On the other fide, the parents of them that escaped, kept their houses with their wines, as folke that mourned. If any of them also had occasion to go abroad out of their houses for any matter of necessitie, ye should see him looke so heavily and fad, that he durst not talke with you, lift vp his head, nor looke ye in the face. Befides all this, even amongst the women there was greater difference: for the mothers of them that were to returne from the battell, were fad and forrowfull, and spake not a word: contrarily, the mothers of them that were slaine, went friendly to visite one another, to rejoyce together. Now when the people saw that their confederates b. gan to for sake them, and did daily looke that Epaminondas glorying in his victorie, would inuade Peroponness, then they began to be pricked in conscience about the Oracles of the gods, thinking that this misfortune came to their city for that they had thrust out of the kingdomea man perfect of limmes, to place an impotent perfon, being specially warned by the gods to beware of that about all things. This not with standing, they had him in such veneration for his valiantnesse, and his authoritie was such thereby, that they did not onely vse him in warre as their king and soueraigne Captaine, but in civill causes also, wherein there rose any question, they euer vsed his counsell and aduice: as they did, when they durst not punish them (according to the penall lawes) that fled from the battell, whom they call at Sparta Tresantas(being a great number of them, and men of the noblest houses, and of greatest power within the citie less they should moue some stir or commotion among them. (For by law, they can beare no office in the common wealth: it is shame and reproch to give them any wives, and alforo marry any of theirs:whofocuer meeteth them, may lawfully strike them, and they must abide it, and not give them a word againe: they are compelled to weare poore tottered cloth gownes, patched with cloth of divers colours; and worst of all, to shave one side of their beards. and the other not.) Whereupon, finding the danger great to deale with them, to execute the law according to the infamie they deserved, specially then standing in need of a great num. ber of men of warre, they referredthemselues altogether unto Agesilaus, to take such order in it as he thought good: but Agesilans then, without changing or altering any thing of the law, faid in open affembly at LACED EMON, that for that day they should let the law alone, notwithstanding, that afterwards it should stand in force. By this policie he kept the law inuiolate, and faued also the honor of those pooremen; and withall, to put these youths againe in heart, being amazed with this feare, he led the armie into the countrey of ARCADIA, and would give no battell, but only tooke a small citie of the Mantineans, and for aged the country. This againe did a litle reviue the city of Sparta with some hope, to make that it should not veterly despaire. But shortly after, Epaminondas inuaded the country of LACONIA with fourty thousand footmen wel armed, besides an infinite number of other light armed, and naked people, that followed his campe for the spoile; so that in all, there were about threescore and ten thousand fighting men that came in with him to inuade LACONIA. It was wel neare fixe hundred yeares fith the Doria ANS possessed LACED EMON, and in all that time till then they never saw enemies in their country that durst inuade them: but then they facked and burnt all that came in their way, euen vnto the river of Euroras, and hard adioyning vnto Sparta, & no man durst come out to refist them. For Agefilans (as Theopompus writeth) would not fuffer the LACED EMONIANS to goe out to his inagainst such a tempest and furie of warre; but having fortified the middest of the citie, and goarded enery end of the streetes with souldiers, he patiently bare all the bragges and threats of the THEEANS, which challenged him out to fight, and bade him come into the field to defend his countrey, that onely was the cause of all these their calamities, having himselfe procured this warre. If this went to Agefilans heart, no leffe gricuous were those troubles to him that rose within the city: as the cries and running to and fro of the old men, which were mad to fee that they did before their eyes: and of filly women also, which no ground nor place could hold, but ranne vp and downe as straught of their wits, to heare the noise the enemics made, and to fee the fire which they raifed all the fields ouer. Much more forowfull also did this make him, when as he bethought himselfe, that entring into his kingdome at such time as the citie of Sparta was in greatest prosperitie that cuerit was, he now saw his honour eclipsed, and the glory of his kingdome overthrowne: and the rather, for that himselfe had often vaunted, that LACONIAN women had neuer feen the smoake of any enemies camp. And as they say of Antalcidas one day, that he answered an Athenian that contended with him about the valiantnesse Certains of one anothers nation, alleadging for himselfe, that the ATHENIANS had often driventhe La- will an CED EMONIANS from the river of Cephifus: It is true, faid the LACONIAN; but we did neuer fivers. drive you from the river of Eurotas. The like answer made a meane man of Sparta, to one of the Argives that cast him in the teeth, There are divers of your LACONIANS buried in the countrey of Argolide: So are there none of yours, said he, buried in Laconia. It is reporred, that Antalcidas being one of the Ephori at that time, did secretly send his children into the Ile of CITHERA, fearing left the city of SPARTA should be taken, Agestians perceining that the enemies forced to passe ouer the river to enter the citie, he stood to defend the middle part of the citie, being the highest place of the same, and there had his menset in order of battell. Now at that time, by chance the river of Eurotas was swelled greater then of ordinarie, by reason of the fnow waters that fell abundantly: which troubled more the Therans with the coldnesse, then roughnesse of the same in passing it ouer. Some shewing Agestlans how Epainmendas marched formost before his battell, he beheld him a great while, and his eye was neuer off him, saying neuera word but this onely: Oh, what a noble fellow is that ? Epaminondas having done all that he could possible to give the LACED EMONIANS battell, even within the citie selfe of Sparta, that he might there have fet vp some tokens of triumph, he could never entice Agesilaus to come out of his fort: wherefore he was driuen in the end to depart thence, and fo went to destroy all the rest of the countrey. There fell out a conspiracie of two hundred men in Sparta, who of mon under long time had had an ill meaning with them, and took that quarter of the citie where the temple of Dianastood, called Issorium, a place of strong situation, and ill to distresse. Hereupon the LACED EMONIANS in fury would straight hanciet vpon them. But Agestlaus fearing great mu- of Diana. tinie and stirre vpon it, commanded that no man should stirre; and himselfe vnarmed, in a poore gowne went thither, crying out to them that had taken that strength: Sirs, ye have not obeyed prehend the my commandement, this is not the place I appointed you to affemble in, neither all of you trailors. in one place; for I willed you to disperse your selves, some one way, some another way, shewing them the quarters of the citie. The traitors hearing these words, were glad, as thinking that their intent was not bewraied: and so leaving that strength, went into those parts of the citie that he had shewed them. Agesilaus then bringing others thither, possessed the fort of Islorium, and tooke fifteene of those conspirators, and put them to death the next night following. Howbeit then there brake out another conspiracie farre greater then the first, of the Spar-TANS themselves, which were secretly gotten together into a house, to make some sudden stirre and garboile; and to punish them in so great atrouble, it was hard: on the other side to neglect it, the confpiracie was ouer-dangerous. Agefilans having confulted with the Ephori, did put them allto death, without any judgement of law: where neuer Spartan before them suffered death, without due order of law. Againe, whereas diuerse of their neighbours, and of the I-LOTES themselues (whom they had billed in their bands of souldiers) stole away and ranne to their enemies, which did much discourage them that remained: he warned his men that they ture of the should every day go to their couches where they lay, and that they should take aw my their ar- Thebanous mour that were fled, and hide it, because they should not know the number of them that were of Laconia. fled in this fort. Now for the departure of the Thebans, fome fay that they went out of La-CONIA by reason of the winter that came on, whereupon the ARCADIANS discharged their bands, and euery one departed his way in disorder. countrey. Theopompus writeth notwith standing, that the Captaines of the THEBANS having determined to depart, there came one Phrixus a Spartan vnto them, fent from Agefilaus, who brought them tentalents that they should depart out of their countrey. Thus had they money given them to defray their charges homewards, to do that, which they themselves had long before determined to have done. And yet do I wonder, how it is possible that all other historiographers knew nothing of this, and that Theopompus onely could tell of it. All do acknowledge truly, that Arefilaus onely was the caufe that the city of Sparta was faued: who leauing his ambition and felfe will, being paffions borne with him, did wifely forefee their fafety. Neuerthelesse, after this great ouerthrow, he could neuer raise Sparta againe to her former greatnesse. For like as a whole bodie, which having acquainted it felse continually with a moderate diet, with the least disorder doth surfeit presently, and so putteth all in danger: even so Lyourgus having framed a perfect state of government in the common wealth of Sparta, to make her citizens liue in peace and amitie together; when they did enlarge it by great kingdomes and realmes, the which the good law-maker thought vnmeete to continue happie life, they were straight ouerthrowne, and all went to wracke. By this time Agesilaus was growne old, and could no more go to the warres for very age : but his fonne Archidamus, with the aide Ane reare-left battell which Dionyfius thetyrant of Syracvs a fent vnto them, wanne a battell against the Arcaof Arthida- DIANS, called the Tearlesse battell; for there died not one of his men, and they slue agreat number of their enemies. This victoric plainely shewed the great weaknesse and decay of the city of Spanta. For in former times it was fo common athing vnto them to ouercome their enemies in battell, that they did facrifice nothing elfe to the gods in token of thankes, within the citie, but a poore cocke : and they that had fought the battell, made no boast of it, neither did they that heard the newes greatly reloyce atit. For when they had wonne that great battell at the citie of MANTINEA, which Thurydides describeth, the Ephori onely sent the messenger that brought the newes, for reward, a peece of powdered meate, and no other thing. But then when newes was brought of this victorie, and that they understood Archidamus came home victorious, neither man nor woman could keepe the citie, but the father himselfe went first of all to meete him, with theteares in his eyes for ioy, and after him all the other magistrates and officers of the citie; and a fwarme of old folke both men and women came downe to the rivers fide, holding up their hands to heaven, and thanking the gods, as if their citie had redeemed and recourred her shame and lost honour, and began now to rise againe, as before it did. For vntill that time, some say, that the husbands durst not boldly looke their wives in the faces they were so assamed of their great losses and miserable estate. Now the citie of Messana being by Epaminondes recdified and replenished with people, he called home againe out of all parts, the naturall inhabitants of the fame. The Spartans durft not fight with him (nor to himder his purpose) though it spited them to the hearts, and were angry with Agestian for that in his reigne they had loft althat territory, which was as great as all LACONIA felfe, and for goodnesseand fertilitie to be compared with the best parts of all GR B c E, the which they had quietly possessed many yeares before. And this was the cause why Agesilaus would not agree to the peace which the Theban's fent to offer him: and all because he would not relinquish that in words, which the enemies kept in deeds. Therfore being wilfully bent once more to fight with them, he went not onely without recouring the thing he looked for, but had in manner also lost the city of Spartaby a warlike stratageme, in the which he was deceived. For the Mantine ANS being newly revolted againe from the alliance of the THEBANS, and having sent for the LA-CED EMONIANS, Epaminondas receiving intelligence that Agefilans was departed from Sparta with all his power to aide the MANTINEANS, marched away fecretly by night from TEGEA, without the privite of the MANTINBANS, and went straight to Sparta, the which he had almost surprised on the sudden going another way then Agesslaus came (being in maner without men to defend it.) Howbeita THESPIAN called Euthynus, as Callifthenes faith, (or as Xenophon writeth, a Cretan) brought Azefilaw newes of it; who dispatched a horseman straight to aduertife them of the citie of Sparra, and marching forward himselfe to returne, stayed not long afterbefore he arrived. He was no fooner come, but incontinently also came the THEBANS, who puffing over the river of Eurotas, gave affault to the citie. Then Agefilaus perceiuing that there was no more place nor time of fecuritie as before, but rather of desperation and courage, hee valiantly defended it, more then an olde mans yeares could beare.

Thus, through courage and desperate mind, whereto he was never brought before, neither did ener vieit, he put by the danger and faued the city of Sparta from Epaminondas hands, fetting vp markes of triumph for repulfing of the enemics, and making the women and children of Sparta to fee the LACED AMONIANS how honourably they rewarded their nurse and coun- The fortitrey for their good education, but Archidamus chiefly of all other, fought wonderfully that tade of Arday, running into cuery part of the city, with a few about him, to repulle the enemies wherefocuer the danger was greatest. It is faid also, that at that time there was one Isadas the some of Phabidas, that did maruellous strange things to behold, both in the face of his enemics, as alfo in the fight of his friends. He was of goodly personage, and at that time in the prime of his The validity. youth; and being starke naked, and vnarmed, his bodic nointed with oyle, having in one hand nessess aborestaffe, and in the other a fword, in this manner he went out of his house, and ranne a- Ilaia a mongst them that fought, killing and ouerthrowing his enemies that withstood him, and was sparan. not once hurt, either for that the gods preserved him for his manhoods sake, or else because men thought him more then a man. The Ephori immediatly gaue him a crowne, in honour and Isadas rereward of his valiantnesse: but withall they set a sine on his head to pay a thousand silver Drachmaes for his rash attempt, to hazard himselfe in battell, vnarmed for defence. Shortly after they fought another great battell before the citie of MANTINEA. There Epaminondas having overthrownethe first rankes of the LACED EMONIANS, and couragiously diffreshing the rest, valiantly following the chase, there was one Anticrates a LACONIAN, who receining him (as Thedeath Dioscorides writeth) flue him with his borespeare. The LACED EMONIANS to this day not with uf Examistanding, do call the ofipring of this Anticrates, Machariones, as much to fay, as sword-men, as mada. though he had flaine him with a fword. The LACED EMONIANS did effective this Anticrates for much, for that deadly stroke he gaue (because they were afraid of Epaminondas while he lived) focalled. that they gave him that flue him, great honours and dignities, and discharged all his offpring and kindred from paiment of fubfidy and common contributions, which priviledge one Callierates, a kinfman of this Anticrates enjoyed even in our time. After this battell and death of Epaminondas, the GRECIANS having taken peace generally amongst them, Agesilaus would need exclude the MESSENIANS from being fworne to this peace, faying: that they need not sweare, because they had no city. Now, for a fmuch as all the GRECIANS else did receive them as amongst the number, and tooke their oath vnto this peace, the LACED EMONIANS brake off from this generall peace, and none but they onely made warre, in hope to recouer the MBSSENIANS country; and all through the allurement of Agesilans, who for this cause was thought of the GRECIANS a cruell and unfatiable man for warres, to deale fo craftily, and all to breake this generall league. Againe, he brought himselfe in discredite with all men, being compelled to make his city bare of read of money, borrowing of them still, and raising sundry contributions amongst them: whereas indeed it had been his best way to have ended all these miseries, having so happy an occasion offered at that time, and not to have lost fo great an Empire of so many townes and cities both by fea and land, and all to plague his countrey, to winne the land and riches of the MESSENIANS. But yet was this most shame vnto him of all other, when he gaue himself vnto one Tachos, a Captaine of the ÆGYPTIANS, cuery man thinking it a shameful part of him, that such a personage as he (reputed the chiefest man of al the GRECIANS, & the which had filled the world with report of his fame and glory) should for money let out his person to hire, and the glorie of his name, vnto a barbarous person, a traytour and rebell to his king and master, to become a mercenary Captaine and fouldier to do him feruice. And moreouer, he being now fourescore yeares of age and vpwards, his bodie all mangled with wounds, though he had vndertaken this honorable charge for the recouerie of the libertie of the GRECIANS, yet had his ambition deserved fome blame: for noble acts have their time, yearather the good and ill do nothing differ from other, but in meane and mediocritie. But Agesilaus had no regard of all this, and thought no manner of shame in service, specially for benefit of the commonwealth, but perswaded himfelfe that it was a dishonour to him to liue idlie in a city and do nothing, till death should come and make his fummons: thereupon therefore he leaused men of warre through all GRECE with the money Tachos sent vnto him, and with them tooke sea, having thirtie SPARTANS counfellors and affiftants to him, as he had in his first journey. Now Agestlans being arrived in Æ-GYPT, all the chiefe Captaines and gouernours of king Taches came to the lea shore, and honourably received him: and not they onely, but infinit numbers of AGYPTIANS of all forts Hhh 3

In whom Stratagems

(that were maruellous defirous of him, for the great fame that went abroad of Agefilians) came thither from all parts to fee what manner of man he was. But when they faw no stately traine about him, but an old graybeard layed on the graffe by the fea fide, a litle man that looked fimply of the matter, & but meanely apparelled in an ill fauored threed-bare gowne: they fell a laughing at him, remembring the merry tale, that a mountaine should bring foorth, and was delivered of a mouse. Besides all this, they wondered when they saw men bring him presents to welcome him, that he tooke meale, calues, and geefe, and fuch groffe things: and refused all confections, perfumes, and other delicacies, praying them that offered those dainty things to him, to give them to the ILOTES his flaves. Theophrastus writeth, that he delighted marvellously in the rush Papyrus, and liked the garlands they made of them, for their fitnesse & the handsomenesse. the which he caried home with him when he departed thence. Having spoken at that time with Tachus, who was affembling his army to go on his journey, he was not made Captaine generall, as he looked he should have beene, but was appointed onely Colonell of all the strangers. Chabrias Generall of all the army by sea, and the chiefe of all the rest was Tachos himselfe in perfon. This at the first grieued Agesilaus to the heart, being driven whether he wold or not, to beare with the vanity and pride of this Egyptian. So he failed with them into Phenice, against the PHENICIANS, imbasing himselfe against his noble disposition and mind, and gaue him place. vntill he faw time of revenge. It chanced that one Neotanebos a nephew of this Taches, having the leading of part of this army, rebelled against him, and being chose king by the Egyptians, he fent vnto Agefilam, and prayed him to come and take his part. The like he did also vnto Chabrias, & prayed him to joyne with him, promifing great rewards vnto them both. Tachus understanding that, befought them both that they would not for sake him. Chabrias for his partallo did likewise intreate Agestlans, & perswaded him what he could, to continue friendship with Tachos. Agefilaus answered him: For thee, Chabrias, thou cameft of thine owne goodwill, and therefore mayest do what thou thinkest good, but so is it not with me: for I am sent hither a Captaine by my country, to ferue the ACYPTIANS, and therefore it were no honestie for me to make warre with them, whom I am fent to ferue and aide : were it not that they themselves which fent me do now commaund me the contrarie. This answer being made, he fent certaine of his men to Sparta to accuse Tachos, and to commend Nectanebos. Both they also for their parts fent to intreate the councell of LACED EMON: the one as being alwaies their friend and confederate, and the other promifing to be their faithfull friend thenceforth. The LACED & MO-NIANS, having heard the requests of both, answered them openly, that Agesilans should consider of this matter; and wrote fecretly to him, that he should doe what he thought best for the common wealth of Sparta. So Agefilaus taking with him the mercenarie fouldiers which he had brought out of GRECE, went vnto Nectanebos, cloaking his departure, that it was for the benefite of his country, to bewray a wicked thing; but indeed taking away the vizard to benefitchis country, they might by a better name rightly have termed it treason, Howbeit & LACE-DAMONIANS placing the chiefest point of honor, to confist in the benefite of their country, did acknowledge nothing to be inflice, but that which they thought might ferue for the advancement of the glory of Sparta. Tachos seeing himselfe forsaken thus by his mercenarie strangers, fled. But now on the other fide, there arose another king in the citic of MENDES against this Nettanebos who having leavied to the number of a hundred thousand fighting men, came to fight with Netlanebos. But he thinking to encourage Agefilam, told him, that indeed they were a great number of men of all forts together, and specially men of handie craft, and thereforethat they were not to be feared, because they knew not what warre meant. But Agesilaus answered him againe: It is not their number that I feare, but their rudenesse and viskilfulnesse, which is hardest of alto deceive. For warlike stratagems do most prevaile against menthat have greatest feare and experience; and therefore they foresee one thing rather then another. But men of no judgement nor experience, neither feare danger, nor have forecast, and therefore do giue him no more aduantage that seeketh to deceive them, then the wrastler by slight is able to ouerthrow him whom he cannot stirre nor remove. Afterwards the MENDESSIAN king himfelfe fent vnto Agesilaus, to winne him if he could. Nettanebos then began to be afraid. For when Agefilans counfelled him to try it by battell as foone as he could, and not to prolong this warre against ignorant men that had no skill to fight, but yet for their ouer-multitude might intrench him round about, and preuent him in diuers things: then he began to feare and suspect him more, and thereupon retired into a great cirle, well walled about, and of great strength. Agesilaus being offended that he mistrusted him thus, tooke it inwardly; but being ashamed to turneagaine vnto the third, and also to depart without any exploit done, he followed him, and enclosed himselfe within those walles. The enemies pursuing him hard; came vitto the city, and began to intrench it round, to keepe him in. Then the ÆGYPTIAN Nectanchos fearing a long fiege, determined to give them battell. Thereto the hired GRECIAN'S gave consent, as defiring no better match, & the rather also for that there was but small store of corne within the city. But Agestlaus perswading the contrary, would in no wise consent to it: whereupon the Egyp-TIAN'S thought worse of him then before, and plainly called him traitor to their king. Howbeit he did patiently beare all these accusations, expecting time to performe an exploit he intended, which was this. The enemies had cast a deepe trench without to compasse them in. When this trench drew neare to end, and that both ends lacked not much of meeting, tarrying till night came on, he commanded the GRECIANS to arme and to put themselues in readincise: then he came vntothe Egyptian, and faid vnto him: Lo here is an excellent occasion presented to saue thee, which I would not acquaint thee withall till I saw it brought to the perfection I looked for, fearing lest otherwise we should have lost it. Now sith the enemies themselves have with their owne hands given vs the way to faue our felues by this trench they have cast, the which as much as is finished therof doth hinder their great multitude to helpe theselues, & that which is yet lese vnfinisheddoth giue vs. oportunitie to fight with them of euen hand: determine to shew thy va- 7he fratalour, and following vs, fauethy felfe and thy people. For the enemies which we shall affaile be- gemof-agefore vs, shall neuer be able to abide vs: and the other by meanes of the trench which defendeth files vs on enery side, can no way hurt vs. Nectanebos hearing his words, wondered at his great wisedome, and fo thrusting in among the GRECIANS, did affaile the enemies: the which were soone ouerthrowne and put to flight, as many as durst refist and make head against them. Agesidans hauing won Neclanebos againe to trust him, he once againe deceiued his enemies with the like subtiltie wherewith he had first beguiled them, and which they knew not how to avoide. For one while he made as though he fled, and inticed them to follow him: fodainely againe he would turne this way & that way. In fine, he brought all this great multitude into a straight fluce, walled about on either fide, with great broade ditches full of running water: fo that when they were euen in the midst of it, he sudainely stopped their passage with the front of his battell, which he cast to the breadth of the sluce, and thus made his number of fighting menequall with the multitude of his enemies, which could neuer compasse him in behind, nor flanke him on the sides. They having in this fort made some small refistance, in the end turned their backes and fled, and left a great number flaine in the field; the refidue after that last ouerthrow for sooke their Captains, and fled straggling here and there. Thus the affaires of this Egyptian king after that time had good fucceffe, and he was quietly stablished in his kingdome, making much of Agesilaus and doing him all honor possible, prayed him to tarrie with him all that winter. Howbeit he would needs haften home to his countrey, which was in warre with others, knowing that his city of Sparta was without money, because they were driven to give pay to strangers. Thereupon The liberal Nectanebos in the end tooke his leave of him very honourably, prefenting him a gift besides all o. He Romaines seeme to have loved Pompey from his childhood, with the selfe affection that Prometheus in the tragedy of Aschylus appeareth to have borne vnto Hercules, after that he was delivered by him: when he faid:

> So great a hate I bare not to the father, But that I love the sonne of him much rather.

For the ROMAINES neuer shewed more bitter hate against any other Captaine, then they did vnto Strabe Pompeys father. Truly fo long as he lined, they feared his greatnesse obtained by armes, for indeed he was a noble Captaine: but being stricken with a thunderbolt, and dead, they tooke him from the beare wheron his body lay as they caried him to buriall, and did thereto great villanie. Contrariwife, neuer any other ROMAINE (but Pompey) had the peoples earnest good wils so soone, nor that in prosperitie and aduersities antinued longer constant, then vnto Pompey. One onely cause procured the fathers hate, and was, an vnsatiable and greedy desire of money. But Pompey his son, was for many occasions beloued: as for temperance of life, aprinesse to armes, eloquence of tongue, faithfulnesse of word, and courtesse in conucrsation so that there was neuer man that requested any thing with lesse ill will then he, nor that more willingly did pleasure any man when he was requested. For he gaue without disdaine, and took with great honor. Furthermore, being but a child he had a certaine grace in his looke that wan mens good wils before he spake: for his countenance was sweet, mixed with granitie, and being come to mans state, there appeared in his gesture and behauior a graue and princely maiesty. His haire also stood a litle vpright, & the cast and fost mouing of his eyes, had a certaine resemblance (as they faid) of the statues & images of king Alexander. And because enery man gaue him that name, he did not refuse it himselse: insomuch as there were some which sporting wise did openly call him Alexander. Wherupon Lucius Philippus a Consull, was not ashamed to say openly in an oration he made in Pompeys fauor, that it was no maruell if he being Philip did loue Alexander. It is reported also, that when Flora the curtifan waxed old, she much delighted to talke of the familiaritie which she had with Pompey being a young man: telling that after she had lien with him, she could not possibly rise from him, but she must needs give him some sweet quip or pleasant taunt. She would tell also how one of Pompeys familiars and companions called Geminius, fell in love with her, and was a maruellous rous to pleasure him, granted the request: howbeit Geminius after that, would not come neare Plora, nor speake vnto her, albeit it appeared that he yet loued her. But Flora tooke this not curtifan-like, for she was sicke a long time for very griefe of mind and the thought she tooke vponit. All this notwithstanding, it is said that this Flora had then such fame for her passing grace and beautic, that Cecilius Metellus setting forth and beautifying the temple of Cassor and Pollux, with Flora the goodly tables and pictures, among the rest, he caused her picture to be liuely drawne for her excellent beauty. Furthermore, Pompey against his nature, dealt very hardly and vncourteously faire. with him, and dying, left her worth foure thousand talents) fearing to be taken with her beautie which wasvery fingularly faire, left he should be thought in love with her. Now though herein he feemed to be very circumfpect, and to cast the worst, yet could he not thus scape the detraching tongues of his ill-willers: for they did accuse him, that to please and content his wines, he would let paffe and winke at many things that were against the profit of the common-wealth.

bring his flomacke to him againe, his Physition willed him to eate a thrush. So lecking all about The tempe. to get himone, there was no Thrush to be bought for money, for they were out of season. Notwithstanding, one told him that he should not misse of them at Lucullus house, for he kept them indies.

This conspiracie was reucaled vnto Pompey as he sate at supper, which nothing amated him avall, The treason but he drank freely, and was merier with Terentius then of custome. So when it was bed time, he of Lucius der one of his fathers infranchifed bondmen that had stolen the most part of it, and brought him in before the Judges. Notwithstanding, he was accused himselfe, for taking away the toy les and robbine the arming cords of hunters nets, and bookes that were taken at AscvivM. He confessed the haning of them, and that his father gaue him them when the citie was taken : howbeit that he had treasure.

they had been agreed, cryed out with one voice, Talassio, Talassio, being the vsuall and common Theraule of crie they vsed of old time at mariages in Rome. This custome by report of ancient folke came the crite of Vp in this maner. At what time the chiefest Peeres and Lords of Rome did rauish the SAEINES Talaffo at daughters, which came to Rome to fee common sports played, there chanced a few rascals (as hog-heards or neat-heards) to carrie away a goodly faire woman. They fearing the should be taken from them, cryed out in the streets as they went, Talassio, as if they would have said. she is for Talassius. This Talassius was a young gentleman well knowne, and beloued of most men: so that such as heard him but named onely, did clappe their hands for ioy, and crycdour with them, Talassio, commending the choice they had made for him. So, hereof they say came this custome, that ever fince they have cryed this word Talassio vnto them that are newly maried, because the mariage of that faire yong maide proued fortunate, and happy vnto Talassius. And this methinkes foundeth nearest to the troth of that they report of this wedding crie of Talassio. Shortly after this indgement given Pomper maried Amistia. After that, going vnto Cinnaes campe, they wrongfully accused him of somewhat, whereupon he being afraid, secret, ly stole away. Now when they could not find him in Cinnaes campe, there ranne straight arumour abroade, that Cinna had put him to death. Thereupon, they that of long time had maliced Cinna, did fet vpon him for this occasion. But he thinking to faue himselfe by flying, was straight ouertaken by a private Captaine that followed him with his fword drawne in his hand. Ginna feeing him, felldowne on his knees before him, and tooke his feale from his finger wherewith he sealed his letters, which was of great price, and offered it him. Tush, said the Captaine, I come not to seale any couenant, but to chastise a villaine and cruell tyrant: and therewith all thrust his fword through him, and flue him prefently. Cinna being flaine in this fort, Carbo fucceeded him, and tooke the gouernment in hand, being a more cruell tyrant then the first. Shortly after came in Sylla, being wished for, and desired of the most part of the Romaines, for the gricuous oppressions and miseries they endured, that they thought the mselues happie to change Gouernour: for their city was brought into such miserie, as hoping no more to see Rome recouer her last libertie, they desired yet a more tolerable bondage. Now Pompey at that time was in a place of ITALY called PICENYM (now the marches of Ancona) where he had certaine inheritance. but much more great loue and goodwill of the citie for his fathers fake. He feeing that the noblest men of Rome forsooke their houses and goods, to flie from al parts vnto Syllaes campe, as vnto a place of fafety, would not go to him as a fugitive and castaway to save himselfe, without bringing him some power to increase his armie, but would honourably go thither with an army, as he that meant first to do himselfe pleasure. So he felt the good will of the Picentines, who willingly took his part, and rejected them that were fent by Carbo. Among them there was one Vindius, that stepping forth, faid: that Pompey which came from the schoole the last day, must now in hastebe a Captaine. But they were so offended with his speech, that they straight dispatched him, and killed him out of hand. After that time Pompey being but three and twentie yeares old tarying to receive no authoritie from any man, tooke it vpon him of himfelfe; and caufing a tri-Pompeyman bunall to be set vp in the middest of the market place of AvxIMVM, a great populous citie, he of an army commaunded the two brethren called the VBNTIDIANS (being the chiefest men of the citie, at 23 years and they that for Carboes sake withstood his doings) without delay forthwith to avoide the city:and so began to leavie men, and to appoint Captaines, Sergeants of bands, Centeniers, and fuch other officers as appertaine to martiall discipline. Then he went to all the other cities of the fame marches, and did the like. They that tooke part with Carbo, fled every man, and all the rest willingly yeelded vnto him: wherby in short space he had gotten three whole legions together, munition to entertaine them, carts, and all manner of beafts for cariage. In this fort he tooke his iourney towards Sylla, not in haste, as a man afraid to be met with by the way, but by small iourneys staying still where hemight hurt his enemie, causing the cities every where as he came to reuolt from Carbo. Neuerthelesse, three Captaines of the contrarie part, Carinna, Calsus, and Brutus, all three did set vpon Pompey together, not all in a front, nor of one side, but in three feueral places they compassed him with their armies, thinking to have made him fure at the first Pompeys of onset. This nothing amazed Pompey, but putting forth his force together in one place, he first marched against Brutus, having placed his horsemen (among the which he was himselfe in perfon) before the battell of his footmen. Now the men of armes of the enemie which were GAVLES, coming to give charge vpon him, he ran one of the chiefest among them through with his lance and flue him. The other GAVLES feeing him flaine, turned their backes, and brake their owne footmen: fo that at length they all fled for life. Thereupon the Captaines fell out among themselucs, and some sted one way, some another way, the best they could. Then the townes round about, thinking that they were difperfed for feare, came all in to Pompey, and yeelded themselues. Afterwards scipio the Consull coming against Pompey to fight with him, when both battels were in maner ready to joyne, before they came to throwing of their darts, Scipioes fouldiers faluted Pompeys men, and went on their fide: fo was Scipio driuen to flie. And in fine, Carbo himselfe having sent after him diverstroopes of horsemenby the river of Arsis, Pompey made towards them, and did so fiercely affaile them, that he draue them into such places as was almost impossible for horsemen to come into. Whereupon they seeing no way to scape, yeelded themselues horse and armours, all to his mercie. Sylla all this while heard no newes of these ouerthrowes: wherefore, as soone hevnderstood of it, fearing lest Pompey should miscarrie, being enuironned with so many Captaines of his enemies, he made hasteto march towards him forto aide him. Pompey vnderstanding of his approach, commanded his Captaines to arme somed with their men, and to put them in battell ray, that their Generall might fee them brauely appointed sylla. when he should present them vnto him: for he looked that Sylla would do him great honour, and indeed he did him more honour then Pompey looked for. For when Sylla faw him afarre off comming towards him, and his army marshalled in so good order of battell, and such goodly menthat fo brauely advanced themselves, being couragious for the victoric they had obtain ned of their enemies, he lighted on foot. When Pompey also came to do his dutie to him, and Pompey ned of their enemies, ne lighted on root. When Pompey also came to do his dutie to him, and rombey allo called him Imperator, (as much as Emperour, or fouer aigne Prince) Sylla refalleted him with the felfe name, beyond all mens expectation present, litle thinking that he would have given sylla. honourable a name vnto fo young a man as Pompey, who had not yet been Senator: confidering that he himself did contend for that title and dignitie, with the faction of Marius and Scipto. Furthermore, the entertainment that Sylla gaue him euery way, was answerable to his first kindnes offered him. For when Pompey came before him, he would rife and put off his cap to him, which Thehonor he did not vnto any other noble men about him. All this notwith standing, Pompey gloried no- sylladid thing the more in himselfe. Wherfore when Sylla would straight haue sent him into Gavi E, because Merellus that was there, was thought to have done no exploit worthy of so great an armie as he had with him: Pompey answered him againe, that he thought it no reason to displace an ancient Captaine that was of greater fame and experience than himselfe: yet if Metellus of himself were contented, and would intreate him, that he would willingly go and helpe him to end this pompey war. Metellus was very glad of it, and wrote for him to come. Then Pompey entring Gavle, did went to aid war. Metellus was very glad or it, and wrote for milito conic. The it supply child to fight, Metellus in of himselfe wonderful exploits, and did so reuiue Metellus old courage and valiant nesset to fight, Gaule, which now beganto faint, like boyling copper that being powred vpon the cold and hard copper, doth melt and dissolue it as fast or faster then fire it selfe. For like as of a wrestler, who hath been counted very strong, and the chiefest in all games, hauing euer borne, the prize away where he had wreftled, they neuer record among them his childish victories and wreftlings, as things of no account: cuenfo I am afraid to speake of the wonderfull deeds that Pompey did in his childhood, because they are obscured in respect of the infinite great warres and battels which he had pamps. wonne afterwards. For I am affraide that whileft I should go about particularly to acquaint you with his first beginnings, I should too lightly passe ouer his chiefest acts and most notable enterprises, which do best declare his naturall disposition and singular wit. Now when Sylla had oouercome all ITALY, and was proclaimed Dictator, he did reward all his Lieutenants and Cap- promper pas taines that had taken his part, and did aduance them to honourable place and dignity in the com- away his taines that nad taken his part, and did aduance them to honourable place and digitily in the continuous monwealth, frankly granting them all that they requested him. But for Pompey, reuerencing him flia, and for his valiantnesse, and thinking that he would be a great stay to him in al his wars, he sought by maried. fome meanes to allie him to him, Metellahis wife being of his opinion, they both perswaded the daught Pompeyto put away his first wise Antistia, and to mary Amylia the daughter of Metella, & of her ter of Mefirst husband, the which also was another mans wife, and with child by her husband. These 121/4 Syl. mrit nusband, the which also was another mans whie, and with clinic by her husband. There has wife, mariages were cruell and tyrannicall, fitter for Syllaes time, rather then agreeable to Pompeys na-The death f ture and condition: to see Amylia, this new maried wife taken from her lawfull husband, to Antifine. mary her great with child; and shamefully to forsake Antistia, who not long before had lost her father, and for respect of her husband that did put her away. For Antistius was murthered within the very Senate house, being suspected to take part with sylla for his sonne in law Pompeys sakes the CARTHAGINIANS had hiddenthere long before in time of their calamitic. Pempey hereupon, for many dayes after, could have no rule of his fouldiers; neither could be choose but thought good, for they had payed well for their folly. Domitius came to Pompey, with his ar-fwift running streame, very ill to get ouer; be sides that, from the very breake of day it had pow-red downeand rained fo fast, and was so great a wind withall, that Domitius thinking all that day they should not fight, commanded his people to trusse away, and remous. Pompey on the other side, finding this an excellent sit occasion for him, sodainly made his men to march, and passed ouer the valley. The enemies perceiuing that, being altogether out of order, were maruelloufly amazed, and inthat hurly burly would have made refiftance. But they were neither all together, nor yet evenly fet in battell ray, and had befides the wind beating the raine full intheir faces. So did the storme much hurt vnto the Romaines also, for they could not one fee another: infomuch as Pompey himselfe was in great danger of being killed by one of his ter, (for they fay, that of twenty thousand of them, there were but three thousand faued) Pom-peys fouldiers faluted him by the name of Imperator : but he answered them, that he would not accept the honor of that name, to long as he faw his enemies campe yet flanding ; and the refore, if it were fo they thought him worthy of that name, that first they should oberchrow the treach and fort of their enemies, wherein they had intrenched their campe. The fouldiers when they his realme was give to Hiemp(al. But Pempey being defirous further to employ his power, and the good fortune of his army, went many daies journey into the maine land, and still conquered all where he came, making the power of the ROMAINES dreadfull vnto all the barbarous people of that countrey, the which made but fmall account of them at that time. He layd moreour, that the wild beafts of Africk E also should feele the force and good successe of the Romains; and thereupon hebestowed a few dayes in hunting of Lyons and Elephants. For it is reported, that at all: but his fouldiers shewed plainly that they were offended. For when Pomper prayed them to depart, they began to give our broad speeches against sylla, and told directly that they were not determined (what socuer became of them) to for sake him, and they would not that he should trust vnto a tyrant. Pompey seeing that he could not perswade them by any reason to be quiet, rose out of his chaire and retired into his tent weeping. But the souldiers fellowed him, and brought him againe to his chaire of state, where he spent a great part of the day, they intrea-ting him to remaine there and command them, and he defiring them to obey Sylla, and leave their mutinics. But in fine, feeing them importunate to prefle him to it, he sware he would kill himselse, rather then they should compell him; yet they scant lest him thus. Hercupon it was reported vnto Sylla, that Pompey was rebelled against him. Sylla when he heard that, sayd to his friends: Well, then I fee it is my destinie in mine old dayes to fight with children. He meant fo, cause he would go beyond them all in shew of good will, he went out of his housero meete him, and embracing him with great affection, welcomed him home, and called him Magnus, to fay laugh to fee fo many thousand men digging the ground, and turning up the field: untill in Demitius the end they wearied themselves, and came and prayed him then to leade them where he camped by mieset in battell ray. Howbeit there was a certaine quagmire before him, that ranne with a army, heard him fay fo, went prefently to affault it. There Pompey fought bare headed, to aucide the like danger he was in before. By this meanes they tooke the camp by force, and in it flue Donsitins. After that overthrow, the cities in that countrey came and yeelded themselves, some will lingly, and others taken by force as also they tooke king Iarbas that had fought for Domitius, and infortie dayes space at the vttermost, he had ouercome his enemies, subdued Africke, and had established the affaires of the kings and kingdomes of that countrey, being then but foure conquests at and twenty yeares old. So when he returned vnto the citie of VTICA, letters were brought 24 years from sylla, willing him to discharge all his army, and to remaine there with one legion onely, The best tarying the coming of another Captaine that should be sent to succeed him in the government the soular of that countrey. This commandement gricued him not a litle, though he made no flew of the graph of the country of the country because of Marius the yonger, who had done him much mischiefe, and had besides put him in Pompercal. great danger. But afterwards vnderstanding the troth, and hearing that all gengrally in Rome led Magnite were determined to go and meete Pompey, and to receive him with all the honor they could; be- by sul.

and her mother voluntarily put her felf to death, feeing her daughter received fuch open wrong, By these apparant causes, those vnfortunate mariages fell out into a miserable tragedie, by means of the death of Emylia, who shortly after miserably died with child in Pompeys house. Then came newes to Sylla, that Perpenna was gotten into Sicile and that he had made all that Iland at his denotion, as a fafe place to receive all Syllaes enemies: that Carbo alfo kept the fea therea. pomenfort bouts with a certainenumber of ships: that Domitius also was gone into Africk E: and diverse from sella other noblemen that were banished that had scaped his proscriptions and outlawries, were all in those parts. Against them was Pompey sent with a greaturmy. Howbeit he no sooner arrived in Sicile, but Perpenna left him the whole Iland, and went his way. There he fanourably dealt with all the cities, which before had abidden great trouble and miferie, and fetthem againe at libertie, the Mamertines onely excepted, which dwelt in the citie of Messina. They defpifing his tribunall and jurifdiction, alledged the ancient order and priviledge of the ROMAINS fet downe in times pastamongs them. But Pompey answered them in choler: What do ye prattletovs of your law, that have our fwords by our fides? It seemeth also that Pempey dealt too cruelly with Carbo in his miserie. For fith he must needs die, as there was no remedie but he should, then it had been better they had killed him when he was taken: for then they would have imputed it to his malice that so had commanded it. But Pompey after he was taken, made him to be brought before him, that had been thrife Confull at Rome, to be openly examined. and he fitting in his chaire of frate or tribunall, condemned him to die in presence of them all: to the great offence and milliking of euery one that was present. So Pompey bade them take him away and carie him to execution. When Carbo came to the feaffold where he should be executed, and feeing the fword drawne that should cut off his head, he prayed the executioners to The death of gine him a little respire & place to vntrusse a point, for he had a paine in his belly. Caens Oppius al-2 Facility to (one of Inlins Cafars friends) writerh, that he dealt very cruelly in like maner with Quintus Falerius. For Pumper, faid he knowing that he was excellently well learned, as any man could be, & few like vnto him: when he was brought vnto him, he tooke him afide, and walked a few turns about then when he had questioned with him, and learned of him what he could, he commanded his guard to cary him away, and to dispatch him. Howbeit we may not give too light credit to all that Oppius writeth, speaking of Iulius Cafars friends or foes, For Pompey indeed was copelled to make away the greatest personages of Syllaes enemies that fell into his hands, being notoriously taken; but for the rest, althose that he could secretly suffer to steale away, he was cotented to winke at it, and would not understand it:and morcouer did helpe some besides to saue themselues. Now Pompey was determined to hauetaken sharpe renenge of the civic of the HI-MERIANS, which had floutly takentheenemies part. But Sthenis one of the Gouernours of the city, craning audience of Pompey, told him he should do them wrong and ininstice, if he should pardon him that committed all the fault, and should destroy them that had not offended. Pompey then asking him, what he was that durst take upon him to father the offence of them all, sthem's answered straight, that it was himselfe, that had perswaded his friends, & compelled his enemics to do that which they did. Pompey being pleafed to heare the franke speech and boldnesse of this man, first forgaue him the fault he had committed, and consequently all the other HIMERIANS. Pompey vnderstanding that his foldiers did kill divers men in the high waies, he sealed vp altheir fwords, and whose seale soener was broken, he was well fauouredly punished. Pomper being bufie about these matters in Sicile, received letters and commission from Sylla and the Senate, to depart thence immediatly into Africke, to make war vpon Domitius with all his power, who had leauted already more men of war, then Marius had, not long before, when he came out of A FRICK E into ITALY: and had there ouerthrowne all the Romaine's doings, being become of a figitive outlaw, a cruell tyrant. Pompey thereupon having speedily put himselfe in readinesse to take the seas, lest Memmius his sisters husband governor of Sicile and so himself imbarked, &c hoifled faile with fixefeore gallies, and eight hundred other ships or bottomes, to transport their to africe victuals, munition, money, engines of batterie, and all other cariage what society. After he was againgt Dr. Landed with all his fleet, part at VTICA, and part at CARTHAGE, there straight came to him seuen thousead soldiers from the enemies, and yeelded themselues, besides sene whole legions that he brought withhim. They fay moreouer, that at his arrivall, he had a present chance happened virto him to be laughed at: for it is reported, that certaine of his fouldiers stumbled on a treafure by chance, and got thereby a great maffe of money. The refidue of the army hearing that owne fouldiers, who not knowing him, asked him the word of the battell, and was somewhat pempeys long before he answered him. In fine, when he had ouerthrowne his enemies with great flaugh.

great and commanded all them that were present to give him that name also. This not with standing some say, that it was in Africk E this name was first given him by a common cry of all his whole army, and that afterwards it was confirmed by Sylla. Indeed it is true, that Pompey himself being sent Proconsul into Spain E, long time after that, was the last that subscribed all his letters and commissions with the name of Pompey the great: for this name then was so comonly knowne and accepted, as no mandid enuicit. And therefore rightly is the wifedome of the ancient Ro-MAINES to be both commended and had in admiration, which did not onely reward feruice in for remard the field with fuch honourable names and titles, but civill feruice and good government alfoin peace at home. For there were two, who the people of Rome called Maximi, to fay, very greats. of the which Valerius was the one, for that he made peace and agreement betwixt the people and Senate: the other was Fabius Rallus, for that he put from the Senate certain bondmen infranchised, who through their riches and fauour had obtained that place. After that, Pempey required led Maximi the honor of triumph, but Sylla denied it, alleadging that none could enter in triuph into Rome but Confuls or Prators. For fith Scipiothe first, who in Spaine had ouercomethe Cartha-GINIANS, neuer desired this honour of triumph, being neither Consull nor Prætor, much lesse should he stand vpon demaund of triumph into Rome, when that through his yong yeares he was not yet a Senator; and befides, it would purchase him enuic of his honor and greatnes. These reasons did Sylla alleadge against Pompey and told him plainly that if he were bent to stad in it, he wold refift him. All this blanked not Pompey, who told him frankly againe, how men did honor the rifing, not the fetting of the Summeaning therby, how his owne honor increased, & Syllaes diminished. Sylla heard him not very perfectly what he faid; but perceiuing by their countenaces that flood by, that they wondred at it, he asked what it was he faid, When it was told him, he maruelled at the boldnesse of so youg a man, and then cried out twife together, Let him then triumph a gods name. Many being offended therwith, Pompey (as it is reported) to anger the more, would needs be brought in in triumphant chariot drawne with foure Elephants : for he had taken many of them from those Kings and Princes which he had subdued. Howbeit the gate of the citie being too narrow, he was driven to leave the Elephants, and was contented to be drawn in with horses. Now his soldiers that had not all things as they looked for, and which was promised the, going about to trouble and hinder his triumph; he said, he passed not for it, and that he would rather let alone all his preparation of riomph, then once to yeeld to flatter them. Wherupo, there was a famous man arthartime walled Servilius who at the first was one of the chiefest against Pompeys triumph, who said openly, Now I know that Pompey indeed is great, and deferueth triumphibeing cuident enough, that if he would, he might then have eafily beene made Senator:he sued not for that, but as they say, sought honor by a stranger meane lesse honourable. For if he had been made Senator fo yong, it had not been fo great a matter; but to have such honor before he was Senator, that was maruelloufly to be noted. But this wan him the more fauor and goodwill still amongst the common people: for they were glad when after his triumph they faw him in company amongst the Romaine knights. On the other side, it spited Sylla to fee him come so fast forward, and to rise to so great credite: notwithstanding being ashamed to hinder him, he was contented to keepe it to himfelfe vntill that Pompey by force, and against Syllaes wil, had brought Lepidu to be Confull, by the helpe and good will of the people that furthered his desire. Therupon Sylla seeing Pompey returning ouerthwart the market place from the election, with a great traine of followers to honour him, he fayd vnto him: O yong man, I fee thou art glad of this victorie, and so hast thou cause; for it is a goodly thing out of doubt to have had such fauour of the people, as for thy fake to have made Lepidus Confull (the vilest person of all men) before Catulus the honestest man of the citie: but I will tell thee one thing, see that thou sleepe not, and looke well to thy businesse, for thou hast advanced a dangerous enemie to thy selfe. Now the chiefest thing wherein Sylla discoucred most his ill will vnto Pompey, was in his last wil and testament: for he gaue Legacies vnto euery one of his friends, and some of them he made tutors and overfeers of his fonne, but he made no mention of Pompey at all. This notwithstanding Pompey tooke it well enough. And where Lepidus and fome other would have kept Syllzes bodie from buriall in the field of Mars, and that his funerall should not be openly solemnized. he contrary wife brought him very honourably and fafely to the ground. Shortly after Syllais death, his words of prophecie vnto Pompey concerning Lepidus, proued true. For Lepidus vfurping the authority which sylla had before, not colourably, but openly entred straight in armes, firring stirring up againe those of Marius faction, whom Sylla could not be auenged of, and which lay lurking a long time, spying for occasion to rise againe. True it is, that his colleague and fellow Confull Carulus (whom the best and soundest part of the people followed) was thought a maruellous honest man, both iust and modest: howbeit, a better gouernor in peace, then a good man of warre, infomuch as time required Pompeys skill and experience. So Pompey stood not doubtfull which way he would dispose himselfe, but tooke part straight with the Nobilitie and honesteft men, and was presently chosen Captaine of their army against Lepidus, who had alreadie wonne the greatest part of ITALY, and with an army vnder the conduct of Brutus, kept GAVLE on this fide the mountaines called GALLIA CISALPINA. And for the rest, Pompey, casily ouercame it : howbeit he lay along time before Mo Dona, befieging of Brutus. In the meane feafon Lepidus came to Rome, and being hard at the walles demaunding the fecond Confulship, made them afraid in the citie with the great numbers of men he had about him, gathered together of all forts. Howbeit this feare was cooled straight, by a letter which Pompey lent to Rome, aduertifing how he had ended this warre without any bloud shed: for Brutus either betraying his army, or being betrayed of it, yeelding himselfe vnto Pompey, who gaue him a certaine number of horsmen that conducted him vnto a litle towne vpon the river of Po; where the next day after, Geminins being fent by Pompey, flue him. But hereof Pompey was greatly blamed, for that he had written letters to the Senate from the beginning of the change, how Brutus had put himselfe into his Brutus the ten letters to the Senate from the beginning of the change, how Brutus had put himfelre into his hands, and afterwards wrote letters to the contrary, which burthened him for putting him to by Pompey. death. Thus Brutus was father of that Brutus, which afterwards by the helpe of Cassins flue inlins C.e/ar: howbeit he shewed not himselfe so like a coward, neither in warres nor in his death, as his father did as we have declared more at large in his life; Furthermore Lepidus being driven to forfake Italy, fled into Sardinia, where he died (as it is reported) of a ficknes that he had, not for any forrow or griefe of his owne affaires, but for a letter that was brought him which went to his Thedeath of heart, knowing thereby that his wife had plaied the harlot. There remained at that time Sertorin's Lepidus. in Spaine, who was another maner of warrier then Lepidus, and that kept the Romaines in great awe: for that all the fugitiues of the late civill wars were fled to him, as from the last disease of the warres. He had alreadie overthrowne many inferiour Captaines, and was now wreftling with Metellus Pius, that in his youth had bene a noble fouldier, but now being old, made warres but flowly, and would not couragiously take present occasions offered him, which Sertorius by The valihis nimbleneffe and dexterity took out of his hands. For he would ever houer about him, when sertorius in he thought least of him, like a Captaine rather of theeues then of soldiers, and would still ay am- Spaine. bushes in every corner, and round about him: where the good old man Metellus had learned to fight in battell ray, his men being heavie armed. Hercupon Pompey keeping his army alway together, practifed at Rome that he might be sent into Spaine to aide Metellus, But notwithstanding that Catulus commanded him to disperse his army, Pompey still kept them together by colour of new deuices, and was continually about Rome in armes, until that by Lucius Philippus means he had obtained the gouernment of that country. They fay, that one of the Senators maruelling to heare Philip propound that matter to the Senate, asked him: How now Philip, doeff thou then thinke it meete to fend Pompey Proconfull(to fay, for a Conful) into Spain E? No truly, faid Philip, not Proconfull onely, but pro Confulibus, (to fay, for both Confuls) meaning that both the rompeys Confuls for that yeare were men of no value. Now when Pompey was arrived in Spaine, men Spained. began straight to be caried away (as the maner is commonly where no governours be) with the gampf ser, hope of a thing that they had not before. Thereupon Sertorius gaue out proud and bitter words torius. against Pompey, saying in mockery, he would have no other weapon but rods to whip this yong boy, if he were not afraid of this old woman, meaning Metellus the old man. But not with standing these gallant brags, he stood better vpon his guard, and went stronger to fight then he did before, being afraid of Pompey. For Metellus was very diffolute of life (which no man would have Metellus judged in him) and was given ouer too much to riot and pleasure: howbeit they saw in him a simentories maruellous sodaine change, both of his honour and glorie which he vsed before, as also the cutting off of his superstuous expence. That thing, besides that he did honour Pompey greatly by it, wan him also much more the goodwil of the people, whe they saw that he drew himself downe to a straighter life. And this was no great paine to him, for of his owne disposition he was a graue man and temperatly giue for his defires. In this war fortune changed diverfly, as it is commonly scene in wars: but nothing grieued Pompey more then Sertorius winning of the citie of LAVRON. Iii 2

For he thinking to have that him in, and had given out fome glorious words of the matter, wondred when he faw himselfe straight compassed in, that he could not stirre out of the camp where ty of Lauro he lay, and was driven besides to see the citie burnt before his face. This notwithstanding, afin the fight terwards at a fet battell by the citie of VALENTIA, he flue Herennius and Perpenna, both notable fouldiers, and Sertorius Lieutenants, and with them ten thousand men. This victorie so encouraged Pompey, that he made haste to fight with Sertorius alone, because Metellus should have no part of the honour of the victory. So they both met by the river of Sucron, about sunne set, both fearing Metellus comming: the one, that he might fight alone; and the other, with one alone, In fine, the victorie fel out doubtfull in the end of the battell: for either of their wings had the vpper hand. Betweene the two Captaines, Sertorius had the greater honour: for he alone ouercame all them that stood before him. And as for Pompey, there was a great man of armes that being on foot, came and fet vpon him; and having both their fwords in their hands, they both lighted vpo their hands, but not both in one fort: for Pompeys hand was but a little hurt, and the man of armes had his hand cleane cut off. Then Pompeys men fell vpon him, all his owne fellowes on that fide being fled from him notwithstanding, beyond all hope, he faued himselfe after a strange fort, by calting up his horse among his enemies, that was richly trapped with gilt harnesse, having a caparison of great value; and in the meane time while they were busie deuiding this bootie among them, and fighting for it he escaped their hands. The next morning by breake of day, both of them againe brought their bands into the field, to confirme the victorie, which either of them supposed they had gotten. But Metellus came to Pompey at that present time; wherupon Sertorius went his way, and dispersed his armies for his campe was easily broken, and sodainly gathered againe together. For Sertorius would sometime wander the fields alone, and at another time again he would have a hundred and fifty thousand fighting men together in the field, like a vehement ftreame, that fometime is dried vp, and that fodainly againe is all of a floud. Pompey after this battel going to welcome Metellus, when they came neare one another, he commanded his fergeants and officers to put downetheir bundle of rods and axes which they caried before him, to honor Metellus withall, who was a better man then himselfe. But Metellus would not suffer them, but shewed himselfe equall with him in that, and in all things else, not respecting his senioritie, nor that he had been Confull, and Pompey not, fauing when they camped together, Metellus gaue the watchword to all the campe. Notwithstanding, commonly they camped a funder, for their enemy that was fo flitting fro place to place, and was scene in so sundry places in so short time, compelled them to be a funder to forefee the worst, drawing them sodainly from one purpose to another: fo that in fine, cutting them off from victuals enery way, spoyling their country, and keeping the sea side, he draue them both out of the provinces of their charge which they had in Spain, & did compel them to go some other where for lacke of victuals. Pompey in the meanetime having fpent y most part of his goods in this war, sent to Rome for mony to pay his soldiers, threatning the Senate, that if they fent him no mony, he would return e with his army into IT ALY. Lucullus then being Confull, though Pompeys enemie, procured they should send him money: for he practised to be sent Captaine against king Mithridates, and therefore was afraid to give Pompey any occasion to returne, who defired nothing more then to leave Sertorius to bend his force against Mithridates, whose ouerthrow shold be more honorable to him, and also lesse dangerous. In the meane space Sertorius died, being betrayed by those whom he thought his friends, among the which Perpenna was the chiefe man, that after Sertorius death would needs counterfeit his doings, having the same meanes, the same furniture, and the same power that he had: howbeit he lacked his wit and skill to employ them. Pompey therefore marching directly towards him. and finding how ignorant Perpenna was in his affaires, he layed a bait for him of ten cohorts which he fent to prey in the fields, commanding them to disperse themselves abroade as farre as they could, one from another. Perpenna straight tooke the occasion, and gaue them charge, and had them in chase. But Pompey tarying him at the foord, was readie for him with al his armie set in order: he gauehim battell, obtained the victorie, and ended all this warre, because the most of the captaines were flaine in the field, and Perpennathe chiefe of all taken prisoner, whom he presently put to death. But herein Pompey was not to be condemned of ingratitude nor oblinion (as some do burthen him) of Perpennaes friendship shewed him in Sicilia, but rather deserued praise to have determined so wisely for the benefite of the common wealth. For Perpenna having in his custodie all Sertorius writings, he shewed letters of the greatest Noblemen of Rome,

(which were defirous of change of gouernment) willing him to returne into ITALIE. Pompey vpon fight of these letters, fearing lest they would breed greater sedition and stirre in Rome then that which was already pacified, put Perpenna to death as soone as he could, and burnt all his pathers and writings, not reading any letter of them. Then Pompey remaining in Spaine a certaine the death as soone as he could, and burnt all his pathers and writings, not reading any letter of them. Vpon his comming therefore Crassins being sent Captaine (after when against these bondmen, made haste to give them battel, which he wan, and sluetwelue thousand, because three hundred of these fugitiue slaues. Notwithstanding, fortune meaning to give Fompey some Pompey. part of his honour, five thousand of these bondmen escaping from the battel, sell into his hands. Whereupon he having ouercome them, wrote vnto the Senate, that Graffus had ouercome the recease it fencers in battell, and that he had pluckt vp this warre by the rootes. The Romain Bs receiving Pompers letters, were very glad of this newes for the loue they bare him. But as for the winning of Spaine, and the ouerthrow of Sectorius, there was no man, although it were in sport. that euer gaue any man elfe the honour but vnto Pompey onely. For all this great honor and loue they bare vnto Pompey, yet they did suspect him, and were afraid of him, because he did not disperse hisarmy, that he wold follow syllaes steps, to rule alone by plaine force. Hercupon as many went to meet him for feare, as there were that went for good will they bare him. But after he had put this suspition quite out of their heads, telling them that he would discharge his army after he had triumphed, then his ill willers could blame him for nothing elfe, but that he was more inclined vnto the people then to the nobility, and that he had a defire to reftore the Tribuneship of the people which Sylla had put downe, onely to gratifie the common people in all he could: the which indeed was true. For the common people at Rom n neuer longed for thing more, then they did to fee the office of the Tribune fet vp againe. Yea Pompey him felfe thought it the happiest turne that euer came to him, to light in such a time to do such an act. For had any other man presented him of that he could never have found the like occasion possibly to have requited the peoples good wils vnto him fo much as in that. Now therefore this fecond trium ph and first Confulship being decreed by the Senate, that made him nothing the greater nor better man. And yet was it a flew and fignification of his greatnesse, the which Crassus (the richest man, the eloquentest and greatest person of all them that at that time dealt in matters of state, and made more estimation of himselfe then of Pompey and all the rest) never durst once demaund, before he had craued Pompeys good will. Pompey was very glad of his requeft, and had fought occasion of long time to pleasure him: and thereupon made earnest suite vnto the people for him, assuring them he would as much thanke them for making Graffus his colleague and fellow Confull, Forting as he would for making himselfe Consult. All this notwithstanding, when they were creatingly for some consulting that the consulting is a consultant to the consultant that the consultant is a consultant to the consultant that the consultant is a consultant to the consultant that the co ted Confuls, they were in all things contrary one vnto another, and nener agreed in any one thing while they were Confuls together. Crassis had more authority with the Senate, but Pompey had more credit with the people. For he restored them the office of the Tribune, and The customer passed by edict, that the Knights of Rome should have full power agains to judge causes ci-of the uillandcriminall. It was a pleasant sight also vnto the people, when he came vnto the Cen- hights of fors in person, to pray that he might be dispensed with for going to the warres. For it was an auncient custome in Rome, that the Knights of Rome having served a certaine time in the warres appointed by their order, should bring their horse into the midst of the market place before the two Cenfors, declaring every Captaine under whom they had ferued, in what iourneys and countries they had been: and having also delivered account of their good behaviour and service, they then prayed to be dismissed from the warres. Now if it appeared that they had done good feruice, there were they honorably rewarded; or otherwise, openly shamed and pitnished. At that time, Gellius and Lentulus the two Cenfors, being honorably fet in their tribu- to be defnall or judgement feate, taking view of all the Ronaine Knights that must cred before them, from the to be seen and examined, they maruelled when they faw Pompey comming at the forther end warres, of the market place, having all the markes of a Confull borne before him, and himselfe lea- Proposition ding his horse in his hand by the bridle. When Pompey came nearer, and that they saw himselfato it was he, he commanded his fergeants that carried his axes before him, to make roome for the conforhim to passe by the barres with his horse, where the Cenfors sate. Then the people slocked about him, wondering and reioveing, being very filent. The Cenfors themselves also were lent parts and injuries they did the Romaine's vpon the sea, they went aland, and where they found any houses of pleasure vponthe sea coast; they spoyled and destroyed them: and on a time they took two Romaine Prætors, Sextilius and Bellinus, being in their purple robes, with their fergeants and officers attending on them, and carryed them quite away. Another time also they he should have no hurt and if he would not go of himselfe, then they cast him over the boord by force, and fent him packing. These rouers and sea-pirats had all the sea Mediterraneum at commandement insomuch there durst not a merchant looke out, nor once traffick that sea, And this was the only cause that moued the Romaines (fearing scarcitie of victuals, and agreat dearth) to fend Pompey to recouer the figniory againe of the sea from these pirates. The first man that moned it might be decreed, that Pompey should not be only Admirall or Generall by sea-but should have absolute power to command all maner of persons as he thought good, without any account to be made of his doings in his charge, was Gabinius, Pompeys friend. The fumme of state, to defray the charges of a sleet of two hundred faile, with full power besides to leavie what men of warre hethought good, and as many galliots and mariners as he lifted. This law when it had been read once ouer among them, the people confirmed it with very good will. Yet the noble men and chiefe of the Senate thought that this authority did not only exceed all enuie, but also that it gaue them apparant cause of feare, to give such absolute power vnto a private person.

Whereupon they were all against it but Casar, who favoured the decree, not so much to pleasure

Pompey as the people, whose fauour he sought. The noblemen fel maruellously out with Pompey:

and at the length one of the Confuls was very hote with him, and told him he looked to follow

Romulus steps, but peraduenture he would come short of that end he made. Thereupon the people thought to haue killed him. After that, Catulus stood vp to speake against this edict. The people at the first heard him quietly, because he was a worthy man. Then he began without any shew of enuie, to speake many goodly things in the praise of Pompey, and in fine, aduised the people to spare him, and not to venture in such dangerous warres (one after another) a man of so great account, as they ought to make of him. If ye chance to lose him, faid he, whom haue you then to put in his place. The people then cried out: Your selfe. Then perceiuing that he lost his labour, secking to turne the people from their determination, he left it there, and said no more.

Roscius rose next after him to speake, but he could have no audience. When he saw that he could

POMPEIVS. maruellous glad to fee him so obedient to the law, and did him great reuerence. In fine, the elder of the Censors did examine him in this sort. Pompey the Great, I pray thee tel me if thou hast serued fo long time in the warres as the law did appoint. Then answered Pompey aloud: Yes verily that I have, and vnder no other Captaine then my selfe. The people hearing this answer, made an open shout for ioy, they were so glad to heare it and the Censors themselves came from their iudgement seate, and went to accompanie Pompey home to his house, to please the great multitude of people that followed him, clapping of their hands with great fignes of ioy. At the end of their Confulship, when misliking increased further betweene Pompey and Crassus, there was one Gaius Aurelius, of the order of Knighthood, who till that time nener spake in open assembly, but then got vp into the pulpit for orations, and told the people openly, how Iupiter had appeared to him in the night, and had commanded him to tell both the Confuls from him, that they should not leaue their charge and office before they were reconciled together. For all these words Pompey stirred not. But Crassus first tooke him by the hand, and spake openly to him before the people: My Lords, Ithinke not my selfe dishonoured to giue place to Pompey, sith you your selucs haue thought him worthy to be called the Great, before he had any haire on his face, and vnto whom you granted the honour of two triumphs before he came to be Senator. When he had faid his mind, they were made friendstogether and so surrendred up their office. Now for Crasfus, he held on his former manner of life which he had begun. Pompey as neare as he could, gaue ouer to pleade mens causes any more, and began by litle and litle to withdraw himself from frequenting the market place, and matters of judgement, coming seldom abroade, and when he did, he had alwaies a great traine following him. It was a rarething also to see him any more come out of his house, or talke with a man, but he was cuer accopanied with a great number, and he reioyced to himselse to see that he had alwaics such a traine after him: for that made him to be honoured the more, and gaue him greater countenance to fee him thus courted, thinking it dishonour to him to be familiar with meane persons. For men that rise by armes, are easily despised, when they come to liue like private citizens, because they cannot fashion themselves to be companions with the common people, (who citizen-like vie a common familiaritie together) but looke to be their betters in the citie, as they are in the field. Yea and contrarily, they that do acknowledge themselues to be their inferiors in warres, will thinke foule scorne if they be not their superiours in peace. And by this meanes when they have a noble warrier among them that followed publike causes 5 (which hath triumphed for many victories and battels he hath obtained) they obscure his glory, and make him an underling unto them whereas they do not other wise enuie any fouldiers that are contented equally to give them place and authoritie, as plainly appeared shortly after by Pompey himselfe. By such an occasion, the power of pirates on the sea, took beginning in the country of CILICIA, which was not reckned of at the first, because it was not perceiued vntill they grew bold and venturous in king Mithridates wars, being hired to do pirats war. him service. And afterwards the Romaines being troubled with civill wars, one fighting with another, euen at Rome gates, the sea not being looked to all this while, it set them a gogge, and made them go farther then euer they did before. For they did not onely rob and spoyle all merchant-venturers by fea, but rifled also the Ilands and townes vpon the fea coast: infomuch as then there ioyned with them men of great wealth and nobilitie, and of great wisedome also, and entred into their fellowship, as into a commendable facultie. Now they had set up arsenals or ftore-houses in fundry places, they had fundry hauens and beacons on the land, to give warning by fire all along the sea coast, and those well kept and watched: moreouer, they had great sleets of ships ready furnished with excellent good galliots of ores, skilful pilots and mariners, their ships of lwift faile, & pinnaces for discouery, but withal so gloriously set out, that men lesse hated their excesse, then feared their force. For the poopes of their galliots were all gilt, the couerings of the fame all of purple filke, delighting only to make a glorious shew of their pillage. All the sea coast ouer, there was no fight of any thing but musicke, singing, banquetting, and rioting, prifes of captaines and men of great qualitic, and ransomes of a thousand prisoners; and all this was to the Thepirates shame and dishonour of the Romaines. Their ships were about a thousand in number, and they ehousand had taken about 400 townes. They had spoyled and destroyed many holy temples that had neuer been touched before: as the temple of the Twins in the Ile of CLAROS, the temple of Samos thracia, the temple of Earth in the citie of HERMION, and the temple of Æfculapins in Eridav-RYM : the temples of Neptune in Isthmos, TENARIA, and CALABRIA: and the temples of stole away the daughter of Antonius (aman that had received honour of triumph) as she went a walking abroade in the fields, and she was redeemed for a great summe of money. But yet the The pirates greatest spite and mockery they vsed to the Romaines, was this, that when they had taken any stages of of them, and that he cryed he was a citizen of Rome, and named his name: then they made as maines, while though they had been amazed, and afraid of that they had done. For they clapped their hands they were on their thighes, and fell downe on their knees before him, praying him to forgiue them. The taken. poore prisoners thought they had done it in good earnest, seeing they humbled themselues as this decree gaue him full power and absolute authority of all the sea from Hercules pillars, and of Gabining

(Furthermore, it gaue him power to choose of the against the Senate fifteene Lieutenants, to give vnto every one of them severall provinces in charge, accor-

The people being offended with all made such an outcrie of the peovponit, that a crow flying ouer the market place at that instant, was stricken blind and fel downe amongst the people. of the voice (when it cometh with such a violence, as it maketh a very tempest in the aire) doth ffrike & ouercome them. Thus for that day the affembly brake vp, & nothing past and at the day appointed when this decree should passe by voices of the people, Pompey went abroade into the country. There being aduertifed that the decree was past for the confirmation of his charge, he returned againe that night into the citie because he would avoid the enviethey would have borne him to have feene them run out of all parts of the citie vnto him, to have waited on him home. The next morning he came abroade, and facrificed to the gods; and audience being given him at an open affembly, he handled the matter so, that they gaue him many things be fides to enlarge his power, almost doubling the preparation fet downe and appointed at the first decree. For he ordained that the common wealth should arme him five hundred ships, and they leavied for him fixe score thousand footmen, and five thousand horsemen, and chose besides four and twentie Senators, which had every one of them been Generals of armies, and two general Treafurers also. While things were thus a preparing, the price of victuals fell by chance, which rejoy. ced the people so much, that they stucke not to say, that the name of Pompey onely had already ended this warre. This notwithstanding, he deuided all the sea betweene the lands into thirteene regions, and in energy of them he appointed a certaine number of his ships, and moreouer one of his Lieutenants ouer them. Thus having dispersed his power all abroade, he brought all the pirates ships that were in a fleetetogether, within his danger; and when he had taken them, he brought them all into a docke. Now for them that had disperfed themselues betimes, or that o. therwise could scape his generall chase, they fled all into CILICIA, as Bees into the beehine, a. gainft whom he would needs go himselfe in person with threescore of his best ships. Howbeir he cared not though he went not before he had scoured all the Thys cane sea, the coasts of Ly-BIA, SARDINIA, ŠICILE, and of CORSICA, of althose theenes which were wont to keep therabouts, and this he did within fortie dayes space, taking infinite paines, both himselfe and his Lieurenants. Now when one of the Confuls called Pilo, did all the best he could to hinder Pompers preparation, and had discharged his ore-men, for that he enuied Pompers prosperitie: Pomper fent his ships before to make towards ITALY to arrive at the citie of BRYNDVSIVM. He in the meanetime went through THYSCANE to ROME, where, fo foone as his coming was knowne, all the people ranne out to meete him, as if he had been absent a long time; and that which made the people more joyfull to fee him, was the fodgine change of victuals vnlooked for, that daily came to the towne out of all parts. But Pife went neare to be depriued of his Confulfhip: for Gabinius had the decree written, and ready to present to the people. But Pompey would not suffer it. So. having gently brought allto passe as he defired, he went vnto the citie of BRVNDVSIVM, and there tooke sea, and hoised saile. Now though his hastie voyage, and shortnesse of time made him passe by many good cities without coming into them: notwithstanding, he would not so patie by the citie of Athens, but landed there, and after he had facrificed to the gods, returned to imbarke againe. At his going out of the citie, he read two writings that were made in his praise, the one within the gate which said thus:

The humblier that thou doest thy selfe as man behaue, The more thou doest deserve the name of god to have:

And the other writing was without the gate, which faid,

We wisht for thee we waite for thee, We wor ship thee, we waite on thee.

Now because Pompey having taken certaine of these rouers by sea that kept together, did yse them gently when they required pardon, and having their shippes and bodies in his power, did them no hurt at all: their other companions being in good hope of his mercie, fled from his other Captaines and Lieutenants, and went and yeelded themselves, their wives and children into his hands. Pompey pardoned all them that came in of themselues, and by that meanes he came to have knowledge of the reft, and to follow them where they went, whom he tooke in the end; but knowing that they deferued no pardon, they hid themselues. Yet the most part and the richest of them, had conucied their wines, children and goods, and all other their family vnmeete for warres, into ftrong caftles and litle townes vpon mount Taurus; and fuch men as were able to carrie weapon, imbarked, and lay before a citie of Corne B sivm, where they taried Pompey, and gaue him battell first by sea, and there were ouercome, and afterwards they were befreged by land. Howbeit shortly after, they prayed they might be received to mercie, and thereupon yeelded their bodies, townes, and Ilands, which they had fortified, and were hard to hauetaken and worfe to haue approched. Thus was this warre ended, and all the pirats in lefte The ridor then three moneths driven from the sea wheresoever they were. He wan also a great number of of Pompey. other ships, besides fourescore and ten gallies armed with copper spurres. And touching the men whom they had taken (who were in number aboue twenty thousand persons) he did not only confider whether he should put them to death, but also thought it no wise part on the other fide to let them go at libertie, to gather force againe, being fo great a number of them as indeed they were, and all poore men and fouldiers. Therfore weying with himselfe that man by nature is not borne a wild or fauage beaft, but contrarily become tha brute beaft changing nature, when he falleth to vice: and againe is made tame and civill in time, changing place and maner of life: (as the brute beafts that being wild by nature do also become gentle and tractable, with gentler viage by continuance) he determined to draw these pirates from the sea into the vpland, and to make them feelethetrue and innocent life, by dwelling in townes, and manuring the ground. are tamed. Some of them therefore he placed in certaine small townes of the CILICIANS, that were scant inhabited, and were very glad of them, giving them land to keepe them with. The city of the So-LIANS also, that not long before had been destroyed by Tigranes the king of Anmenia, being defirous to replenish that againe, he placed many of them there. He bestowed divers also in the city of Dyma in the country of Achara, which at that time lacked inhabitants, and had great ftore of very good land. Now therfore his enemics reproued him greatly and for that he did in CRETA, they that were his best and greatest friends misliked him. For Metellus that gentle perso Ca coufin to that e Metellus which was his colleague, and made wars in Spaine with him against Sertorius) was fent Prætor into CR ETA before Pompey was chosen Generall against the pirates. This CRETA next vnto CILICIA, was even a fecond den of pirats. Metellus finding there a great number of these theeues, tooke many of them and put them to death, euen all that came to his hands. Then, such as had scaped fro him, being straightly besieged, sent vnto Pompey to pray him of pardon, and to take them to mercy: declaring vnto him, that the Ile of CR BTA was within the precinct of his charge, because al parts of that region from the sea came inst within the compasse limited him on the land. Pempey pardoning them vpon their submission, wrote vnto Metellus, and commanded him to leaue off his war, and therwithall charged all the cities, that they should not obey Metellus commandements. After that he fent Lucius Octavius one of his Lieutenants, who entred into the townes Metellus befieged, and fought for the pirats. This made Pempey not only hated and enuied, but derided also: for that under his name he had protected such vile theenes, that had neither god nor law, and given them his authoritie to faue their lives, for a little envie & different emulation he bare vnto Metellus. And therefore they rightly reproue Achilles, and fay that he shewed northe part of a wise man, but of a yong foole besides himselfe, for desire of glory making a figne to the GRECIANS, forbidding them to strike at Hetter, to the end that as Homer said: Lest be too late should to the battell runne,

When others had the honour of it wonne.

But Pompeys fact was worse then this: for hee fought for the common enemies of the world, and onely to depriue a ROMAINE Prætor of triumph, who had done great good feruice to have destroyed them. This notwithstanding, Merellus left not off his warre for Pompeys letters, but having taken the pirates by affault, he put them to death: and afterwards having done Octavius open shame through his campe, he let himgo. When newes came to Rome, that the pirates warre was brought to good end, and that Pompey having no other feruice in hand, went visiting the cities vp and downe, one Manlius a Tribune of the people, put forth another decree vnto them of this effect: That Pompey taking all the armic Pompey api Lucullus had, and the prouinces vnder his gouernment, with all BITHYNIA, which Glabrio pointed kept, should go make warre vpon the kings Tigranes and Mithridates, keeping in his hands Lucullus norwithstanding all his iurisdiction and armie by sea, in as royall manner as he had it before. In fine, this was even to make one man Monarch and absolute Prince of all the ROMAINE Empire. For by this fecond decree, he had all these countries, not named in his former commisfion, added to amplifie his authoritie, as PHRYGIA, LYCAONIA, GALATIA, CAPPADOCIA, CILICIA, high COLCHIDA and ARMENIA, with all the armies and forces with the which he had ouercome those two mighty kings. Then the Senate stucke not so much at the iniurie that was offered vnto Lucullus, deprining him of the honour of his doings, to gine it to another, that should rather succeed him in honour of triumph, then in danger of warres, knowing that they did him too manifest iniury, and shewed themselves too vnthankfull: but that which most grieued them, was to see Pompey: power established in a plaine tyranny. Hereupon therefore one of them perswaded and encouraged another, stoutly to withstand this edict, and not to suffer their liberty to be lost in this fort, Notwithstanding, when the day came that this decree should passe, they were so afraid to anger the people, that their hearts failed them, and none durst speake against it but Catulus only, that earnestly inucyed against the passing of it a long time together. & greatly blamed the people. At the length, perceiuing he had wonne neuer a man to take his part, he oftentimes cried out to the Senate, that they should looke to seeke out some mountaine or high rocketo retirefafely vnto, to defend their liberty, as their ancestors had done in old time beforethem. All this preuailed not, for the decree passed by the voyces of all the tribes, as it is reported. And thus was Pompey in his absence made Lord almost of al that, which Sylla by force of armes, and with great effusion of bloud (hauing made himselfe Lord of Rome) had before in his power. When Pompey had received letters from Rome, advertifing him what the people had past in that behalfe, some say that at the receit of them (in the presence of his familiar friends that were about him, and reioyced with him for congratulation) he knit his browes, and clapped on his thigh, as though it grieued him maruelloufly to haue such great offices and charge laid vpon him, one in the necke of another, and burst forth in these words: O gods, shall Ineuer see an end of such a world of troubles as I haue! Had it not been better for me to haue beene a meane man borne and vnknowne, then thus continually to be in warre with armour on my backe? What, shall I neuer see the time, that breaking the neckes of spite and enuic against me, I may yet once in my life liue quietly at home in my countrey with my wife and children? When Pompey spake those words, his familiar friends could not abide to see his deepe dissimulation, knowing that besides his natural ambition, and couctous desire to rule, he was glad in his heart that he pey and Lua had this charge, for the contention that was betwixt him and Lucullus: which his deeds for the with bewrayed. For he presently sent out precepts into every quarter, commanding all forts of fouldiers to come to him immediatly, and made all the Princes and kings within precinct of his charge to come vnto him, and going through the countries, altered and changed all that Lucullus had established before. Furthermore, he did release the penalties enioyned them, and took from them also the gifts that Lucullus bestowed on them. In fine, this was all his purpose and desire to make them that honoured Lucullus know, that he had no further power and authority to do any thing, Lucullus finding himselfe hardly handled by Pompey, the friends of either side thought good they should meet and talke together: which came to to passe, for they met in the countrey of GALATIA. And because they both were Captaines of the Romain armies, & had done many famous acts, they had their fergeants & officers that caried the budels of rods before them, wreathed all about with Lawrell boughes. When they met, Lucullus came out of a close and woodie countrey, all couered with greene trees; and Pompey on the other fide had passed through a great fandy plaine, where no tree was growing. Therupon Lucullus fergeants seeing the laurell boughs drie and withered away, which Pompeys sergeants caried, they gaue them of their green & fresh boughs to beautifie the rods and axes. This was a plaine token that Pompey came to take Lucullus honor from him. In truth Lucullus had been Conful before Pompey, and fo was healfo older man then he: yet the dignity of Pompey was greater, because he had triuphed twise. At their first meeting, their entertainment and discourse was with great ceremonie and courtesse as might be, one highly praifing the others deeds, reioycing at each others good fuccesses but at parting they felto hot words together, Pompey vpbraiding Lucullus avarice, and Lucullus Pompeys ambition, fo that their friends had much ado to part them. Lucullus departing thence, deuided the lands in GALA-TIA, which he had conquered, & bestowed the & other gifts on such as he thought good. Pompey on the other fide camping hard by him, specially commanded the people in enery part to obey him in nothing that he did:and besides he took all his souldiers from him, leaving him onely fixteene hundred; which he supposed were such, as for disdaine and ill will they bare him, would do him but smal service. Furthermore, to blemish the glory of his doings, he told every body Lucullus had fought with the pompe and shadow onely of these two kings, and that he had left hins to fight with al their whole force and power, Mithridates being then prepared for warres, with shields, swords, and horses. Lucullus for reuenge on the other side said, that Pompey went to fight but with a shadow of war, like a cowardly buzzard that preieth vpon dead bodies, which others attributing the honor of the overthrow of Seriorius, Lepidus and Spartacus, to himself, where indeed Merellus Crassus, and Catulus did ouercome them. And therefore it was no maruell, that he fought the glory and honor to triumph for the kingdoms of Pontys & Armenia: fith that thorough his subtile practises he had obtained triumph for a few slaues and sugitines. Lucullus being now gone his way, Pompey fent good garrifons vnto all the coasts vpon the sea, from the province of Phoenicia, vnto the Realme of Bosphorys. That done, he tooke his journey by land toof Phoenicia, vnto the Realme of Bosphorys. That done, he tooke histouritely by fand to againft Mis wards Mithridates, who had in his camp thirty thousand footmen, and two thousand horsemen, thridates, and yet durst not offer battell, but camped first vpon a mountaine of great strength, and hard to get vp on notwithstanding shortly after, he for fooke it for lack of water. He was no sooner gone thence, but forthwith Pompey tooke it: who, coniecturing by the nature of the plants and trees in that place which were very greene, and also by divers holes he found, that by reasontherabouts should be some springs, he commanded them to digge Wels in enery corner; so that in a very short time all his camp had water enough, and he wondred at Mithridates, that he could not find that out in all the time he lay there. In the end, he went and camped round about Mithridates, & intrenched him with a wall within his owne campe: who after he had abiddenthe fiege fine and fortie daies, fled away with all the choise of his army, vnknowing vnto Pompey, having first flaine all the sicke and impotent persons within his campe. After that, Pompey found him another time by the river of Euphrates, and went and lodged hard by him. But fearing that Mithridates would passe ouer the river before he could prevent him in time, he raised his campe againe, and marchedaway at midnight. About that time, they fay, that Mithridates faw that in a dreame which did prognosticate what would happen. He thought, that having the wind in the poope of the ship, he was under faile in the middest of the sea of Mare Bosphorum, and that he was maruellous glad of it, and reioyced with them that failed with him, thinking himselfe certainly past tesdreame. all danger: yet fodainly againe, that all this ioy left him, and that he floted up and downe the wanes of the fea, vpon a litle peece of the ship that was broken, trusting to the mercie of the winds. As he was troubled with this ill fauored dreame, certaine of his familiars came to him & told him, that Pompey was come fo neare, that there was no shift, but they must needs fight to defend their campe. Thereupon his Captaines straight began to put his men in battell ray ready to fight. Pompey vnderstanding they prepared to make defence, was in doubt to venture his men to fight in the darke, thinking it better to compasse them in to keepe them from flying, and then in the morning to set vpon them more easily, his men being the better fouldiers. But Pompeys old captains were fo carneftly in hand with him to perswade him they might fight, that in the end he was contented they should give charge. Now it was not so darke but they could somewhat see, for the Moone that was very low and vpon her fetting, gaue light inough to discerne the body of a man; yet because the Moone was very low, the shadow which gaue out further farrethen their bodies, came almost euen to their very enemies, which did let them that they could not certainly judge what space of ground was between them, but imagining that they were hard by them, they cast their darts at the Romaines, but they hurt neuer a man, for their bodies were a great way from them. The Romaines perceining that, ran vpon them with great cries. But the barbarous people durst not abide their charge they were so afraid, but turned their backs, & ran away for life, fo that they were flaine downe right. Thus were there ten thousand of the barbarous people flain and more, and their campe also taken. As for Mithridates himselfe, at the beginning of the onset, he made a lane through the Romaine's with eight hundred horsemen, and in. passed cleanethrough them. But incontinently his men dispersed vpon it, some one way, some another way, so that he was left alone but with three persons only, whereof Hypsicratea was one of the number, which had euer been valiant and had a mans heart: whereupon, for that cause hibrida-

Mithridates called her Hypsicrates. She at that time being arrayed like a man of armes of Persia, testorubine and mounted also on a horse after the Persian maner, was never weary with any long journey called Hipa the king made, nor neuer left to waite vpon his person, and to look to his horse, vntil such time as serates for theking came to aftrong castle called Inora, where was great store of gold & filuer, and the kings ber valiant the king came to attrong cattle caned mora, where was great note of gold & muer, and the kings nesselike chiefest treasure. Howbeit Tigranes sent to let him, & further proclaimed by trumpet, that he would give a hundred talents to him that could kill him. Thereupon, passing by the head of the river of Euphrates, he fled through the countrey of Colchide. In the meanetime, Pompey inuaded the countrey of ARMENIA, at the request of Tigranes the yonger, who was revolted against his father, and went to meet with Pompey at the river of Araxes, which hath his beginning almost about the head of Euphrates: but it runneth towards the east, and falleth into Mare Caspium. So they both together marched on further into the country, receiving fuch townes as yeelded vnto them. But king Tigranes (that not long before had been consumed and destroyed by Lucullus) vnderstanding that Pompey was of a mild & gentle nature, he received his garrifons into his strongest forts and royall houses, and went himselfe with his friends and kinsmen to meet Pompey, and to yeeld himselfe vnto him. When he came hard to his camp, being a horse-back, there came out two sergeants of Pompeys & commanded him to light and go in a foot, for there was never man feene a horse-back within the Romain's campe. Tigranes did not onely obey them, but further plucked off his fword and gaue it them; and in fine, when he came almost to rompey, taking off his royall hat from his head, he would have laid it at Pompeys feete, and falling downe most shamefully on the ground, imbased himselfe to embrace Pompeys knees. But Pompey himself prevented him, and taking him by the hand, made him to fit downe by him on the one fide of him, and his fonne on the other. Then he faid vnto them both: as for the other lotles you have suffained hertosore, you must thank Lucullus forthem, who hathtaken froyou Syria, Phoenicia, Cilicia, Gala-TIA, and SOPHENA: but for that you have left you till my coming, I will let you enjoy it, paying to the Romains a fine of fixe thousand talents for the injurie you had done them, provided alfo, that your fon haue the kingdome of SOPHENA for his part. Tigranes accepted the conditions of peace. The Romaine sthen faluted him king. He was so glad thereof, that he promised to give euery souldier halfea Mina, euery Centener ten Minas, & to euery Colonellof a thousand men a talent. His sonne was very angry withall:insomuch as Pompey sending for him to come to supper to him, he answered againe, that was northefriendship he looked for at Pompeys hands, for he should find many other ROMAINES that would offer him that curtesic. Pompey for his answer. clapped him vp as a prisoner, and kept him to be led in triumph at Rom E. Shortly after, Phraates king of PARTHIA fent Ambassadors to Pompey to demand this yong Prince, that was his sonne in law, and to tell him that the river of Euphrates must be the vttermost confines of his conquests. Pompey answered againe, that Tigranes had more right to his sonne, then the father in law: and as for limiting of his borders, that he would do it with inflice. So, leaving Afranius in Ar-MENIA, to keepe the country, Pompey passed by other nations which inhabite about mount Cau. casus, having Mithridates in chase: of which nations, two of the chiefest and of greatest power, are the Albanians and Iberians. The Iberians do stretch out vnto mount Moschium, and to the realme of Pontys. The Albanians lie towards the East, and Mare Caspium. These men first suffered Pompey to passethrough their countrey, vpon his sending to them. But winter hauing stolen vponthe Romaines while they were there, and they busily occupied about Saturnes feasts: the barbarous people having leavied above fortie thousand fighting men in one cam ptogether, came and passed ouer the river of Cyrnus. (This river cometh from the mountaines of the IBERIANS, and receiving the river of Araxes into it, which paffeth through ARME-NIA, dispersed it selse into twelve severall mouths, and so falleth into Mare Caspium. Some notwithstanding hold opinion, that Cyrnus received not the river of Araxes into it, but that it runneth by it felfe, and falleth into the fame fea, neare vnto the mouths of the other.) Pompey might if he would, have kept them from comming over the river, yet did he fuffer them quietly to passe ouer. When they were all ouer, he went against them, ouercame them in battell, and slue a great number of them in the field. Afterwards he pardoned their king, submitting himself vnto Pompey by his Ambassadors, and made peace with him. Then from thence he went against the I-BERIANS, who were no leffe in number then the Albanians were at the first, and also better foldiers, and were refolutely bent to do good service vnto Mithridates, and to drive out Pompey. These IBERIANS were neuer subject to the Empire of the Persians, nor of the MEDES, and fcaped also fro being subject to the MACEDONIANS, for that Alexander neuer staid in the courty of Hyrcania: whom also Pompey ouercame in a great and bloudy battell, having slaine 9. thoufand in the field, and taken tenthousand prisoners. Fro hence he went into the country of Con-CHIDE. There Servilius met him by the river of Phasis, with the sleete of ships with the which he kept all Mare Ponticum. Now to follow Mithridates further, who had hid himfelfe amongst a people that were neighbours vnto the straights of Bosphorys, and the marishes Meotides, he found it a hard peece of worke. Furthermore also, he had newesthat the Albanians were 'The Albanians' rebelled againe, which drew him backeto be reuenged of them. Therupon he paffed againe ouer the river of Cyrnus, with great paine and danger, because the barbarous people had made gains generated. a ftrong defence a great way along the river fide, with a maruellous number of greattrees, feld in and layed acrosse one ouer another. Furthermore, when he had with great difficultie passed through them, he fell into an ill fauoured countrey, where he should trauell a great way before he could come to any water. Thereupon he caused ten thousand goates skinnes to be filled with water, and fo went forward to meete with his enemies whom he found by the river of Abas, abash. being fixe fcore thousand footmen, and twelue thousand horsemen, but all (or the most of them ill armed with wilde beafts skinnes. Their Chieftaine was Cost the kings owne brother. He, when the battell was begun, flew vpon Pompey, and threw a dart at him, and hurt him in the flancke. Pompey on the other fide, ranne him through with his lance on both fides, and flue him flarke dead. Some fay also, that there were certaine AMAZONES at this battell, which fought on the barbarous peoples fide, coming from the mountaines that runne along the river of Ther- king bromodon. For, after the ouerthrow given, the Romains s spoyling the dead, found targets and ther of the buskins of the AMAZONES, but not a bodie of a woman among them. They also do inhabite on the fide of the mountaine Caucasus that looketh towards Mare Hyrcanium, and doe not border vponthe Albanians: but the Gelb and the Leleges are betweene them, with whom der vpon the Albanians: but the Gele and the Leieges are betweene them, with whom Leieges, they companie two moneths onely energy yeare, meeting together by the riner of Thermodon; people that all the reft of the yeare they live apart by themselves. After this battell, Pompey going to inuade the countrey of HYRCANIA, as farreas Mare Caspium, he was compelled to go backe againe for the infinitenumber of deadly venimous serpents which he met with being come within three dayes iourney of it. So he returned backeagaine into Armenia the leffe, and there receiued presents which were sent unto him from the kings of the ELYMIANS and the MEDES,& wrote very curteoufly vnto them againc: howbeit he fent Afranius with part of his army against the king of the PARTHIANS, who had inuaded the countrey of GORDINEA, and harried and spoyled the king Tigranes subjects. Notwithstanding he draue him out, and followed him wnto Arbelltide. Furthermore, all the lemmans and concubines of King Mithridates being brought vnto Pompey, he would touch none of them, but fent them all home agains to their parents and friends, because the most of them were either the daughters of Princes, of Noblemen, Stratonice, or of Captaines. Notwithstanding, Stratonice that of all the rest of his lemmans had most credit Attistical about Mithridates, vnto whom he had left the charge of his castle, where the greatest part of his testings treasure of gold and silver lay, was a singers daughter, who (as they said) was not rich, but an old man. She hauing fung one night before Mithridates, being at fupper, he fell in fuch fancy with her, that he would needs have her lie with him the fame night, and the old man her father went home offended, because the king would not so much as give him one gentle word. But the next morning when he arose, he maruelled to see the tables in his house ful of plate of gold and silver, and a great companie of feruingmen, groomes of chamber and pages, and that they had brought him maruellous rich apparel, & a horfe ready at the gates brauely furpished, as the kings familiars did vse when they went abroad into the city the thought it was done in mockery, to have made fport with him, and therfore would have run his way, had not the foruingmen kept him, and told him that they were a great rich mas goods that died of late, which the king had bestowed on him and that all this he faw, was but a litle portion in respect of the other goods & landshe gaue him. So the old man beleeuing them, at the length did put on this purple gowne they brought him, and gotvp on horsbacke, & riding through the streets, cried, Althis is mine, althis is mine. Certaine laughing him to feorne for it, he told them : Mafters, ye may not wonder to heare me thus crie out, but rather, that I throw not stones at them I meete, I am so mad for ioy. Such was Stratonices birth and parentage, as we have told you. She did then deliver this castle into Pompeys hands, and offered him many goodly rich presents, but he would take none of them, other then abolimence fuch as ferued to adorne the temples of the gods, and to beautifie his triumph, and left all the formating rest with Stratonice her selfe, to dispose as she thought good. In like manner also, the King of of stiffs. the I B E R I A N S, having fent him a bed-steed, a table, & a chaire of cleane gold, praying him to take it as a remembrance from him: he delinered it oner vnto the Treasurers custodie, to be accountable for it vnto the Senate. In another castle called Cœnon, he found certaine secret letters sent from Mithridates, which pleased him maruellously to reade, because thereby he plainly vnderstood the kings nature and inclination. For in them were mentioned that he had poisoned (besides many other) Ariarathes his owne sonne, and Alcaus the SARDINIAN, because he had wonne the bell, at the horf-race before him. There was also interpreting of dreames, that either himselfe or his wives had dreamed, and also loue-letters betwixt Monime and him Theophanes writeth also, that there was found an oration of Rutilius, in the which he inticed and perswaded Muhridates to put all the Romaines to death that were in Asia. Howbeit in reason men thinke that this was a shamefull lie, maliciously deuised by Theophanes, who hated Rutilius, because he was but a counterfet to him:or paraduenture to gratiste Pompey, whose father Rutslius in his histories describeth to be as wicked a man as ever lived. Thence Pompey departed towards the citie of Amisvs. There his ambition brought him to commit such facts, as he himselfedid condemne before in Lucullus: for that his enemie being yet aliue, he tooke vpon him to establish lawes, to give gifts, and distribute such honors, as Captaines that had obtained victory were wont to do, when they had ended all warreand trouble. For he himselfe (Mithridates being yet the ftronger in the realme of Bosp HoRvs, and having a great puissant armie about him) did all that which he reproued another for appointing prouinces, and giuing out gifts to euery man according as he deserved to gratifie twelve barbarous kings, with divers other Princes, Lords and Captaines that came to him thither. Writing also to the king of PARTHIA, he disdained to give him that title, which others were wont to do in the direction of their letters, calling him king of kings. Furthermore, he had a wonderfull great defire to winne Syria, and to go through the countrey of Anania, even vnto the red sea, because he might enlarge his conquests and victories euery way, euen vnto the great sea Oceanum, that compasseth all the whole earth, For in Ly-BIA, he was the first ROMAINE that conquered all to the great sea. On the other side, in Spaine he calarged the Empire of Rome, and brought the confines thereof vnto Marc Atlanticum. And thirdly, having lately the ALBANIAN's in chase, he came almost vnto Mare Hyrcanium. Thus he put himselse in journey, intending his circuit vnto the red sea, specially because he saw Mithridates so ill to follow, and worse to ouercome by force when he fled, then when he fought any battell: and that made him say, that he would leave a sharper enemie behind him then himselfe; and that he meant famine. For he appointed fouldiers with sufficient number of ships, to lie in waite for the merchants that failed to the countrey of Bosphorvs, to cary them any victuals or other merchandizes, prohibiting them vpon paine of death that should attempt it. Then he went forward with the best part of his armie, and in his way, found the bodies of the dead Ro-MAINES Which Mithridates had ouerthrowne vnder the leading of Triarius their Captaine, and were yet vnburied. So he caused them all to be taken vp, and honorably buried. Lucullus hauing. forgotien, or otherwise neglected to do it, in my conscience that was the chiefest cause why his men did hate him. Pompey now having by Afranius subdued the Arabians dwelling about mount Amanus, went himselse in person into Syraa, and made a gouernment & province of it, being wonne to the ROMAINE Empire, for that it lacked a lawfull king; and conquered all Ive IE alfo, where he tooke king Arishabulus, and builded certaine cities there, and delivered others alfo from bondage, which by tyrants were forcibly kept, whom he chastised well inough. Howbeit he spent the most part of his time there, deciding of controuersies, pacifying of contentions and quarels by arbiterment, which fell out betwixt the free cities, princes and kings, and fent of his friends into those places where he could not come himselfe. For on a time when he was chosen arbitrator betwixt the Parthians and the Armenians, touching the title of a country which both parties claimed, he sent three Commissioners thither to judge definitively betwixt them both. If Pompeys fame and renowne were great, no leffe was his vertue, inflice and liberality, which indeed did hide many faults, his freinds and familiars about him did commit. For truly he was of so gentle a nature, that he could neither keepe them from offending, nor yet punish them when they had offended. Notwithstanding, he did vse them so well that complained vnto him, or that had to deale with him in any matter, that he made them contented patiently to beare their couctousnesseand straight dealing. One of his chiefest familiars about him whom he loued best, was called Demetrius, a bondma infranchised, who otherwise was very discreet in his doings, but being somewhat too bold of his good fortune: of him they make this mention. Cato the Philosopher being at that time a yong man, yet of good judgement and of a noble mind, in Pompeys

Pompeys absence went to see the city of Antioch. Now for himselfe, his maner was alwaics to go on foot, and all his friends besides that did accompany him to honor him, were on horsback. He perceiuing afarre off, a great fort of people comming towards him all in white, and of one fide of the freet litle children; and on the other boyes, round about them as in a ring: at the first he was angry withall, thinking they had done it for his fake to honour him, that they made this procession, which he in no wife would have had done. Thereupon he commanded his friends to light from their horses, and go on foot with him. But when they came neare to the gate of the citie, the maister of the ceremonies that led this procession, having a garland on his head, and a rod in his hand, came vnto them, and asked them, where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come ? Catoes friends laughed to heare this question : then said Cato, Alas poore citie: and fo passed by it. Notwithstanding, Pompey himselfe was cause that Demetrius had the lesse ill will Demetrius, borne him, then other wife he should have had because they saw how boldly he would vse Pom- franchiled pey, and how well he would take it without offence. It is reported, that when Pompey often-bondman. times had bidden fome to dinner or supper, while he was entertaining and welcoming of them, and would tarie till they were all come; Demetrius would be set at the boord, and presumptuoufly hauehis head couered euen to the very eares. And furthermore, before he returned into ITALIE out of his journey, he had already purchased the goodliest houses of pleasure, and fairest walkes that were about Rome, and had sumptuous gardens also, the which the people commonly called, Demetrius gardens: though his maister Pompey was but meanely housed till his third Confulship. Howbeit afterwards, he built that famous stately Theater, called Pompeys Theater, and joyned vnto that also another house, as a penthouse to his Theater, far more sumptuous and stately then the first, and yet no more then needed. Infomuch as he that was owner of it after him, when he came into it, he maruelled, and asked whereabouts it was that Pompey dined and supped. These things are reported thus. Now the king of the Arabians, that dwelt about the castle cassed Petra, having neuer vntill that time made any account of the Komaines armie, was then greatly afraid of them, and wrote vnto Pompey, that he was at his denotion, to do what he would command him. Pompey thereupon to proue him, whether he meant as he spake, Petrea, Sub. brought his army before this castle of Petra. Howbeit this voyage was not liked of many men, mitten him because they judged it was an occasion found out to leaue following of Mithridates, against pompey. whom they would have had him rather have bent his force, being an ancient enemie to Kome and that began to gather strength againe, and prepared (as they hard say) to leade a great armie through Scythia and Pannonia into Italie. But Pompey thinking he should sooner minish his power by suffering him to go on with warres, then that he should otherwise beable to take him flying :would not toile to follow him in vaine. And for these causes he would needs make warres in other places, and linger time fo long, that in the end he was put by his hope. For when he was not farre from the castle of Petra, and had lodged his campe for that day: as he was riding and managing hishorse vp and downe the campe, posts came slinging to him from the realme of Pontys, and brought him good newes, as was eafily to be difcerned a farre off by the heads of their iauelings, which were wreathed about with lawrell boughs. The fouldiers perceiuing that, flocked straight about him: but Fompey would make an end of his riding first, before he read these letters. Howbeit they crying to him, and being importunate with him, he lighted from his horse, and returned into his campe, where there was no stone high enough for him to stand vpon to speake vnto them; and againe, the fouldiers would not tarie the making of one after the maner of their camp, which men of war do make themselues, with great turues of earth, laying one of them upon another: but for haste and earnest desire they had to heare what newes there was in the letters, they laid together a heape of faddles one vponanother, and Pompey getting vp on them, told how Mithridates was dead, and had killed himselfe with his owne hands, because Minimida. his sonne Pharnaces didrebell against him, and had wonne all that which his father possessed: writing vnto him, that he kept it for himfelfe and the Romaines. Vpon these newes, all the campe, ye may imagine, made wonderfull ioy, and did facrifice to the gods, giving them thankes and were as meric, as if in Mithridates person alone, there had died an infinite number of their enemies. Pompey by this occasion, having brought this warre more easily to passe then he hoped for, departed presently out of ARABIA; and having speedily in few dayes passed through the countries lying by the way, he came at length to the citie of Am is vs. There he found great prefents that were brought vnto him from Pharnaces, and many dead bodies of the kings bloud, and amongst the rest, Mithridates corse, which could not well be discerned by his face, because they that had the carying of his bodie had forgotten to drie up the braine, neuertheleffe, fuch as defired to fee him, knew him by certaine scarres he had in his face. For Pompey would in no wife fee him but to avoide envie fent him away vnto the citie of Sinore. He wondered much at the maruellous fumptuous rich apparell and weapons that he wore. The scabbard of his sword (which cost four chundred valents) was stolen by Public, and sold to Ariarathes. Also a hat of Mithridates, of wonderfull workemanship, being begged of Caius his foster brother was secretly giuen to Faustus the son of Sylla, without Pompeys prinity. But afterwards when Pharnaces vnderstood of it, he punished the parties that had imbezelled them. Pompey having ordered all things. and established that province, went on his journey homewards with greater pomp & glorie. So comming vnto MITYLENE, he released the citie of all taxes and payments for Theophanes sake, Pompeyere, and was present at a certaine play they yearely make for games, where the Poets report their works contending one with another, having at that time no other matter in hand, but Pompeys acts & gefts. Pomper liked exceeding wel of the Theater where these plaies were made and drew a modell or platforme of it, to make a statelier then that in Rome. As he passed by the citie of RHODES, he would need sheare althe Rhetoritians dispute, & gaue every one of them a talent. Polidonius had written the disputation he made before Pompey, against Hermagoras the Rhetoritian, vpon the theame and proposition Pompey selfe did give them, touching the generall question. Pompey did the like at ATHENS vnto the Philosophers there. For he ganetowards the redifying of the city againe, fiftie talents. So he thought at his returne home into ITALY, to have bin very honorably received, and longed to be at home to fee his wife & children, thinking also that they long looked for him:but the god that hath the charge given him to mingle fortunes profperity with some bitter sop of aduersity, laid a block in his way at home in his own house, to make his returne more forowful. For Mutia his wife had in his absence played false at tables. But Pomper being then farre off, made no account of the reports nor tales that were told him. Howbeit, when he drew neare vnto ITALIE, and that he was more attentiue to give eare to the ill reports he heard, then he fent vnto her to tell her, that he refused her for his wife, writing nothing to her at that time, neither euer after told the cause why he had for saken her. Notwithstanding, in Ciceroes Epifeles, the cause appeareth. Furthermore, there were rumors ranne abroad in Rome. which troubled them fore, being given out that he would bring his army straight to Rome, and make himselfe absolute Lord of althe Romaine Empire, Crassus therupon, either for that he be. lecued it indeed to be true, or (as it was thought) to make the accufation true, and the enuie towards Pompey the greater, conveyed himself, his family & goods sodainly out of Rome. So Pomper when he came into ITALIE, called all his fouldiers together, and after he had made an oratio vnto them, as time and occasion required, he commanded them to seuer themselves, and every man to repaire home to apply his businesse, remembring to meet at Roma together at the day of his triumph, His army being thus dispersed, and straight reported abroad for newes, a maruellous thing hapened vnto him. The cities feeing Pompey the Great without foldiers, having but a small traine about him of his familiar friends only, went al of them to meet him, not as though he were returned home from his great conquests, but from some journey taken for his pleasure. Such was the love of the people to him, that they accompanied him to Rome, whether he would or not, with a greater power then that he had brought into ITALIE: fothat if he had beene disposed to haue made any innovation in the common wealth, he had not needed his army. In those dayes there was a law, that no man shold enter into Rom B before his triumph, wher upon Pompey sent to the Senate, to pray them to defer the chusing of Consuls for a few daies, because he might be present to further Pife, who sued for the Consulfhip that yeare. They denied him his request, by Caloes means that hindred it Pompey maruelling to heare of his boldnesand plaine speech, which he only vsed of all other to defend his just causes, had a maruellous defire to win him, & to make him his friend. So Cato having 2. neeces, Pompey defired to mary the one himself, & the other for cate refift his fon. But Cate mistrusting this desire of Pompey, that it was a colour onely to win and corrupt him, denied him flatly. His wife & fifter on the other fide, they were angry with him for refuling to make alliance with Pompey the great. About that time it chanced, that Pompey being very defirous to prefer Afranius to be Conful, he caused certain mony to be given among the tribes of the eaple. & the fame was delinered out to fome, euen in his owne gardens. This thing being reporand in the city, euery man spake ill of Pompey; that he put the Consulship to sale for mony vnto those that could not deserue it by vertue, sith himselfe onely had obtained it by purchase of many a noble and worthy deed. Then faid Cato to his wife and fifter Loe now, we had been partakers of this fault too, had we matched with Pompey. When they heard it, they confessed he had reason to resuse the match, for equitie and his honour. But now to his triumph. For the Forsteys ftatelinesse and magnificence therof, although he had two dayes space to shew it, yet he lacked time for there were many things prepared for the shew, that were not seene, which would have ferued to have fet out another triumph. First there were tables caried, whereon were written the names and titles of all the people and nations for the which he triumphed, as these that follow: The kingdome of Pontys, Armenia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, Media, Colchis, The coun-IBERIA, ALBANIA, SYRIA, CILICIA, and MESOPOTAMIA: and furthermore, the people eries conthat dwellabout Phoenicia and Palæstine, Ivdæa, and Arabia: and all the pyrates queed by which he had ouercome both by fea and by land, in all parts of the world. In all these countries he tooke about a thousand castles, few lesse then nine hundred townes and cities: of pyrates ships eight hundred; and nine and thirty desolate townes left without inhabitants, replenished againe with people by him. Moreouer, these tables declared, that the reuenue of the commonwealth of Rome before these conquests he made, amounted yearely but to fine thousand Miriades: and that from thenceforth with the fummes he had added vnto the former reuenue, they should now receive eight thousand and fine hundred Miriades: and that he brought presently in readie gold and filuer, and in plate and iewels, to put into the common treasurie, the value of twenty thousand talents, besides that which had been distributed alreadie among the souldiers: of the which, he that had least for his share, had 15 hundred Drachmacs. The prisoners that were led in the shew of this triumph, besides the Captains of the pyrats, were these that follow: The fonne of Tigranes king of ARMENIA, with his wife and daughter: the wife of king Tigranes himfelfe, called Zosime: Aristobulus king of Ivry: Mithridates fifter, with fine sonnes of hers, and led in Pom fome Ladies of Scythia. The hostages also of the IEERIANS and the Albanians and also triumbh. of the kings of the Commagenians : ouer and besides a great number of other markes of triumphs which himselfe or his Lieutenant had wonne at fundry battels in diuers places. But the greatest honor that ever he wan, and which never other Conful of the Romaines but himselfe Fompey obtained, was this, that he made his third triumph of the three parts of the world. Diuers other conquered Romaines had triumphed thrife before him: how beit he first triumphed of Africk Ethe se- three parts cond time of Evrope: the third time of Asia. So that it appeared by these three triumphs, that he hadtriumphed in maner of all the land that is inhabited, being at that time (as it is reported frick, Enforcement). by them which compare his doings vnto Alexander the Great) vnder 34 yeares of age, though in troth at that time he was neare forty. O happy had it bin for him, if he had died when he had Alexanders fortune: for all his life afterwards, made his prosperity hatefull, or his aduersity miferable:imploying the honor and authority he had gotten by his valiantnesse, fauoring mens vn. fire the iust causes: the more he furthered them, the more he lessened his honor, & vnawares brought his age offenty greatnessette more ne ratthered them, the more ne rettered and notice, which receiving their enemies into them, do give them the benefite of their owne strength: even so through Pompeys pow- of Pompeys er, Cafar growing to be great, ouerthrew him in the end with the felfe fame meanes he imploi- fortune and ed to the ouerthrow of others. And thus it fortuned: Lucullus at his returne out of As IA (where Pompey had vncurteoufly vsed him) was then very well taken of the Senate, and much more beleased of when Pompey was also come to Rome. For the Senate did counsell and encourage him to deale the Senate in the affaires of the state, seeing him waxe very slow, and given to much to his ease & pleasure, turne out of by reason of his great wealth he had gotte. So when Pompey was come, he began to speak against Luculus in. him; and through the friendship and affistance of Cato, confirmed all his doings in As 1A, which useda. Pompey had broken and rejected. Pompey finding he had fuch a repulse of the Senate, was driven gainst to have recourse vnto the Tribunes of the people, and to fall in friendship with light yong men. Of the Tribunes, the most impudent and vilest person was Clodius, who received him, and made flance him a prey vntothe people. For he had Pompey euer at his elbow, and against his honour caried him vp and down the market place after him, to speake as occasion ferued, to confirme any matter or deuice which he preferred vnto him to flatter the common people. And further, for reco- Tribune of pence of his goodwill, he craued of Pompey (not as a thing dishonorable, but beneficial for him) that he would for sake Cicero, who was his friend, and had done much for him in matters of com- for saketh monwealth. Pompey granted his request. Thereupon Cicero being brought in danger of law, and his friend requiring Pompeys friendship to helpe him, he shut his doore against them that came to speake in his behalfe, and went out himselfe at another backe doore. Cicero therupon fearing the extremity of law, willingly forfooke Rome. At that time, Inline Cafar returning home from his Pratorship out of Spains, began to lay such a plot, that presently brought him into great fauour. and afterwards much increased his power, but otherwise vtterly vndid Pempey and the common wealth. Now he was to fue for his first Consulfhip, and considering the emnitic betwixt Pompey and Crassus, if he joyned with the one, he made the other his enemie: he denised to make them friends, a thing feeming of great honesty at the first fight, but yet a pestilent device, and as lubtill a practife as could be. For the power of the citie being before deuided into two parts (as a ship eucnly ballast of each side) maintained the commonwealth vpright; and being now brought into one mans power, there was no possibilitie to withstand it, so that all fell to wracke in the end. Whereupon Cato wifely told them afterwards, that faid, the civill warres betwixt Pompey and Cafar was cause of the destruction of the commonwealth: that their emnitie and discord was not the chiefe original cause of this miserie, but rather their friendship and agreement. For by their friendship Casar was chosen Consul, who straight fell to flatter the people and poore men, and made a law for the restoring of the colonies belonging to Rome and for distributing of lands to them that had none, imbasing the maiestic and dignity of the chiefe Magistrates, and making the Consulship in maner no better then the Tribuneship of the people. Bibulus his colleague and fellow Confull, did what he could to refift him, and Case also did aide him to his power, until Cofar openly brought Pompey into the pulpit for orations before the people, and calling him by his name, asked him if he did give his confent to the decrees which he did fer forth. Pompey answered him, he did. Why then, faid Cafar, if any man will by force let the paffing of this law by voices of the people, wilt thou then come to helpe them ? Yes that I will indeed, faid Pompey: against them that threaten with the sword, I will bring both sword and target. Pompey in all his life neuer did nor spakething that men more misliked, then that which he faid at that time. His friends excused him, and said it was a word passed his mouth before he was aware: but his deeds afterwards shewed, that he was altogether at Casars commandement. For not many dayes after, he maried Iulia the daughter of Cafar, which was affianced or made fure before vnto Seruilius Capio, when no man thought of it and to pacific Capioes anger, he gave him his owne daughter in mariage, whom he had also promifed before vnto Faustus the sonne of Sylla : and Cafar also maried Calphurnia the daughter of Pifo. After this, Pompey filling all Rome with foldiers, did what he would by force. For as the Conful Bibulus came into the market place accompanied with Lucullus and Cato, they fodginly fet upon him, and brake the bundles of rods which his officers caried before him and some one, what soeuer he was, cast a basket of horsedung vpon his head. Moreouer, the two Tribunes that were in his company, were also very fore hurt. By this meanes having cleared the market place of all their enemies, they passed the law for diuision of lands, as they wold themselues. The people being steshed with this bait, were contented to be ruled by them as they would, and wold never flick at any matter that they would have passed. So were all Pompeys matters confirmed, which Lucullus was against and they appointed vnto Cafaralfo, the gouernmet of the GAVLES on this fide and beyond the Alpesiand ILLYRIA for flue yeares space, with four whole legions. The next day following were appointed Confuls, Pilo Cafars father in law, and Gabinius the greatest flatterer Pompey had about him. But now while things flood in these termes, Bibulus though he were Confull, kept himselfe close in his house for 8. moneths space, and only sent out bils, and set them up on cuery post in open places, accusing Pompey and C. efar. Cato on the other side, as if he had been inspired with the spirit of prophefic told openly in the Senate house, what would become of the commonwealth and Pompey. Lucullus growing old, lay still and tooke his pleasure, & would no more meddle in the common wealth. At that time it was that Pompey faid, it was more vnseafonable for an old man to follow his pleafure, then to attend matters of the comonwealth. Yet himselfe shortly after was so doted of his yong wife, that he would follow her vp and downe in the country, and in his gardens, and clodius the leave all affaires of weight afide. Wherupon Clodius being then Tribune of the people, despised Pompey, and began to enter into feditious attempts. For when he had driven Cicero out of Rome and had fent away Cato to make warres in Cyprvs, and that Cafar also was occupied in GAVLE, and finding that the people in like case were at his commandement, because to flatter them he did what they would have him: he attempted incontinently to vido fome thing that Pompey had established. Amongst other things, he tooke yong Tigranes out of prison, & euer carled him vp & down with him wherefocuer he went, and continually pickt quarels vnto Pompeys friends, to trie what credit he had. In the end Pompey coming abroad one day into the comon affembly, to heare how a matter of his was handled, this Clodius having a company of vagabonds and desperate men about him, that cared not what they did: he sitting in a place where he might be feene from the reft, began to aske these questions out aloud: Who is the licentiousest Captaine in all this city? What man is he that feekes for a man? What is he that feratcheth his head with one finger: They, like a company of dancers and fingers, when he spake and clapped his hands on his gowne, answered him straight aloud to enery question, that it was Pompey. This went pompey was to Pompeys heart, that was not wont to heare himselfe so ill spoken of openly, neither was acquainted with any fuch kind of fight: but yet it made him bite the lippe more, when he faw the cloding Senate glad to fee him thus ashamed and reproued, as a just revenge and punishment for his vile betraying and for faking of cicero. So great stirre and vprore being made vpon this in the market place, and many men fore hurt, and one of clodins bondmen being taken also in the preasse of the people with a fword in his hand, very neare vnto Pompey: making this his colour (but otherwise fearing Cledius insolencie and proud words) he would neuer after come into the market place, as long as Clodino was Tribune, but kept at home still, consulting with his friends what way he should take to appease the anger of the Senate against him. Thereupon, one of his friends called Culeo, perswaded him to put away his wife Iulia, and vtterly to refuse Casars friend. ship, and to sticke againe to the Senate: but he would none of that. Notwithstanding he was contented to hearken vnto them that gaue him counfell to call Gicere home againe, who was Clodius mortall enemie, and in great fauour with the Senate. Thereupon, he brought Ciceroes brother into the market place, to mouethe matter to the people, with a great number of men about him, where they fell to blowes, and diuerse were staine of either side: notwithstanding, he ouercame Clodius. Thus Cicero being called home by decree of the people, when he was come, he brought Pompey againe in fauour with the Senate, and standing with the law propounded to give Pompey authoritie to cause corne to be brought to Rome, he once againe made him have power both by land and sea over all the teritories of the ROMAINES. For all the hauens, marts, and faires, and all flore houses of corne, yea moreouer all the trade of merchan- commission dize and tillage, came vnder Pompeys hands. Then Clodius accusing him, said: that the Senate had from peys for not made this law for the dearth of victuals, but that they made a dearth of victuals, because bringing of the law should passe, to review Pompeys power and authority againe, that was almost vider foot. Other say, that this was a deuice of Lentulus Spinther the Consull, who gave Pompey the greater authoritie, because he might be sentto putking Prolomy againe into his kingdome. This not withstanding, Canidius the Tribune preferred another law to fend Pompey without an army, with ing against two Sergeants onely to cary the axes before him, to bring Ptolomie in fauour againe with the of Ptolomie king of E-ALEXANDRIANS. This law seemed not to mislike Pompey: but the Senate with honest colour appropriate put by this law, as being affraid lest Pompeys person should miscarrie in so doing. Neuerthelesse, "sealme. litle papers were found throwne about the market place, and the Senate-house, declaring that Ptolomie desired Pompey might come to aide him in Spinthers stead. Timagenes writeth notwithstanding, that Ptolomic went to Rome, and left Aoyer, without any occasion given him. at the persuasion of Theophanes, who persuaded him to do so, because he would give Pompey occasion to make new warres. But Theophanes craft and subtilty made northis matter so credible, as Pompeys wit and good nature made it altogether vntrue: for his ambition was nothing fo vile or ill, as that was So Pompey having now full authoritie to cause corne to be brought to ROME, he sent then his Lieutenants and friends abroade, and himselfe in person went into SI-CILE. Now being ready to return again, there arose such a storme of wind in the sea, that the mariners were in doubt to wey their ankers. But himfelfe first imbarked, and commanded them straightto hoise faile, crying out aloud, It is of necessity I must go, but not to line. So, through his boldnesse and good spirit, vsing the good fortune he had, he filled all the places of mart, and markets with corne, and all the fea befides with ships: in so much, the plenty he brought did not only furnish the city of Rome, but all their neighbours also about them, and came like a lively fpring that dispersed it selfe through all ITALIE. About that time, the great conquests that Casar made in Gavre, did set him aloft. For when they thought that he was occupied in warres far from Rome, with the Belgians, Svvisses, and Englishmen, he by secret practise, was in the middest among the people at Rome, and most against Pompey in the weightiest affaires of the common wealth. For he had the power of an army about his person, which he did harden with paines and continuall practife, not with intentto fight only against the barbarous people: for the battels he had with them, were in manner but as a hunting sport, by the which he made himfelfe inuincible, and dreadfull to the world. But furthermore, by the infinite gold and filter, and the incredible spoils and treasure which he wan vpon the enemies whom he had ouercome: and by fending great prefents also to Rome, to the Ædiles, Prætors, Confuls, and their wives, he purchased him many friends. Therfore, after he had passed over the Alpesagaine, and was come to winter in the city of Lv ca, a world of people (both men and women) and of the Senate themselues almost two hundred persons (and amongst them, Crassius & Pompey by name) went out of Rome vnto him. Furthermore, there were seene at Casars gate, fixescore Sergeants carying axes before Prætors, or Proconsuls. So Casar sent cuery one backe againe, either full of money, or good words: but with Pompey and Crassus, he made a match, that they two together should suctobe Consuls, and that he himselfe would send them good aide to Rome, at the day of election, to give their voyces. And if they were chosen, that they should then practise by decree of the people, to haue the gouernments of some new provinces and armies affigned them: and withall, that they should adiorne the government of those provinces he had, for five yeares more. This packe being bewrayed and spread abroad through Rome, the honestest fort misliked much thereof. Whereupon Marcellinus at an open affembly of the people, did aske them both, if they would fue for the Consulship at the next election. So, they being vrged by the people to make answer, Pompey spake first, and said: peraduenture he would, peraduenture not. Crassus answered more gently, that he would doe that which should be best for the commonwealth. Then Marcellinus sharply inueying against Pompey, he angerly againe cast him in the teeth, and said, that Marcellinus was the rankest churle, and the vnthankfullest beast in the world: for that of a dumb man he had madehim eloquent, and being in maner starued & famished, many a time he had filled his belly. This notwithstanding, divers that before were determined to fue for the Consulship, went no further in it, sauing Lucius Domitius, whom Cato counselled and incouraged not to give it ouer: for, faid he, thou doest not contend for the Consulship, but to defend the common libertie of thy country against two tyrants. Pompey therefore fearing Catoes faction, lest that having all the Senates goodwils, he should draw also the best part of the people after him, thought it not good to suffer Domitius to come into the market place. To this end therefore, he sent men armed against him, who at the first onset, sluethetorch-bearer that caried the torch beforehim, and made all the rest to slie: amongst whom also Cato was the last man that retired, who was hurt in his elbow defending of Domitius. Pompey & Craffus being become Cofuls after this fort, they ordered themselues nothing the more temperatly, nor honestly. For first of all, the people being about to chuse Cato Prætor, Pompey being at the affembly of the election, perceiuing that they would chuse him, brakevp the assembly, falsly alledging that he had noted certaine ill fignes; and afterwards, the tribes of the people being bribed and corrupted with money, they chose Antias and Vatinius Prætors. Afterthat, by Trebonius Tribunc of the people, they published Edicts, authorifing Cafars charge for fine yeares longer, according to the appointment they had made with Cefar. Voto Crassus also they had appointed Syria, and the warreagainst the Parthians. Vnto Pompey in like case, all Africk E, and both Spaines, with foure legions besides : of the which, at Casars desire, he lent him two Legions to helpe him in his warre in GAVLE. These things done, Crassus departed to his prouince, at the going out of his Confulship; and Pompey remained at ROMB about the dedicating of his Theater, where he caused many goodly playes to be made, both for exercise of person, as also for learning and muficke, and caused wild beasts also to be baited and hunted, and killed fiue hundred Lions. But of all things, there was no such fearfull fight and terrible fight, as was betweene the Elephants. This great charge and bountifull expence, defrayed by Pompey, to shew the people pastime and pleasure, made him againe to be very much esteemed of, and beloued amongst the people. But on the other side, he wan himselfe as much ill will and enuie, in committing the gonernment of his Prouinces and Legions into the hands of his Lieutenants, whileft he himselfe romed up and downe the pleasant places of ITALY, with his wife at his pleasure : either because he was farre in loue with her, or elfe for that she loued him so dearly, that he could not find in his hart to leave her company. It was reported of her (being knowne of many) that this young Lady Iulia loued her husband more dearly, not for Pompeys flourishing age, but for his affured continence, knowing no other woman but her:besides also, he was no solemne man, but pleasant of conversation, which made women loue him maruelloufly, vnleffe we will reproue the curtifan Floraestestimony. It is certaine, that at an election of the Ædiles, men rising suddenly in hurly burly, drew their fwords, and many were flaine about Pompey: infomuch as his clothes being bloudied, he fent his men home in haste to fetch him other to change him. His young wife that was great with child, seeing his clothes bloudie, took such a flight vpon it, that she fell down in a swound before them, that they had much ado to recour her; and yet she fell straight in labout ypon it, and was delinered. So that they themselves, which blamed him most for his good wil he bare vnto Casar, could not reproue the loue he bare vnto his wife. Another time after that, she was great with child againe, whereof she died, and the child lived not many dayes after the mother. As Pompey was about to carie her into the countrey to be buried, to a house he had there neare vnto the city of Alba, the people by force took her corfe, and caried it into the field of Mars, more for the daughter of pitie they tooke of the young Ladie, then to pleasure either Casar or Pompey: and yet what the Casar. people did for them, it appeared rather they did it more for Cafars fake being absent, then for Pompey that was present. But straight when his alliance was broken, which rather concredithen bridled their ambitious defire to rule, there arose a new stirrein Rome immediatly, and every mans mouth was full of prittle prattle and seditious words. Not long after that also came newes that Crassus was overthrowne, and flaine in PARTHIA; who was a manifest stay and let to keepe diffention them two from civill warres, for that they both feared him, and therefore kept themselves in a between reasonable sort together. But when fortune had taken away this third champion, who could have Pompey & withstood the better of them both that had our come the other, then might have beene said of these two which remained, as the comicall Poet said:

See how thefe champions purposing each others force to trie. With pointed skin, and dustic hands, stand vaunting valiantly.

So litle can fortune prenaile against nature, having no power to stop couctousnesse: sith so large and great an Empire, and fuch a wide countrey besides, could not containe the couctous desire of these two men. But though they had often both heard and read:

Among the gods themselves all things by lot divided are. And none of them intrudes himselfe within his neighbours share.

Yet they thought that the Empire of Rome was not inough for them, which were but two But Pompey spake openly in an oration he made vnto the people, that he euer came to office beforche looked for it, and also left it sooner then they thought he would have done: and that he witneffed by discharging his army so soone. Then thinking that Casar would not discharge his army, he fought to make himself strong against him, by procuring offices of the city, without any other alteration. Neither would he seeme to mistrust him, but he plainly shewed, that he did defpise and contemne him. But when he saw that he could not obtaine the offices of the city as he would, because the citizens that made the elections were bribed with mony, he then left it without a magisfrate, so that there was none either to command, or that the people should obey. Hereuponthere ran a bruite straight, that there must needs be a Distator made, and the first man that propounded it, was Lucilius Tribune of the people, who perswaded them to chose Pompey. But Cato stucke so stoutly against it, that the Tribune had like to have lost his office, even in the market place. But then many of Pompeys friends stepped vp, and excused him, faying : that he neither fought, nor would have the Dictatorship. Then Cato commended him much, and prayed him to fee good order kept in the common wealth. Pompey being ashamed to deny so reasonable a request, was carefull of it. Thereupon two Consuls were chosen, Domitius, and Messalas but afterwards when the state began to change againe by the death of one of the Consuls, and that diuers were more earnestly bent to haue a Dictator then before, Caso searing it would breake out with fury, determined to giue Pompey some office of reasonable authoritie, to keep him from the mong these. other moretyrannicall. Infomuch, as Bibulus himselfe beingchiefe of the Senate, & Pompeys encmy, was the first that moved Pompey might be chosen Confull alone: for, said he, by this means, perhoner. cither the common weelsh shall be rid of the present trouble or elle it shall be in bondagers on Cato spake either the common wealth shall be rid of the present trouble or else it shall be in bondage to an in Pompeys honcst man. This opinion was maruelled at, in respect of him that spake it. Whereupon, Cato favour. standing up, it was thought straight he would have spoken against him: but silence being made him, he plainely told them, that for his owne part he would not have beene the first man to have propounded that was spoken: but sithence it was spoken by another, that he thought it reasonable and meete to be sollowed. And therefore, said he, it is better to have an Officer to command, what soeuer he be, rather then none; and that he saw no man fitter to command, then Pompey, info trouble fome a time. All the Senate liked his opinion, and ordained that Pompey should be chosen fole Consull: and that if he saw in his discretion he should need the affistance of another companion, he might name any whom he thought good, but not till two moneths were past. Thus was Pompey made Consull alone by Sulpitius, regent for that day. Then Pompey made verie friendly countenance vnto Cato, and thanked him for the honour he had done him. praying him privately to affift him with his counfell in the Confulfhip. Cato answered him, than there was no cause why he should thanke him, for he had spoken nothing for his sake but for respect of the common wealth only and for his counsel, if he wold aske it, he should privatly have it, if not, yet that he would openly fay that which he thought. Such a man was Cato in all his doings. Now Pompey returning into the citie, maried Cornelia, the daughter of Metellus Scipio, not a maiden, but late the widow of Publius Crassus the sonne, that was slaine in PARTHIA, to whom shee was maried a maiden. This Ladie had excellent gifts to be beloued besides her daughter of beautie: for the was properly learned, could play well on the harpe, was skilfull in muficke and Geometrie, and took e great pleasure also in Philosophy, and not vainly without some profit. For she was very modest and sober of behauior, without brawling and foolish curiosity, which commonly young women haue that are indued with fuch fingular gifts. Her father also, was a noble man, both in bloud and life. Not with standing, these will ke mariages did nothing please some for Cornelia was young inough to have beene his fonnes wife. Now the best citizens thought, that therein heregarded not the care of the commonwealth, being in fuch a troublesome time, which had chosen him onely, as her remedy to redresse the same; and that he in the meane timegaue himselfe ouerto marying & feasting, where rather he should have bin careful of his Consulfhip, which was disposed vpon him against the law for comon calamities sake, that otherwise he had not come by, if all had been quiet. Furthermore, he sharply proceeded against them which by bribery and vnlawfull meanes came to office: and having made lawes and ordinances for the administration of iustice, otherwise he dealt iustly and vprightly in all things, giving safety, order, filence and granitie, to matters of judgement, with force of armes, himselfe being present saving that when his father in law was also accused among other, he sent for three hundred and threefcore Iudges home to his house, praying them to helpe him. Whereupon, when the accuser saw Scipio accompanied by the Iudges them felues, returning into the market place, he let fall his fuit. This made Pompey againe be condemned, and blamed also morethen before, for that he having made a law, that no man should praise the offenders, whilest their matter was a hearing, came himselfe and openly praised Planeus being accused. Thereupon Cato being one of the Judges, atopped his eares with both his hands, faying: that he might not heare an offender praised, seeing it was forbidden by law. But therefore he was refused for a Judge, before they gaue sentence. Notwithstanding, Plancus was condemned by all the rest of the Judges, to Pompeys great shame and reproach. Shortly after, Hypfeus, one that had bin Confull, being likewise accused, watching Pompey on a time as he came out of his bath to go to supper, vpon his knees he befought Pompeys fauour and helpe: but he flatly passed by him, and gaue him no other answer, but told him, he marred his supper and said nothing else to him. This inconstancie was much reproued in Pompey. Howbeit otherwise he set all things in good order, and chose his father in law Scipio, for his colleague and fellow in the Confulship, for the fine last moneths. After that, he caused the gouernment of his Prouinces to be appointed him for foure yeare more, with commission to take yearely out of the treasure a thousand talents to defray the charges of his warre. Casars friends seeing that, stepped vp for him, and prayed that there might also be had some consideration of him, that had likewise great wars for the Empire of Rome: saying, that his good service deserved, either that they should make him Confull againe, or else that they should prolong his charge and gouernment, fo as he may yet peaceably enjoy the honor to command that which he had conquered, to the end that no other fucceffour might reape the fruit of his labour. Much (tirre and contention being about this matter at Rome, Pompey as though for good will he meant to excuse the enuie they might have borne Casar, said: that he had received letters from him, by the which he requested asuccessour, and to be discharged of this warre: and furthermore, that he thought it good they should grant him priviledge to demaund the second Confulfhip, Confulfhip, although he were absent. Which Cato stoutly withstood, saying, that he must returne home as a private man, and leaving his army, should come in person to crave recompense of his countrey. But because Pompey made no reply nor answer to the contrary, men suspected straight that he had no great good liking of Cafar, and the rather, because he had sent vnto him for the two legions which he had lent him, under colour of his warre against the Parthians. But Cafar though he smelt him wherefore he sent for his fouldiers, returned them home with liberall reward. About that time, Pompey fell ficke at NAFLE's of a dangerous disease, whereof not- pempey fell withstanding he recoucred againe. The NEAPOLITANS therupon, by perswasion of Praxagoras, one of the chiefest men of their citie, did sacrifice to the gods for his recourse. The like did Great also their neighbours round about: and in fine, it ran so generally through all ITALY, that there the recogning for the recognition for the recogn was no city or towne (great or small) but made open feasts and reioycing for many daies together. Besides, the infinite number of people was such, that went to meet him out of all parts, that bealth. there was not place inough for them all, but the high waies, cities, townes, and ports of the fea, were all full of people, feafting and facrificing to the gods, reioycing for his recourry. Diners also went to meet him, crowned with garlands, and so did attend on him, casting no segayes and flowers vpon him. Thus was his journey the nobleft fight that ener was, all the way as he came: howbeit menthought also, that this was the chiefest cause of the beginning of the civill warres. For he fell into fuch a pride, and glorious conceit of himfelfe, with the exceeding toy he tooketo see himselfethus honoured:that for getting his orderly gouernment, which made all his former doings to prosper, he grew too bold in despising of Casars power, as though he stood in no need of other power to care or withftand him, but that he could ouercome him as he would, fooleonteil farre more easily, then he could have done before. Furthermore, Appius thereupon returned made Pomfrom Gavie, that brought him his two legions backe againe which he had lent vitto Cafar, reproaching much his doings which he had done there, and giving out many foule words against Cafar. For he faid, that Pompey knew not his owne strength and authoritie, that would feeke to Appin 1300 make himselfe strong, by other power against him: considering that he might ouercome him with his own legions he should bring with him, so soone as they saw but Pompey in the face, such habanot. ill will did Cafars own fouldiers beare him, and were maruellous defirous besides to see himself. These flattering tales so puffed vp Pompey, and brought him into such a securitie and trust of himselfe, that he mocked them to scorne which were afraid of warres. And to those also which saids that if Cafar came to Rome, they faw not how they could refift his power, he smileingly answer red them again, and bad them take no thought for that: for as oft, said he, as I do but stampe with my foote vponthe ground of ITALY, I shall bring men inough out of every corner, both footemen and horsemen. In the meane, ime, Casar gathered force stil vpon him, and thencesorth drew nearer vnto ITALY, & sent of his foldiers daily to Rome to be present at the election of the magistrates, and many of them that were in office, he wanne with money: amongst whom, was Paule, one of the Consuls, whom he wanne of his side, by meanes of a thousand fine hundred talents. And Curiothe Tribune of the people, whom he discharged of an infinite debt he ought: and Marke Antoniealfo, who for Curioes, fake, was discharged likewise for part of the debt Paule the which Curio ought, being also bound as himselfe. Furthermore, it was found that a Captaine or bribed by Centurion sent from C. Jar, being neare vnto the Senate, vnderstanding that the counsell would cofar. not prolong Cafars gouernment which he required, clapping his hand vpon the pommell of his fword: Well faid he, this shall giue it him. So, to be short, all that was done and said, ten- Tribunes of ded to this end. Not with standing, the petitions and requests that Curio made in Casurs behalfe, briedly briedly feemed fomwhat more reasonable for the people: for he requested one of the two, either to cafar. make Pompey to put downe his armie, or elle to licence Cafar to have his army as well as he. For, either being both made private men, they would fall to agreement of themselves : or else being both of like strength, neither of both would seeke any alteration, fearing one another, but would content themselves either of them with their owne. Or otherwise, he that should weaken the one, and strengthen the other, should double his power whom he feared. Therto very hotly replied the Confull Marcellus, calling Cafar theefe, and faid that he should be proclaimed an open enemie to Rome, if he did not difperfe his army. This not with standing, in fine, Curio, Antony, and Piso procured that the Senate should decide the matter. For, said he, all those that . would have Cafar leave his army, and Pompey to keepe his, let them stand on the one side. Thereupon the most part of them stood at one hand. Then he bad them againe come away from them that would have them both leave their armies. Then there remained onely but two and twenty that stood for Pompey: and all the rest went on Curioes side. Then Curio looking aloft for joy of the victorie, went into the market place, and there was received of his Tribune faction, with shouts of ioy and clapping of hands, and infinite no fegaves and garlands of flowers throwne vpon him. Pempey was not then present to see the Senators goodwill towards him: because by the law, such as haue commandement ouer fouldiers, cannot enter into Rome. Notwithstan. ding Marcellus standing vp, said: that he would not stand trisling, hearing of orations and arguments, when he knew thatten legions were already passed ouer the Alpes, intending to come in armes against them; and that he would senda man vinto them, that should defend their countrey well inough. Straight they changed apparell at Rome, as their manner was in a common calamitic. Marcellus then comming through the market place vnto Pompey, being followed of all the Senate, went vnto him, and told him openly: Pompey I command thee helpe thy countrey with that army thou hast already, and also to leavie more to aide thee. The like speech did Lentulus vie vnto him who was appointed one of the Confuls the yeare following. Now, when Pompey thought to leavie fouldiers in Rome to bill them, fome would not obey him, a few others went vnwillingly to him with heavie hearts, and the most part of them cried, Peace, peace. Antony also, against the Senates mind, read a letter vnto the people sent from Casar containing certaine offers and reasonable requests, to draw the common peoples affection towards him. For his request was, that Pompey and he should both of them refigne their gouernments, and should dismisse their armies to make all well, referring themselves wholly to the judgement of the people, and to deliuer vp account vnto them of their doings. Lentulus being now entred into his Consulship; did not affemble the Senate. But Cicero lately returned out of CILICIA, practifed to bring them to agreement, propounding that Cafar should leave GAVLE, and all the rest of emixteefar his armie, referuing onely two legions and the gouernement of ILLYRIA, attending his fecond Consulship. Pompey liked not this motion. Then Casars friends were contented to grant that he should have but one of his legions. But Lentulus spake against it, and Cato cried out on the other fide also, that Pompey was deceived, and they both. So all treaty of peace was cut off. In the meanetime, newes came to Rome that Cafar had wonne ARIMINVM, a faire great city of ITALY, and that he came directly to Rome with a great power. But that was not true: for he came but with three thousand horse, and fine thousand sootemen, and would not tarrie for the rest of his army that was yet on the other side of the mountaines in GAVLE, but made haste rather to surprise his enemies vpon the sudden, being afraid and in garboile, not looking for him fo foone: rather then to give them time to be provided, and to fight with them when they were ready. For when he was come to the river fide of Rubicon (which was the vtmost confine of the province he had in charge towards Iral x) he stayed suddenly, weying with himselfe the great enterprise he tooke in hand. At the last, as men that being of a maruellous height from the ground, do headlong throw themselues downe, closing vp their eyes, and withdrawing their minds from the thought of the danger: crying out these words onely vnto them that wereby, in the Greeke tongue, anifietu no en English, let the die be cast (meaning hereby to put all in hazard, and according to our prouerbe, to fet all on fixe and feuen) he passed ouer with his army. Now, the newes of his coming being caried to Rome, they were in fuch a maruellous feare, as the like was neuer feene. For all the Senate ran immediatly vnto Pompey, and all the other Magistrates of the city fled vnto him also. Tullus asking Pompey what power he had to resist them, he answered him, faltring somewhat in his speech: that he had the two legions readie which Casar sent him backe againe, and that he thought with the number of them which he had leauied in haste, he should make vp the number of thirty thousand fighting men. Then Tullus cried out openly: Ah, thou hast mocked vs Pompey: and thereupon gaue order they should send Ambassadours vnto Casar. There was one Phaonius in the companie, who otherwise was no ill man, saving that he was somwhat too bold, thinking to counterfeit Catoes plain maner of speech: he bad Pompey then stampe his foot vpon the ground, & make those soldiers come which he had promised them. Pompey gently bare with Phaonius mocke. But when Cato told him also, what he had prophecied before hand of Cafar, he answered him againe: Indeed thou hast prophecied more truly then I, but I have dealt more friendly then he. Then Case thought good that they should make him Lieutenant generall of Roms with full and absolute power to commaund all, faying: that the felfe fame men which do the greatest mischiefe, know best also how to remedy the same. So he immediatly departed into Sicile, having the charge and government of that countrey: and also every one of the other Senators went vnto the charge they were appointed. Thus all ITALY being in armes, no man knew what was best to be done. For they that were out of Rome came flying thither from all parts: and those on the other side that were within Rome went out as fast, and for fook the citie in this trouble and disorder. That which might serue being willing to obey, was found very weake; and that on the other fide which by difobedience did hurr, was too strong and ill to be gouerned by the magistrates, having law to comand. For there Tumule at was no possibility to pacific their feare, neither would they suffer Pompey to order things as he would but every man followed his owne fancy, even as he found himselfe grieved, a fraid, or in comming. doubt, and in one day they were in divers minds. Pompey could heare nothing of certainty of his enemies. For fome, one while would bring him newes one way, & then again e another way; and thế if he wold not credit thế, they were angry with him. At the length, when he faw the tumult and confusion so great at Rome, as there was no meane to pacificit, he commanded all the Senators to follow him, telling all the that remained behind, that he wold take the for Cafars friends; and so at night departed out of the citie. Then the two Consuls fled also, without doing any sacrifice to the gods, as they were wont to do before they went to make any wars. So Pompey, eto in his greatest trouble and most danger, might thinks him following the house to the following for the following the first following the follow uen in his greatest trouble and most danger, might thinke himselfe happie to have every mans goodwill as he had. For, though diverse misliked the cause of this warre, yet no man hated the Captaine: but there were moe found that could not for fake Pompey for the love they bare him, then there were that followed him to fight for their liberty. Shortly after Pompey was gone out of Rome, C. efar was come to Rome, who polleffing the citie, spake very gently vnto all them he cafar enfound there, & pacified their feare fauing that he threatned Metellus, one of the Tribunes of the people to put him to death, because he would not suffer him to take any of the treasure of the common wealth. Vnto that cruell threate, he added a more bitter speech also, saying: that it was not so hard a thing for him to do it, as to speake it. Thus having put downe Metellus, and taken that he needed to ferue his turne, he tooke vpon him to follow Pompey, thinking to driue him cofar folout of ITALY, before that his army he had in Spain & flould come to him. Pompey in the meane lower time, having rakenthe citie of Brandy and gotten fome flins to zether, he made the time. time, having takenthe citie of BRVNDVSIVM, and gotten some shipstogether, he made the two Confols presently imbarke with thirty ensignes of footmen, which he sent bey od the sea before VINTO DYRRACHIVM. And incontinently after that, he fent his father in law Scipio, and Cneus Pompeys pey his fonne, into Syria, to prouide him ships. Himselfe on the other side, fortified the rampiers fratagene of the city, and placed the lightest fouldiers he had upon the wals, and commanded the BRUN- at Brundu-DVSIANS not to stirre our of their houses; and further, he cast trenches within the city, at the end style there of the streetes in diverse places, and filled those trenches with sharpe pointed stakes faving two from cofar. ffreets onely, which went vnto the hauen. Then the third day after, hauing imbarked all the rest of his fouldiers at his pleasure, he suddenly lifting up a signe into the aire, to give them warning which he had left to guard the rampiers, they straight ran to him with speed, and quickly receiuing the into his ships, he weyed anker, and hoised faile. Cofar perceiuing the wals naked without ward, he straight mistrusted that Pompey was fled: who hasting after him, had almost runne forsaketh vpon the sharpe stakes, and fallen into the trenches, had not the BRVNDVSIANS given him war. Italie. ning of them. So he stayed, and ranne not ouerthwart the citie, but fetched a compasse aboutto go to the hauen: where he found that all the ships were vnder faile, two ships onely excepted, vpon the which were left a few fouldiers. Somethinke that this departure of Pompey, was one of the best stratagemes of warre that ever he vsed. Notwithstanding, Cafar marvelled much, that he being in a strong citie, and looking for his army to come out of Spaine, and being maister of the sea, besides, that he would ever for sake ITALIE. Cicero also reproved him, for that he rather followed Themistocles counsell, then Pericles: considering that the troublesome time was Cicero repro rather to be likened vnto Pericles then Themistocles time. Yea Cafar himselfe shewed, that he was affraid of the time. For when he had taken Numerius one of Pompeys friends, he fent him voto Pompey at BRVN DVSIVM, to offer him reasonable conditions of peace: But Numerius followed Pompey, and failed away with him. By this meanes, Cafar in threefcore daies being Lord of all I-TALY without any bloud shed, he was very desirous to follow with speed after Pompey. But be- cestarleaucause he had no ships ready, he lethim go, and hasted towards Spaine, to joyne Pompeys armie ell Pompey there vnto his. Now Pompey in the meane space, had gotten a maruellous great power together intespaine. both by fea and by land. His army by fea was wonderful. For he had fine hundred good ships of warre, and of galliots, foifts, and pinnaces, an infinit number. By land, he had all the flower of the horsemen of Rome, & of al Italy, to the number of seven thousand horse, all rich men of great houses, and valiant minds. But his footmen, they were men of all forts, and raw fouldiers yntrained, whom Pompey cotinually exercifed; lying at the city of BERROEA, not fitting idly, but taking pains, as if he had bin in the prime of his youth. Which wasto great purpose to incourage others feeing Pompey, being eight and fifty yeares old, fight on foot, armed at all peeces; & then on horfbacke, quickly to draw out his fword while his horse was in his ful carier, and cafily to put it vp againe; & to throw his dart from him, not only with fuch agility to hit point blank, but also with streigth to cast it such a way from him, that few yong men could do the like. Thither came divers kings, princes, & great Lords of countries, and yeelded themselues vnto him, and of ROMAINE Captaines that had borne office, he had of the about him the nuber of a whole Senate. Among fr them came vnto him Labienus alfo, who before was Cafars friend, & had alwaies been with him in his warres in GAVLE. There came vnto him also Brutus, the sonne of that Brutus which was flaine in GAV LE, a valiant man, and which had neuer spoken vnto Pompey vntill that day, because he tooke him for a murtherer of his father; but then willingly followed him as defender of the liberty of Rome. Cicero himselfe also, though he had both written and given counsell to the contrary, thought it a shame to him not to be amongst the number of them that would hazard their lines for defence of their countrey. There came vnto him also Tidius Sextius even into Mace-DON, notwithstanding that he was an old man, and lame of one of his legges: whom others laughing to fcorne to fee him come, when Pompey faw him, he rose and went to meete him, indging it a good token of their good wils vnto him whe fuch old men as he, chose rather to be with him in danger, then at home with fafety. Hereupon they fate in councell, and following Catres opinion, decreed that they should put no citizen of Rome to death but in battell, and should facke no citic that was fubicetto the Empire of Rome; the which made Pompeys part the better liked. For they that had nothing to do with the warres, either because they dwelt farre off, or else for that they were so poore, as o herwise they were not regarded, did yet both in deed and word fauour Pompeys part, thinking him an enemie both to the gods and men, that wished not Pompey victorie. Cafar also shewed himselfe very mercifull and courteous, where he ouercame. For when he had wonne all Pompeys army that was in Spaines, he suffered the Captaines that were taken to go at liberty, and onely referued the fouldiers. Then coming ouer the Alpes agazine, he passed through all ITALIE, and came to the citie of BRVN DVSIVM in the winter quarter: and there passing over the sea, he went vnto the citie of ORICVM, and landed there. Now Cafar having Vibrus, one of Pompeys familiar friends with him, whom he had taken prifoner, he sent him vato Pompey, to pray against that they might meete, and both of them differse their armes within three dayes, and being reconciled (gining their faith one to another) fo to returneinto ITALY like good friends together. Pompey thought againe, that these were new denicesto entrap him. Thereupon he suddenly went downe to the sea, and tooke all the places of strength by the sea side, safely to lodge his campe in, and all the ports, creekes, and harbors for ships to lie in rode: so that what wind socuer blew on the sky, it served his turne, to bring him cither men, victuals, or money. Cafar on the other fide was fo diftreffed both by fea and by land, that he was driven to procure battell, and to affaile Pempey even in his owne forts, to make him come out to fight with him: of whom most times he ever had the better in all skirmishes, saving once, when he was in danger to have loft al his army. For Pompey had valiantly repulfed his men, and made them flic, and had flaine two thousand of them in the field: but he durst notenter pell mell with them into their campe, as they fled. Wherupon Cafar fayd to his friends, that his enemie had won the victorie that day, if he had knowne how to ouercome. This victorie put Pompeys men in such courage, that they wold needs hazard battell. And Pompey himselfe also though he wrote letters vnto strage kings, captaines, & cities of his confederacy as if he had already won all, was yet afraid to fight another battell, thinking it better by tract of time, and distresse of victuals, to ouercome him. For Cafars men being old and expert fouldiers, and wont ever to have the victorie when they fought to gether, he knew they would be loth to be brought to fight any other kind of way, to be driven to often removing of their campe from place to place, and still to fortifie and intrench themselues; and therefore that they would rather put it to aduenture out of hand, and fight it out. But not with standing that Pompey had before perswaded his men to be quiet, and not to stirre, perceining that after this last bickering, Cafar being scanted with victuals, raifed his campe, and departed thence to go into Thessall, through the country of the Атнамантань : then he could no more bridle their glory and courage, which cried, Сыраг is fled, let vs follow him. And others, Lee vs return should again into Iral v. And others allo fent thier friends and servants before to Rome, robite them bodies neere the market place : intending when they came thither to fue for omessing the anamon wealth. Somethere were also that in a follity would needs take ship, and faile into the He of Lessos, vnto Cornelia (whom Pompey had fent thither) to carie her that good news, shat the warre was ended. Thereupon affembling the councell, Africanus thought it best to winnel TALY, for that was the chiefest marke to be shotatin this warre: for whosoener obtained that, had straight all Stelle, Sardi-NIA, CORSICA, SPAINE, and GAVLE at commandement. Furthermore, that it was a :lishonour to Pompey (which in reason should touch him about all things) to suffer their countrey to be in fuch cruell bondage and fubication vnto flaces and flatterers of tyrants, offering it selfe as it were into their hands. But Pompey neither thought it honourable for him, once agains to file from C.efar, and to make him follow him, fith fortune had given him oportunitie to have Cefar in chase nor lawfull also before the gods, to forsake his father in law scipio, and many other also that had been Confuls, dispersed abroad in GRECE and THESSALIE which shold immediatly fall into Cafars hands, with altheir riches & armies they had. Furthermore, he faid, that they hadcare enough for the citie of Rome, which drew the warres farthest off from them: so as, they remaining fafe and quiet at home (neither hearing nor feeling the miferie of warres) might in the end peaceably receive and welcome him home, that remained conquerour. With this determination, he marched forward to follow Cafar, being determined not to give him battell, but to befiege him, and onely to compaffe him in fill being neare vinto him, and fo to cut him off from loweth Cevictuals. There was also another reason that made him to follow that determination. For it was far into reported to him, that there was a speech give out among the Romaine knights, that so soone as Thegaly. cuer they had ouercome Cafar, they must also bring Pompey to be a private man againe. Some fav therefore, that Pompey would never afterwards imploy Cato in any great matters of weight in all this war: for when he followed Cafar, he left him to keepe his carriage by the fea fide, fearing that fo foone as Cufar were once ouercome, he would make him ftraight alfo refigne his authority. Pompey following Cafar in this maner faire and foftly, they cried out vponhim, that he made no warre with Cafar, but against his countrey and the Senate, because he might be still in authoritie: and that he would neuer leaue to haue them for his feruants and guard about him, which should rule & command the world. Furthermore, Domitius Anobarbus, calling him continually Agamemnon, and king of kings, made him much to be enuied. Phaonius also mocked him as much as the other that spake most boldly: for he went crying vp and downe, My maifters, I giucyou warning, you are like to eate no Thysevlan figges this yeare. And Lucius mocked of Afranius also, he that had lost the army which he had in Spaine, and was also suspected for foulders. a traytor, seeing Pompey then refused to come to battell: I maruell, said he, that they which accuse me, do not lustily go to find him out, whom they call the merchant and common buyer of provinces, to fight with him prefently? With these and many such other lewd speeches, they compelled Pompey in the end (who could not abide to be ill spoken of, and would not denie his friends any thing) to follow their vaine hope and defires, and to for fake his owne wife determination: the which thing, no good ship-master, and much lesse a chiefe and soueraigne Captaine, ouer so many nations and so great armies, should have suffered and consented vnto. Now, he that did alwaies commend the Physitians, that would not follow the fond defire of the ficke patients, was himself contented to obey the worst part of his armie, searing their displeasure, where their life or health stood in hazard. For who would thinke or judge them to be wife men, and in their wits, who walking vp and downetheir campe, did already fue to be Confuls and Prætors ? confidering that Spinther, Domitius and Scipio, were at strife together, making friends to be high Bishop which office Cafar had,) as if they should have fought with Tigrazes king of ARMENIA, or with the king of the NABATHEIANS, which had camped by them, and not with Cafar and his army; who had taken a thousand townes by allault, had fubdued aboue three hundred feuerall nations, and had wonne infinite battels of the Gestathes and Gavles, and wasneuer onercome: had also taken a million of men priforers, and had likewise slaine so many at diverse battels. All this notwithstanding, they of Propositide fill being importunate on him, and troubling him in this fort, in fine, when they were come into the fields of P H A R S A L I A, they compelled Pompey to call a councell. There Labienus, Generall of the horsemen, standing vp., sware before them all, that he would not returne from the battell, before he had made his enemies to flie. The like oath all the rest did take. Thenext night following, Pompey thought in his dreame, that he came into the Theater, and that the people to honour him, made a maruellous great clapping of their hands: and that he himselfe did set foorth the temple of Venus the conquerour with many spoiles. This vision partly put him in good courage, and partly againe made him doubt: for that he was afraid, because Cefars family was descended from this goddesse Venus, that his dreame did signifie, that he should have the honour of the victorie, with the spoiles he should winne of him. Besides all this, there were fudden and fearefull noises heard in his campe, without any apparant cause, that waked all the campe you it. At the fourth watch, when the watch is renewed in the morning, wonderfull; there was feene a maruellous great light ouer Cafars campe, and they were all at reft, which flamoise heard med like a burning torch, and fell into Pompeys campe. The which Cafar himselfe sayd he faw, when he went to visit the watch. At the breake of the day, Casar being determined to raise his campe, and to go to the citie of Scotysa, as his souldiers were busie about ouerthrowing of their tents, and fending away their bagge and baggage before, there came feouts vnto him, that brought him word; they faw a great deale of armour and weapon caried too and fro in their enemies campe, and heard a noise and bustling besides, as of men that were preparing to fight. After these came in other scouts, that brought word also that their voward was already fet in battell ray. Then Cafar fayd, that the day was now come they had longed for fo fore, and that they should now fight with men, not with hunger, nor with want of victuals: and thereupon gaue order prefently that they should put out the red coate of armes upon his tent, which was the figne all the Romaine's vied to shew that they would fight. The fouldiers feeing that out, left their cariage and tents, and with great shouts of ioy ranne to arme themsclues. The Captaines of cuerie band also, bestowed every man in such place as he should fight, and so they conveyed themselves into battell ray, without any tumult or disorder, as quietly, as if they should have entred into a dance. Pompey himselfe led the right wing of his army against Antony. The middle of the battell he gaue vnto Scipio his father in law, being right against Domitius Caluinus. The left wing also was led by Lucius Domitius Anobarbus, the which was garded with men of armes, for all the horimen were placed on that fide, to diffresse Cesar if they could, that was directly against them: and to ouerthrow the tenth legion that was so much accounted of being the valiantest fouldiers the enemie, had in all his armie, amongst the which Cafar did ener vie to fight in person. Cafar then seeing the left wing of his enemies so strong with the gard of the horsemen, and being afraid of the brightnesse of their armour, brought forward fixe enfignes for fupply, which he placed hard behind the tenth legion, commanding them that no man should stirre, lest their enemies should discouer them. And surthermore, when the horsemen of the enemics should come to give charge vpon them, that then they should runne with speed on the one side of the formost ranks, and not to throw their darts farre from them, as the valiantest souldiers are wont to do, to come to the sword the sooner: but to throw them vpw ards into their enemies eyes and faces. For faid he, these braue fellowes and fine dancers, will neuer abide to have their faces marred. And this was Cafars device at that time. Pompey being on horsebacke, rode vp and downe to consider the ordinance of both battels: and perceiuing that his enemies stood still in their rankes, looking for the signall of battell, & that his owne battell on the other fide waved vp and downe diforderly, as men vnskilfull in warres : he was afraid they would flie before they were charged. Thereupon he straightly commanded them in the voward, that they should steadily keepe their rankes, and standing closetogether shold so defend themselues, receining the charge of the enemie. But Casar disliked or that deuice, for thereby, said he, the force of their blowes was lessened; and in withholding them from giving the charge, he not onely tooke away that courage, which the affailant carieth with him coming with fury : but made them moreover faint hearted, in receiving the charge of the enemics. In Cafars army, there were about two and twentie thousand fighting men: and in Pompeys army, fomewhat about twife as many. Now, when the word of battell was given on either fide, and that the trumpets did found the allarme, enery man began to looke to him. felfe. But a few of the chiefest of the ROMAINES, and certaine GRECIANS that were there also out of the set battell, perceiuing the imminent danger, began to bethinke them, to what passe the ambition and wilfull contention betweene these two men, had brought the state of Rome. For the weapons of kinfmen, the bands of brethren, the enfignes all alike, the flower of fo many valiant men of one citie, did serve for a notable example, to shew how mans nature prickt forward with conetousnesses, is quite blind and without reason. For if they could have been contented quietly to have gouerned that which they had conquered, the greatest and best part of the world, both by fea and by land was subject vino them. Or otherwise if they could not have queched their vusatiable desire of victorie and triumph, they had occasion of warre inough offered them against the Parthians and Germains. Furthermore they had inough to do besides to conquer Scythia, and the Indians and withal, they had had an honest colour to have cloaked their ambitious desires, if it had beene but to have brought the barbarous people to a civill life. For what horimen of Scythia, or arrowes of Parthia, or riches of Indias, could have abidden the power of threescore and ten thousand Romaine souldiers, and specially being led by two fo famouus Captaines, as Pompey, and Cafar: whose names, these strange & far nations vnderstood long before the name of the Romain stogreat were their victories, having conquered fo many wild and barbarous people. They both being then in armes the one against the other, not regarding their honour which made them fo ambitious, did not spare their owne countrey, who had vntil thattime remained vnuincible, both in fame & proweffe. For, the alliace that was made between them, the loue of Iulia, and marying with her, was suspected from the beginning to be but a deceit, and a pledge as it were of a conspiracy made between them, for a privat benefit, more then for any true friendship. Now when the fields of Pharsalia were covered over with men, with horse and armor, and that the fignall of battell was given on either side, the first man of Cafars army that advaced forward to give charge, was Caius Crassinius, Captaine of fixfcore and fine men, to performe a great promife which he had made vnto C.efar. For C.efar, when multibean for feet and he came out of his tent in the morning, seeing him, called him to him by his name, & asked him fde. what he thought of the successe of this battell ? Crassinius holding out his right hand vnto him, couragiously cried. Oh Cofar, thine is the victorie, and this day thou shalt commend me either aliue or dead. Then remembring these words, he brake out of the ranks, and many following after him, ran amongst the middest of his enemies. Straight they came to the sword, & made great flaughter. But he preffing forward still, one with a thrust ran him through the mouth, that the fwords point camethrough at his necke. Therupon Crassinius being flaine, the battel was equal. Pompey did not make his left wing march ouer suddenly, but stayed, & cast his eyes abroad to see what his horsemen would do, the which had already deuided their companies, meaning to compasse in Casar, and to make the small number of horsmen which he had before him, to give back vpon the squadron of his sootmen. On the other side, as soone as Cesar had given the signall of battell, his horsemen retired backea litle, and the fixe ensignes which he had placed secretly behind them (being three thousand fighting men) ran suddenly to assaile the enemie vpon the flancke; and when they came neare vnto the horsemen, they threw the points of their darts vpwards, according to Casars commandement, and hit the yong gentlemen full in their faces. They being veterly vnskilfull to fight, and least of all looking for such manner of fight, had not the hearts to defend themselues, nor to abide to be hurt as they were in their faces, but turning their heads, and clapping their hands on their faces, snamefully sled. They being ouerthrowne, Casars men made no account to follow them, but went and gaue charge vpon the battel of footmen, in that place specially where they had no gard of horimen, wherby they might the cosilier be compassed about. Thus, they being charged by them in the flancke, and in the yoward also by the tenth legion, perceiuing themselues (contrary to their expectation) compassed about by to slight by their enemies, where they thought to have environed them: they could make no longer refiflance. They also being likewise driven to flie, when Pompey saw the dust in the element, and con-franging in the iectured the flying of his horsemen, what mind he was of then, it was hard to say. For by his field of countenance, a man might well thinke he was like a man amazed, and at his wits end, forgetting that he was Pompey the great: for that he went straight into his campe, and spake neuera word to any man, rightly verifying Homers verses to this effect:

But mighty Iou e who sits aloft in youorie chariot hie, Strake Aiax with fo great a feare, that Aiax by andby Let fall his leatherne target: made of tough oxe hide seuen fold, And ranne away, not looking backe, for all hewas fo bold.

campe. And then, he faid no more, but, What, guen into our campe? and fo rifing vp, he put a gowne on his backe euen fit for his misfortune, and fecretly stole out of the campe: The other legions also fled: and great flaughter was made of the tent keepers, and their servants that garded the campe. For Asimus Pollio writeth (who was at that battell on Casars side) that there were flaine onely but fixe thousand fouldiers. Howbeit at the taking of their campe, Casars fouldiers then found plainely the madnesse and vanitie of Pompeys men. For, all their tents and pauilions were full of no legayes and garlands of mirde, and their couches all couered with flowers, their tables full of bolles of wine, and men prepared ready to do facrifice for joy, rather then to arme themselues to fight. Thus went they to battell, caried away with this vaine and foolish hope. When Pompey was gone a litle way from his campe, he forfooke his horfe, having a very few with him: and perceining that no man purfued him, he went on foot faire and fortly, his headful of fuch thoughts and imaginations, as might be supposed a man of his like calling might have. who for foure and thirty yeares space together, was wont continually to cary victory away, and began then even in his last cast, to prove what it was to flie, & to be overcome and who thought then with himfelfe, how in one houres space he had loft the honor and riches which he had gotten in fo many foughten fields and battels, whereby he was not long before followed and obeyed of so many thousand men of warre, of so many horizon, and of such a great sleete of ships on the fea, and then to go as he did in such poore estate, and with so small a traine, that his very enemies who fought him, knew him not. Thus when he was passed the citic of Larissa, and coming to the vallic of Tempé, there being athirst, he fell downe on his belly, and dranke of the river. Then rifing vp againe, he went his way thence, and came to the sea side, and tooke a fishers cotage where he lay all night. The next morning by breake of the day, he went into a litle boat upon the river, and tooke the free men with him that were about him; and as for the flaues. he sent them backe againe, and did counsell them boldly to go to Cafar, and not to be afraid. Thus rowing vp and downe the shore side, in this litle boat, he spied a great ship of burden in the maine fea, riding at anker, which was ready to weigh anker, and to faile away. The mafter of the thip was a ROMAINE, who, though he was not familiarly acquainted with Pompey, yet knew him by fight very well. He was called Peticins, who had dreamed the night before, that he faw Pomper speake vnto him, not like the man he was wont to be, but in pouerty and in misery. So, he had told this dreame vnto the mariners which failed with him (as men commonly vseto doe, specially when they dreame of such weighty matters, and being at leifure withall) and at the very instant, there was one of the mariners that told him, he saw a litle boat on the river rowing towards them, and that there were men in it that shoke their cloakes at them, and held out their hands. Thereupon Peticius standing vp knew Pompey straight, euen in like case as he had dreamed of him the night before and clapping his head for anger, commanded his mariners to let downe his boate, and gaue him his hand, calling him Fompey by his name, mistrusting (feeing him in that effate) what misfortune had happened to him. Thereupon, not looking to be intreated, nor that he should tell him of his mishap, he received him into his ship, and all those he would have with him, and then hoiffed faile. With Pompey there were both the Lentuli and Faopius. Shortly after also, they perceived king Deiotarus coming from the river to them, that beckened and made fignes to receive him: which they did. At fupper time, the mafter of the thip made readic such meate as he had aboord. Faonius seeing Pomper for lacke of mento waite on him, washing of himselfe, ran vnto him, washed him, and annointed him, and afterwards continued still to waite vpon him, and to do such service about him, as servants doe to their maisters, even to the washing of his feete, and making ready of his supper. When a simpleman faw him, that could no skill of feruice, he fayd:

Good gods, how every thing becommeth noble men? Pompey paffing then by the citie of Amphipolis, coafted from thence into the Ile of Lessos, to go fetch his wife Cornelia and his sonne being then in the citie of MITYLENE. There, hauing cast out his anker, and riding at rode, he put a messenger on the shore, and sent him into the citie to his wife;not according to her expectation, who was still put in good hope by continuall letters and newesbrought vnto her, that the warre was ended and determined by the cities Dyrrachium. This meffenger now finding her in this hope, had not the heart fo much as to falute her, but letting her understand rather by his teares then words, the great mis. fortune Pompey had, told her, the must dispatch quickly, if she would see Pompey with one shippe onely, and none of his, but borrowed. The young Ladie hearing the senewes, fell downe in a The serious fwound before him, & neither spake nor stirred of long time; but after she was come to her selfe, of cornella remembring that it was not time to weepe and lament the want with sound through the circumstance of the self-through through through the self-through through the self-through through the self-through through through the self-through through through through through the self-through through the self-through through the self-through through through through through through through through the self-through through the self-through through through the self-through through the self-through through throu remembring that it was notime to weepe and lament, the went with speed through the city vn- outsthess. to the sea side. There Pompey meeting her, tooke her in his armes, and embraced her. But she sinking vnder him, fell downe, and said: Out alas, wo worth my hard fortune, not thine (good hufband) that I fee thee now brought to one poore ship, who before thou mariedst thy vnfortunate cornelia. Cornelia, wast wontto faile these seas with fine hundred shippes. Alas, why artthou come to see The words me, and why diddeft thou not leaue me to curfed fate and my wicked destinie: sith my selfe is of cornelia and why diddeft thou not leaue me to curfed fate and my wicked destinie: sith my selfe is and property of the proper cause of all this thy euill? Alas, how happie a woman had I been, if I had been dead before I pg. heard of the death of my first husband Publius Crassus, whom the wretched PARTHIANS flue ? >> And how wife a woman had I been, if (according to my determination) I had killed my felfe >> immediatly after him: where now I line to bring yet this misfortune vnto Pompey the Great ? It >> is reported that Cornelia spake these words, and that Pompey also answered her in this maner. Peraduenture, Cornelis mine, thou hast knowne a better fortune, which hath also deceiued thee, because she hath continued longer with me the her maner is. But since we are borne men, we must patiently beare these troubles, & proue fortue, againe. For it is no impossible matter for vs again to come into prosperty out of this preset misery, as to fal out of late prosperity into present calamity. Whe Cornelia heard him fay lo, she sent back into the city for her stuffe & family. The MI-TYLENIANS alfocame openly to falute Pompey, & prayed him to come into the city, & to refresh himselfe:but Pempey would not, & gaue them counsel to obey the conqueror, & not to scare any thing, for Cafar was a suft man, & of a courtous nature. Then Pompey turning vnto Cratippus the Philosopher, who came among the citizens also to see him, made his complaint vnto him, & reafoned a litle with him about divine providence. Cratippus courteoufly yeelded vnto him, putting Pompey him still in betterhope, fearing lest he would have growne too hote & troublesome, if he should haue holden him hard to it. For Pompey at the length might haue asked him, what providence of upput the the gods there had been in his doings? And Cratippus might have answered him, that for the ill Philosopher, gouernment of the commonwealth at Rome, it was of necessity that it should fall into the hands une prouj. of a foueraigne Prince. Peraduenture Cratippus might the haue asked him: how & wherby Pompey wouldest thou make vs beleeue, if thou hadst ouercome Cafar, that thou wouldest have vsed thy good fortune better then her But for divine matters, refer them to the gods as it pleaseth the. Pompey taking his wife and friends with him, hoiffed faile, and landed no where, but compelled to take fresh acates and water. The first citie he came vnto, was ATTALIA in the courty of PAM - Fempey ar-PHYLIA. Thither came to him certaine gallies out of CILICIA, and many fouldiers also, infomuch as he had threefcore Senators of Rome againe in his company. Then understanding that the country his army by fea was yet whole, and that Cato had gathered together a great number of his foul- of Pamphy. diers after the ouerthrow, whom he had transported with him into Africke he lamented, & complained vnto his friends, that they had compelled him to fight by land, and not fuffer him to helpe himselfe with his other force wherin he was the stronger; and that he kept not still neare vnto his army by sea, that if fortune failed him by land, he might yet presently have repaired to his power ready by fea to have refifted his enemy. To confesse atruth, Pompey committed not greaterre fo great a fault in all this war, neither did Cafar put forth a better deuice, then to make his enemy & cafars fight farre from his army by fea. Thus Pompey being driven to attempt fomewhat according to oraffy dehis smal abilitie, he sent Ambassadors vnto the cities. To others, he went himselse in person also to require money, wherewith he manned and armed some ships. This notwithstanding, searing the fodaine approach of his enemie, lest he should preuent him before he could put any reasonable force in readines for to refift him, he bethought himself what place he might best retire vnto for his most safety. When he had considered of it, he thought that there was never a province of the ROMAINEs that could faue and defend them. And for other strange realmes, he thought PARTHIA about all other, was the best place to receive them into at that present (hauing so small power as they had,) and that it was best able to helpe and aide them. Other of Theophanes his counsel were of mind to go into Africk E, vnto king Iuba. But Theophanes LESBIAN said, he Lesbian per thought it a greatfolly, to leave A GYPT which was but three dayes failing from thence, and smaded 50king Ptolomie, (being but lately come to mans state, & bound vnto Pompey for the late friendship into Egypt.

and fauour his father found of him) and to go put himselfe into the hands of the PART HIANS the vilest and vnfaithfullest nation in the world; and notto proue the modestic of a Romaine. that had been his father in law, whose prosperitie if he could have endured, he might have beene the chiefest man: and now to put himselse to Arsaces good will, who could not away with Cras-(us when he liued. Further, he thought it an ill part alfo, for him to go carie his young wife of the noble house of Scipio, amongst the barbarous people, who thinke it lawfull for them to vie what villany and infolencie they lift to any. For, admit the haue no villany offered her by them, yet is it an vindecent thing, to thinke she might have beene dishonoured, they having her in their power to do it. There was no perswasion (as they say) but this onely that turned Pompey vnto Euphrates:for it seemeth that Pompeys counsell, and not his fortune, made him take that way. Being determined therforeto flie into ÆGYPT, he departed out of CYPRVS in agally of SELEVEIA with his wife Cornelia. The refidue of his traine imbarked alfo, fome into gallies, and others into merchants ships of great burden, and so safely passed the sea without danger. When Pompey heard newes that king Ptolemie was in the citie of PELVSIVM with his army, making warre against his fister, he went thither, and sent a messenger before vnto the king, to aduertise him of his arrivall, and to intreate him to receive him. King Ptolomie was then but a young man, infomuch as one Pothinus gouerned all the whole realme under him. He affembled a councell of the chiefest and wifest men of the court, who had such credit and authority as it pleased him to give them. They being affembled, he comanded enery man in the kings name to fay his mind touching the receiuing of Pompey, whether the king should receive him or not. It was a miserable thing to see Pothinus an Eurnich of the kings, and Theodorus of CH10, an hired schoolemaster to teach the young king Rhetoricke, and Achillas Agyatian, to confult among themselues what they should doe with Pompey the Great. These were the chiefest counsellers of all his Eunuchs, and of those that had brought him vp. Now did Pompey ride at anker vpon the shore side, expecting the resolution of this councell in the which the opinions of other were divers, for some would not have receiued him: other would that he should be received. But the Rhetoritian Theodotus to shew his eloquence, perswaded them, that neither the one northeother was to be accepted. For, said he, if we receive him, we shall have Cafar our enemie, and Pompey our Lord : and if we doe deny him on the other fide, Pompey will blame vs for refuling of him, and Cefar for not keeping of him. Therefore this should be the best resolution, to send to kill him: for thereby we should win the goodwill of the one, and not feare the displeasure of the other, and some say moreouer, that he added this mocke withall: A dead man bites not. They being determined of this among themselues, gaue Achillas commission to do it. He taking with him Septimius (who had charge aforetime vnder Pompey) and Saluius another Centurion alfo, with three or foure fouldiers befides, they made towards Pompeys gallie, about whom were at that time the chiefest of his traine, to see what would become of this matter. But when they saw the likelihood of their entertainment, and that it was not in princely shew and maner, nor nothing answerable to the hope which Theophanes had put them in seeing so few men come to them in a fisher boate: they began then to mistrust the small account that was made of them, and counselled Pompey to returne backe, & to launch againe into the sea, being out of the danger of the hurling of a dart. In the meane time, the fifther boate drew neare, and Septimus arole and faluted Pompey in the Romain Etógue, by the name of Imperator, as much as foueraigne Captaine; and Achillas also spake to him in the Greeke tong, and bade him come into his boate, because that by the shore side, there was a great deale of mud and fand banckes, fo that his gallie should have no water to bring him in. At the very same time, they saw a farre off diuers of the kings gallies, which were arming with all speed possible, and all the shore besides full of soldiers. Thus, though Pompey and his company would haue altered their minds, they could not hauetold how to haue escaped; and furthermore, shewing that they had mistrusted them, then they had given the murtherer occasion to have executed his cruelty. So taking his leaue of his wife Cornelia, who lamented his death before his end, he commanded two Centurions to go downe before him into the ALGYPTIANS boate, and Philip one of his flaues infranchifed, with another flaue called Segnes. When Achillas reached out his hand to receive him into his boat, he turned him to his wife and fonne, and faid thefe verses of Sophocles vnto them: The manthat into Court comes free, Must there in state of bondage be.

These were the last words he spake vnto his people, whe he had left his owne gallie, & went into the ÆGYPTIANS boat. The land being a great way offfrom his gallie, and when he faw neuer a man in the boate spake friendly vnto him, beholding septimius, he said vnto him: Me thinks my friend I should know thee, for that thou hast served me with hertofore. The other nodded with his head that it was true, but gaue him no answer, nor shewed him any courtesie. Pompey seeing that no man spake to him, tooke a little booke he had in his hand, in the which he had written an oration that he meant to make vnto king Ptolomie, and began to read it. When they came neare the shore, Cornelia with her scruants and friends about her, stood up in her ship in great feare, to see what should become of Pompey. So she hoped well, when she saw many of the kings people on the shore, coming towards Fompey at his landing, as it were to receive and honour him. But euen as Pompeytooke Philip his hand to arise more easily, Septimius came first behind him, and thrust him through with his fword. Next vnto him also, Saluius and Achillas drew out their Pompey the fwords in like manner. Pompey then did no more buttookevp his gowne with his hands, and hid his face, and manly abid the wounds they gaue him, onely fighing a litle. Thus being nine & fif- be landed ty yeares old, he ended his life the next day after the day of his birth. They that rode at anker in nefic and their ships, when they saw him murthered, gaue such a fearful cry, that it was heard to the shore: patience of then weying vp their ankers with speed, they hoissed saile, and departed their way, having wind at wil that blew a lustic gale, as soone as they had gotten the maine sea. The Egyptians which prepared to row after them, when they faw they were past their reach, & vnpeffible to be ouertaken, they let them go. Then having stricke off Pompeys head, they threw his body over boord; for a miserable spectacle to all those that were desirous to see him. Philip his infranchised bondman remained ever by it, votil fuch time as the ÆGYPTIAN's had feene it their bellies full. Then The funehaving washed his bodie with falt water, and wrapped it vp in an old shirt of his, because he had ratiospens. no other shift to lay it in: he sought vpon the sands, and sound at the length a peece of an old Fo. fisher boate, enough to serue to burne his naked body with, but not all fully out. As he was bufie gathering the broken peeces of this boate together, thither came vnto him an old Romaine, who in his youth had ferued vnder Pompey, and faid vnto him: O friend, what art thou that preparest the funerals of Pompey the great? Philip answered, that he was a bondman of his infranchifed. Wel, faid he, thou shalt not have all this honour alone, I pray thee let me accompany thee in so denout a deed, that I may not altogether repent me to have dwelt so long in a strange countric, where I have abidden such miserie and trouble: but that to recompence me withall, I may haue this good hap, with mine hands to touch Pompeys bodie, and to helpe to bury the only and most famous Captaine of the Romaines. The next day after, Lucius Lentulus not knowing what had passed, coming out of Cyprvs, sailed by the shore side, and perceived a fire made for funerals, and Philip standing by it, whom he knew not at the first. So he askedhim, what is he that is dead and buried there. But fir aight fetching a great figh, Alas faid, he, perhaps it is Pompey Lucius Lenthe Great. Then he landed a litle, and was straight taken and flaine. This was the end of Pompey sulm stains, the Great. Not long after, Cafar alfo came into A GYPT that was in great warres, where Pompeys Cafar artihead was presented vnto him: but he turned his head aside, and would not see it; and abhorred Egypt. him that brought it, as a detestable murtherer. Then taking his ring wherewith he sealed his letters, whereupon was grauen a Lion holding a fword, he burft out a weeping. Achilles and Pothinus he put to death. King Ptolomie himselfe also, being ouerthrowne in battell by the river of Pompes put Nilus, vanished away, and was neuer heard of after. Theodotus the Rhetoritian escaped Casars to death. hands, and wandred up and downe AGYPT in great miserie, despised of euery man. Afterwards Marcus Brntus (who flue Cafar) conquering As 1A, met with himby chance, and putting him to all the torments he could possibly deuise, at the length flue him. The ashes of Pompeys bodic were afterwards brought vnto his wife Cornelia, who buried them in a towne ofhers by the citie of ALEA.

Ow that we have declared vnto you the lives of Agefilans and Pompey, let vs compare their manners and conditions together, which are thefe. First, Pompey came to his honour and greatnesse by his integritic, and so aduanced himselfe, and was a great side vnto Sylla, doing many noble exploits, helping him to rid the feryrants out of ITALY, who held it in bondage. But Agesilans vsurped the kingdome of LACED EMON, against the law of gods and men, condemning Leosychides for a baffard, whom his brother anowed to be his lawfull sonne: and contemned besides the oracle of the gods, which gaue warning of a lame king. Furthermore,

Pempey did honour Sylla while he lived, and when he was dead, gaue his bodie honourable buriall in despite of Lepidus: and maried his daughter vnto Faustus the sonne of Sylla. Agestlaus contrarily did dishonour Lysander v pon light occasion : but Pompey had done no lesse for Sylla, then Sylla had done for him. Lyfander on the other fide, had made Agefilaus king of LACED A. MON, and Lieutenant generall of al GRECE. Thirdly, the iniuries that Pompey did vnto the common weale, were done of necessitieto please Casar and Scipio, both of them his fathers in law. Agestlans also, to satisfie his sonnes love, saved sphodrias life, that had deserved death, for the mischiefe he had done the ATHENIANS: and he willingly also tooke part with Phabidas, not secretly, but openly, because he had broken the peace made with the Thebans. To conclude, what hurt Pompey did vnto the Romaines, either through ignorance, or to pleasure his friends: the same did Agesilam vnto the LACEDEMONIANS, through anger and selfe-will, in renewing warre with the Bobotians, vpon a full peace concluded. If we shall recken of the fortune of the one and the other, in the faults they committed, Pompeys fortune vnto the Romains was vnlooked for: but Agefilaus would not fuffer the LACED AMONTANS to anoide the lamekingclome, though they knew it before. For though Leotychides had been proued a bastard ten thoufund times, yet had not the race of the Eurityontides failed, but they could have found another Lawfull king among them, that should have gone vpright had not Lyfander, favouring Agefilans kepethetrue meaning of the oracle from the Lace DEMONIANS. On the other fide againe for metters of gouernement, there was neuer fuch an excellent deuice found out, as was done by Agefrians, to helpe the feare and danger the LACED ÆMONIANS were in, for those that fled at the Mittell of Levernes, when he counselled them to let the law sleepe for that day. Neither can any men match Pompeys with the like: who, to show his friends what power he was of, did breake the lawes which himself had made. For Agesslans being driven of necessitie to abolish the law, to save the life of his citizens, found such a device that the law was not hartfull to the common wealth, neither yet was put downe for feare it should do hurt. I must need commend this for a great vertue and civilitie in Agestlaus, who so soone as he received the Scytala, (or scrole of parchment from the Ephori) returned into his countrey; and left the warre of As ta. He did not as Pompey, who made himselfe great to the benefite of the common wealth, and for the commonwealths sake did for sake such honour and so great authoritie as neuer Captaine before him but Alexander the Great, had the like in those parts. But now to other matter. Touching their battels and exploits in warres, the multitudes of victories and triumphs that Pompey obtained, and the greate armies that heled, Xenophon himselfe, if he were aliue, could not compare Agesi- Things done Ins victories vnto his; although for the fingular vertues and qualities he had in him, for recompence thereof he had libertie granted him; to write and speake of Agesslaus what he thought in warres. good. Me thinkes also, there was great difference betwixt Pompey and Agefilam, in their equity and elemencie towards their enemies. For, whilest Agesilans went about to conquer Thebes, and otterly to race and destroy the citie of Messin, the one being an ancient citie of his countrey, and the other the capitall city of Bo EOTIA, he had almost lost his owne citie of Sparta: Agestians for at the least he lost the commandement and rule he had ouer the rest of GRECE. The other listing for contrarily gaue cities vnto pirats to dwell in, which were willing to change their trade and mannor of life and when it was in his chaife to lead of the land of ner of life; and when it was in his choise to leade Tigranes king of ARMENIA in triumphat mans. Rome, he chose rather to make him a confederate of the Romaines, saying, that he preferred perpetuall honour before one daies gloric. But fince it is reason we should give the first place and honour of the discipline of wars, vnto a Captaine of the greatest skill and experience in wars, the Laced Emonian then leaueth the Romaine farre behind. For first of all Agesilaus neuer forfooke his citie, though it was befieged with threefcore and ten thousand men, and that there were verie few within the same to defend it, the which also a litle before had bene onerthrowne at the battell of Levetres And Pompey on the other fide, hearing that Cafar with five thousand footmenonly had taken a towne in ITALTE, fled from Rome in very great feare. And Fompers therein he cannot be excused of one of these two: either that he sled cowardly from so few men, sale to foror else that he had a falls imaging a falls to forlate that he had a falls imaging a falls in the sale of the s or else that he had a false imagination of more. For he conucied his wife and children away, but he left all the rest without defence, and sled; where indeed he should either have ouercome, valiantly fighting for defence, of his country, or else haue received the condition of peace which the conquerors should have offered him. For he was a citizen, and allied vnto him. And he that thought it an vntollerable thing, to prolong the terme of his gouernment, or to grant him a feond Confulship, did now gine him oportunitie, suffering him to take the citic of Rome, to say the chiefest point of an excellent Captaine, to compell his enemies to sight when he sinder him-salight the chiefest point of an excellent Captaine, to compell his enemies to sight when he sinder him-salight the control of the chiefest point of an excellent Captaine, to compell his enemies to sight when he sinder him-salight the chiefest point of an excellent Captaine. felfe the stronger, and also to keepe himselfe from compulsion of fight when he is the weaker:

Agestlans excelling in that, did euer keepe himselfe innincible. Cosar also had great skill therein, to keepe himselfe from danger being the weaker, and againe could tell how to compell Pompey to hazard battell, to his viter destruction, by land, where he was the weaker: and by this meanes he made himselfe Lord of the treasure, victuals, and also of the sea, which his enemies had in their hands, without fighting. That which they alledge in his excuse, is that which most doth condemne him, specially for sogreat and skilfull a Captaine. For, as it is likely enough, that a yong Generall of an armie may eafily be brought from his wife and fafe counfell, with rumor and turnult of a few fearefull men, that should perswade him it were a shame and dishonour for him if he did otherwise: yet were this no strange matter, but a fault to be pardoned. But for Pompeythe Great, whose campe the ROMAINE's called their countrey, and his tent their Senate, and called all the Prætors and Confuls that gouerned at Rome, rebels and traitours to the commonwealth of Rome: who could excuse him (who was never seene commaunded by other then himselse, but had bene alwaics chiese Captaine and Generall in any war he made, and euer had the upper hand) but that he was drawne on by the scosses of Faorius and Demitius, to hazard bartell, to endanger the whole Empire and libertic of Rome, only for feare they should call him king Agamemnon? Who, if he had so much regarded present infamie, he shold have fought from the beginning for the defence of the ciric of Rom E. & not to have taken example of Themisleoles policie by flying, and afterwards to thinke it a shame as he did, to lie in Thessal yatime without fighting. Neither did God appoint them the fields of Pharfalia for a Theater, or close camp of necessitie to fight which of them should have the Empire of Rome. Further, there was no Herauld to summon him to fight, as there are at games of price, where he must answer to his name, and come and fight, or elfe to lose the honour of the crowne vnto another. But there were infinite other fields and townes (and as a man would fay, the whole earth) which the commoditie of his army by fea gaue him choice to conquer, if he would rather haue followed the steppes of Fabius Maximus, of Marins, of Lucullus, or of Agestiaus himselfe: who did patiently abide no lesse tumults within the citie selfe of Sparta, when the THEBANS Went to summon him to come out to fight for all the rest of his countrey. And in AGYPT also he didabide many false accusations against him, where with the king himselfe did burthen him, praying him alwaies to hauea litle patience. In fine, having followed the best counsel which he had determined with himselfe from the beginning, he saued the ÆGYPTIANS against their wils: and furthermore, he did not onely keepethe citie of Sparta, from fo great a danger, but did also set vp tokens of triumph in the same against the Thebans, whereby he was not compelled at that time to leade them out to the flaughter, and besides that, gaue his citizens occasion to obtain victorie afterwards. Hereupon Agefilans was highly praifed of them, whose liues he had saued against their wils. And Pompey contrarily was blamed by themselues through whom he had of fended:yet some say, that he was deceived by his father in law Scipio. For he meaning to keepe the most part of the money to himselfe which he had brought out of As 1A, did hasten and perfwade Pompey to give battell, telling him that there was no money left. The which though it had benetrue, a worthy Captaine should not so lightly haue bene brought into errour, vpona salse account, to hazard himselfe to loose all. Thus may we see what both of them were, by comparing them together. Furthermore, for their journey into ÆGYPT, the one fled thither by force, the other willingly went thither with small honour, for moneys sake to serve the barbarous people, with intent afterwards to make warre with the GRECIANS. Lastly, in that which we accuse the Agyptians for Pompeys sake, for the like matter doe they againe accuse Agesilans. For the one was cruelly put to death, and betrayed by them whom he trusted; and Agesilaus for sooke them which trusted him, and went to the enemies, having brought aide to fight against them.

The end of Pompeys life.

Aning determined in this volume to write the life of king Alexander; and of Inlins Cafar, that ouercame Pompey; and being to speake of many things, I will vie none other preface, but onely defire the readers not to blamemethough I doe not declare all things at large, but briefly touch divers, chiefly in those, their noblest acts and most worthy of memory. For they must remember, that my intet is not to write histories, but only liues. For the noblest deeds do not alwaies shew mens vertues and vices, but oftentimes a light occasion, a word, or some sport makes mens naturall dispositions and maners appeare more plaine, then the famous battels won, wherein are flaine tenthousand men; or the great armies, or cities won by siege, or affault. For like as painters or drawers of pictures, which make no account of other parts of the body, dotake the refemblances of the face and fauor of the countenance, in the which confifteth free the the judgement of their maners and disposition : even so they must give vs leave to seeke out the mens manis fignes and tokens of the mind onely, and thereby shew the life of either of them, referring you ners and conditions, vnto others to write the wars, battels, and other great things they did. It is certainethat Alexander was descended from Hercules by Caranus, and that by his mothers side, he came of the bloud The parent of the Aacides by Neoptolemus. They say also, that king Philip his father when he was a young man, fell in fancy with his mother olympias, which at that time also was a young maiden, and an orpha without father or mother, in the Isle of Samothracia, where they were both received into the mistery and fraternity of the house of the religious and that afterwards, he did aske her Philip king in mariage of her brother Arymbas, with whose consentthey were maried together. The night of Macedon. before they lay in wedded bed, the bride dreamed, that lightning fell into her belly, & that withall, there was a great light firethat dispersed it selfe all about in divers flames. King Philip her desame. husband alfo, shortly after he was maried, dreamed that he did feale his wives belly, and that the lip dreamed that he did feale his wives belly, and that the feale wherewith he sealed, left behind the print of a Lion. Certaine wisards and soothsayers told Philip, that this dreame gaue him warning to looke straightly to his wife. But Aristander Telemestan answered againe, that it signified his wife was conceiued with child, for that they do not scale a vessell that hothing in it and that she was with child with a boy, which should stream. hane a Lions heart. It is reported also, that many times as she lay asseepe in her bed, there was feene a serpent lying by her, the which was the chiefest cause (as some presuppose) that withdrew Philips loue & kindnes from her, and caused him that he lay not so oft with her, as before he was wont to do: either for that he feared some charme or enchantimet, or else for that he thought himselse ynmeete for her companie, supposing her to be beloued of some god. Some do alsore. port this after another fort as in this maner. That the women in those parts of long time, have been comonly possest with the spirit of Orpheus, and the divine fury of Bacchus, whereupon they are called Cleodones, & Mimallones (as much as warlike and fierce) & do many things like vnto the women of EDONIA & THRACIA, dwelling about the mountaine Æmus. Hereby it appeareth, that this word Treskeuin (fignifying in the Greek tong, too superstitiously given to the ceremonies of the gods) came from them. For Olympias aboue other women, louing to be inspired with fuch divine madnes & fury, did celebrate her folemne facrifices with a certaine horrible & barbarous maner. For in these dances to Bacchus, she caried a great number of tame snakes about her, the which gliding vpon the Iuie wherewith the women were dreffed in those ceremonies. & winding themselves about the litle iauclins they had in their hands, and the garlands about their heads, thereby they made men the more afraid of them. Wherupon Philip after this dreame. Sent Chero MEGALIPOLITAN vnto the oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, to enquire what it fignified, Anfwer was given him, that he should doe facrifice vnto Inpiter Hammo, & honor him about al gods: & that he had lost one of his eyes with the which he peeping in at a crany of his chamber doore, faw the god in forme of a snake lye by his wife. Furthermore, Olympias (as Eratosthenes writeth) bidding her son farwel when he went to conquer As 11, after she had secretly told him alone, by whom he was begotten, the prayed him to be valiant, and to thew himselfe worthy his sonne that begate him. Otherstell alfo, that she was angry with this report, saying: Will Alexander ne-The bit bif uer leave to make me suspected of June? So it is that Alexander was borne on the fixth day of the moneth of Hecatombecon, (in English, June) which the MACEDONIANS call Lous. On the ve-The temple ary fame day, the temple of Diana in the citie of Eph Esvs was burnt, as Hegefias Magnesian doth wirnes, whose crie and exclamatio was so terrible and cold, that it was enough to have queched that fire. It is not to be wondred at, that Diana suffered her temple to be burnt, being like a midwife, bufic about Alexanders birth. But this is true, that all the Priests, Magitians and soothfayers, which were at that time in Ephasys, judging that this did prognofticate some manuelof silvalier lous great misfortune to come, like men bestraught of their wits, they ran vp and downer the city finiting of their faces, and crying, that fome great plague and mischiefe was borne that day vnto As TA. Shortly after that king Philip had won y city of Potto AA, three medlengers came to him the fame day that brought him great newes. The first that Parmenio had won a notable battelof the LLLYRIANS: the second, that his horse onely wan the bel and prize at the Olympian games: and the third, that his wife had brought him a fonne called Alexander. Philip being maruellous glad to heare these newes, the soothsayers did make his joy yet greater: assuring him, that his fonne which was borne with three victories altogether, should be inuincible. Now for his sta-Alexanders ture and personage the statues and images made of him by Lysippus do best declare it, for that he would be drawne of no man but him onely. Diverse of his successours and friends didasterwards counterfeit his image, but that excellent workeman Lysppus onely, of all other thechiefuft, hath perfectly drawne and refembled Alexanders manner of holding his necke, fomewhat hanging downe towards the left fide, and also the sweet looke and cast of his eyes. But when Apelles painted Alexander, holding lightning in his hand, he did not show his fresh colour, but made him fomewhat blacke, and fwarter then his face indeede was ; for naturally he had a very faire white colour mingled allo with red, which chiefly appeared in his face & in his breaft. I remember I read also in the commentaries of Aristoxenus, that his skin had a maruellous good fauour, and that his breath was very fweet: insomuch that his bodie had so sweet a smell, of it selfe, that all the apparell he wore next vnto his body, tooke thereof a passing delightfull sauour, as if it had been perfumed. And the cause hereof paraducuture might be the very temperature & constitution of his body, which was hote and burning like fire. For Theophrastus is of opinion, that the fweet fauor cometh by meanes of the heatthat drieth vp the moisture of the body. By which reason also it appeareth, that the dry and hote countries parched with heat of the Sun, are those that deliuer vnto vs the best spices: because that the Sunne drieth vp the moisture of the outward parts, as a matter of corruption. This naturall heate that Alexander had, made him) as it appeareth) to be given to drinke, and to be hasty. Even from his childhood they saw that he was guento be chaft, For though other wische was very hot & hasty, yet was he hatdly moved with lust or pleasure of the body, & wold moderatly vse it. But on the other side, the ambirio & desire he had of honor, shewed a certaine greatnesse of mind and noble courage, passing his yeares. For he was not (as his father Philip) defirous of al kind of glorie: who like a Rhetoritian had a delight to viter his eloquence, and stamped in his coines, the victories he had wonne at the Olympian games, by the fwift running of his horse and coaches. For when he was asked one day (because he was swift of foot) whether he would assay to run for victorie at the Olympian games; I could be content, faid he, fo I might run with kings. And yet to speak generally, he misliked all such cotention for games. For it seemeth that he viterly misliked all wrestling & other exercise for prise where men did vse all their strength: but otherwise he himselse made certaine sestionall daies and games of prise for common stageplayers, mustians and fingers, and for the very Poets also. He delighted also in hunting of divers kinds of beasts, & playing at the staffe. Ambassadors being set on a time from the king of PERSIA; whilest his father was in some journey out of his realme; Alexander familiarly entertaining of them, fo wan them with his courteous entertainment (for that he vsed no childish questions vnto them, nor asked the trisling matters, but what distance it was from one place to another, and which way they went into the high countries of Asia, & of the king of Persia himselfe, how he was towards his enemies, and what power he had) that he did rauish them with delight to heare him, insomuch that they made no more account of Philips eloquence and sharpe wit, in respect of his sons courage and noble mind, to attempt great enterprifes. For when they brought him newes that his father had taken some famous citie, or had won fome great battel, he was nothing glad to heare it, but wold fay to his play-fellowes: Sirs, my fa- The noble ther will haue al, I shall haue nothing left me to conquer with you, that shall be ought worth. For mind of he delighting neither in pleasure nor riches, but only in valiantnes and honour, thought that the greater conquests and realmes his father should leave him, the lesse he shold have to do for himfelfe. And therfore, seeing that his fathers dominions and Empire increased daily more & more, perceiuing all occasion taken from him to doc any great attempt, he desired no riches nor pleafure, but wars & battels, and afpired to a figniorie where he might win honor. He had divers men appointed him (as it is to be supposed) to bring him vp:as schoolemasters, gouernors, & grooms of his chamber to attend vpon him: and among those, Leonidas was the chiefest manthat had the gouernment and charge of him, a man of a seucre disposition, & a kinsuman also vnto the queene the gouer-Olympias. He misliked to be called a master or tutor, though it be an office of good charge; wherupon others called him Alexarders gouernour, because he was a noble man, and allied to the Prince. But he that bare the name of his schoolmaster, was Lysimachus an Acarnanian borne, who had no other maner of civility in him, fauing that he called himf. Ife Phanix, Alexander A. chilles, and Philip Peleus: and therefore he was well thought of, and was the second person next vnto Leonidas. At what time Philonicus Thessalian had brought Bucephall the horse to sel vnto king Philip, asking thirteene talents, they went into the field to ride him. The horse was found horse. fo rough and churliff, that the riders faid he would never do feruice; for he would let no man get vp on his backe, nor abide any of the gentlemens voices about king Philip, but would yerke out at them. Thereupon Philip being afraid commanded them to cary him away as a wild beaft, and altogether unprofitable the which they had done, had not Alexander that flood by faid. O gode. what a horse do they turne away, for lacke of skill and heart to handle him? Philip heard what he faid, but held his peace. Alexander oft repeating his words, seeming to be forry that they should send the horse backe againe why, said Philip, dost thou controle them that have more experience then thou, & that know better then thou how to handle a horse? Alexander answered. and yet me thinkes I should handle him better then all they have done. But if thou canst not, no morethen they, replied Philip, what wilt thou forfeit for thy folly! I am content (quoth Alexander) to icopard the price of the horse. Eucry man laughed to heare his answer and the wager was laid between them. Then ran Alexander to the horse, & took him by the bridle; and turned him towards the Sun. It feemed that he had marked (as I suppose) how mad the horse was to see his The against owne shadow, which was euer before him in his eye, as he stirred too and fro. Then Alexander of speaking gently to the horse, and chapping him on the backe with his hand, till he had left his fu-ming the ric and inorting, fofily let fall his cloake from him, and lightly leaping on his backe, got vp without any danger, and holding the reines of the bridle hard, without firiking or ftirring the horse, the horse, made him to be gentle enough. Then when he faw that the fury of the horse was past, and that he began to gallop, he put him to his full career, and laid on spurs and voice a good. Philip at the first with seare beholding his sons agilitie, lest he should take some hurt, said neuer a word: but when he faw him readily turne the horfeat the end of his career, in a brauery for that he had done, all the lookers on gaue a shout for ioy. The father on the other side(as they say) fell a weeping for iov. And when Alexander was lighted from the horse, he said vnto him kissing his head: O some, thou must needs have a realine that is meet for thee, for MACEDON will not hold thee. Furthermore, confidering that of nature he was not to be won by extreamitie, and that by gentle meanes and perfyafion he could make him doe what he would he euer fought rather to perfwade then command him in any thing he had to doe. Now Philip putting no great affiance in his schoolemasters of musicke and humanitie, for the instruction and education of his sonne, whom he had appointed to teach him, but thinking rather that he needed men of greater learning then their capacities would reach vnto: and that as Sophocles faith, Aristorle anders feloolema. Acr. Ariftotle barne in the citte of Alexander the Great practifed Phificks. Some thinke that this place sheld of the rich soffer, that was found among king Darius iewels in Alexander

The city of

He needed many reines, and many bits at once: He sent for Aristotle (the greatest Philosopher in his time and best learned) to teach his son vnto whom he gaue honorable stipend. For Philip having wonne & taken before, the city of STA-GIRA, where Ariffule was borne, for his fake he built it again, and replenished it with inhabitants which fled away, or otherwife were in bondage. He appointed the for a schoolchouse and dwelling place, the pleafat house that is by the citie of MIEZA. In that place are yet seene seats of stone which Ariffele caufed to be made, & close walks to walke in the shadow. It is thought also, that Alexander did not only learne of Ariftotle moral! Philosophy and humanity, but also he heard of hum, other more secret, hard, and grave doctrine, which Artifolles scholers do properly cal Acroamata or Epoptica, meaning things speculative, which requireth the masters teaching to viderfland them, or else are kept fro comon knowledge; which sciences, they did not comonly teach. Alexander being passed into As 1 A, and hearing that Aristotle had put out certaine books of that matter, for the honors fake of Philosophy:he wrote a letter vnto him, somewhat too plaine, and of this effect. Atexander vnto Artflotte greeting, Thou haft not done wel to put forth the Acroamaticall sciences. For wherein shall we excell other, if those things which thou hast secretly * taught vs. be made common to all: I do thee to understand, that I had rather excell others in excellencie of knowledge then in greatnes of power. Farwell. Whereunto Artflotle to pacifie this his ambitious humor, wrote vnto him againe, that these bookes were published, and not publiflied. For to fay truly, in al his treatifes which he colled usited 7d out to there is no plain inftruction profitable for any man, neither to picke out by himself, nor yet to be taught by any other then Aristotole himself, or his scholers. So that it is written as a memorial for the that have bin entred & brought vp in the Peripateticke feet & doctrine. It feemeth also, that it was Aristotle about al other, that made Alexander take delight to fludy Phyficke. For Alexander did not only like the knowledge of speculation, but wold exercise practise also, and helpe his friends when they were ficke: & made befides certaine remedies, & rules to line by as appeareth by his letters he wrote, that of his ownenature he was much given to his booke & defired to reade much. Helearned alfo the Iliades of Homer of Ariflotules correctio, which they cal Tip the Tu paegung the corrected, as hauing passed under the rule: & laid it enery night under his beds head with his dagger calling it (as Onesferates writeth) the institution of martial discipline, And when he was in the high countries of Asia, where he could not readily come by other books, he wrote vnto Harpalus to fendthe to him. Harpalus fent him the histories of Philiftus, with divers tragedies of Europides, Sophocles, and Alchylus: & certaine hymnes of Telestus & Philoxenus. Alexander did renerence Aristotle atthe first, as his father, & so he tearmed him; because from his natural father he had life, but fro him, the knowledge to line. But afterwards he suspected him somewhat, yet he did him no hurt, neither was he fo friendly to him as he had been; whereby men perceived that he did not beare him the good will he was wont to do. This not with standing, he left not that zeale and defire he works kept. had to the studie of Philosophie, which he had learned from his youth, and still continued with him. For he shewed diverse testimonies thereof. As the honour he did vnto Mnaxarchus the fire fistier. Philosopher. The fiftie talents which he sent vnto Xenocrates, Damdamis, and Calanus of whom he made great account. When king Philip made warre with the BIZANTINES, Alexander being but fixteene yearesold, was left his Lieutenant in MACEDON, with the custodic and charge of his great feale: at what time he also subdued the MEDARIANS which had rebelled against him, and having won their city by assault, he draue out the barbarous people, and made a Colonie of it, of fundry nations, and called it ALEXANDROPOLIS, to fay, the citie of Alexander. He was with his fatheratthe battell of CHERONEA against the GRECIANS, where it was reported, that it was he that gaue charge first of all vpon the holy band of the Thebanes. Furthermore, there was an old oke feene in my time, which the countrimen commonly call Alexanders oke, because his tent or paullion was fastned to it; and not farre from thence is the charnell house, where those MACEDONIANS were buried that were flaine at the battel. For these causes, his father Philip loued him very dearely, and was glad to heare the Mac EDONIANS call Alexander king, and himself their Captaine. Howbeit the troubles that felout in his court afterwards by reason of Philips new mariages and loues, bred great quarrell and strife amongst the women: for the milchiefe of diffention & icalousse of women, doth separate the harts of kings one from another, whereof was chiefest cause, the sharpenesse of Olympias, who being a icalous woman, The quarels fretting, and of a reuenging mind, did incense Alexander against his father. But the chiefe cause of Philip that prouoked Alexander, was Attalns, at the mariage of Cleopatra, whom Philip maried a maiden, pies and falling in fancy with her when himselfe was past mariage. This was the matter: Attalus being vn- alexander, cle vnto this Cleopatra, fell drunke at the mariage, and having in his cups, he perswaded the Ma-CEDONIANS that were at the feast, to pray to the gods, that they might have a lawfull heire of Philip and Cleopatra, to succeed him in the kingdome of MACHDON. Alexander being in a rage therewith, threw a cup at his head, and faid vnto him; Why, traitor, what am I: doft thou take me for a baffard: Philip seeing that, rose from the boord, and drew out his sword, but by good fortune for them both, being troubled with choler and wine, he fell downe on the ground. Then Alexander mocking him, Lo, faid he to the Macedonians, here is the manthat prepared to go out of Evropeinto Asia, and stepping onely from one bedto another, ye see him laidalong on the ground. After this great infolencie, he tooke his mother olympias away with him, mac eth and carying her into his country of Epirvs, he left her there, and himself afterwards went into ILLYRIA In the meane time, Dema atus Corinthian, a friend of king Philips, and very familiar with him, came to fee him. Philip when he had courteoufly welcomed him, asked him how the GRECIANS did agree together. Truly, O king, quoth he, it imports you much to inquire of the agreement of the Grecians, when your owne court is fo full of quarell and contention. These words nipped Philip in such fort, and caused him to know his fault, that through Demaratus meanes, whom he sent to perswade Alexander to returne, Alexander was made to come back againe. Now when Percodorus, a Prince of Caria (defiring for necessities fake, to enter in league and friendship with Philip) offered his eldest daughter in mariage vnto Arideus king Philips son, and had sent Aristocritus ambassador into Mac E Don for that purposethe friends of A- Aristocri lexander and his mother, began againe to inucigle him with new reports & suspitions, how Philip by this great mariage would advance Arideus, to his vtter vindoing, and leave him his heire gotten of a in the kingdome. Alexander being netled therewith, fent one Theffalus a player of tragedies into Caria to Pexodorus, to persuade him to leaue Aridaus, that was abastard and a foole, and rather to make alliance with Alexander. This offer pleafed Pexodorus far better, to have Alexander his son in law, then Aridaus. Philip understanding this, went himselfe into Alexanders chamber, taking Philotas with him (the fon of Parmenio) one of his familiars, and bitterly tooke vp Alexander, telling him that he had a base mind, & was vnworthy to be left his heire after his death, if he would cast himselfeaway, marying the daughter of a Cartan, that was assauc and subject of a barbarous king. Thereupon he wrote letters vnto Corinth, that they should fend Thessalus bound vnto him. And furthermore, he banished out of MACEDON, Harpalus, Nearchus, Phrygus and Ptolomie, his sonnes companions: whom Alexander afterwards called home againe, and placed the in great authoritie about him. Shortly after, Paufanias sustaining villanie by the counfel and commandement of Attalus and Cleopatra, craning inflice of Philip, & finding no amends, Philip king he converted all his anger against him, and for spite slue him himself. Of this murther, most men of Matedon accused Queene olympias, who (as it is reported) alluring this yong man, having just cause of anger, to kill him. And Alexander also went not cleare from suspition of this murther. For some say that Paulanias after this villany was done him, complained vnto Alexander, and told him how he had been abused: who recited these verses of Euripides to him, inthe tragedie of Medea, where she said in anger, that she would be reuenged:

Both of the bridegroome, and the bride, And of the father in law.

Notwithstanding, afterwards he caused diligent search to be made, and all them to be seuerely punished that were of the conspiracie: and was angry also that his mother olympias had cruelly

The begin- flaine Cleopatra. So he came to be king of MACEDON attwenty yeares of age, and found his realme greatly enuied and hated of dangerous enemies, and eucry way full of danger. For the barbarous nations that were neare neighbours vnto MACEDON, could not abide the bondage of strangers, but defired to hauetheir naturall kings. Neither had Philip time enough to bridle and pacifie GRECE, which he had conquered by force of armes: but having a litle altered $ governments, had through his infolencie left them all in great trouble and ready to rebell, for that they had not long been acquainted to obey. Thereupon Alexanders councell of MACEDON, being afraid of the troublesome time, were of opinion, that Alexander should vtterly for sake the affaires of GRECE, and not to follow them with extremity, but that he shold seeke to win the barbarous people by gentle meanes, that had rebelled against him, & wifely to remedy these new stirs. But hefar otherwise determined to stablish his fasety by courage and magnanimity: per swading himselfe, that if they saw him stoope and yeeld at the beginning, how little so energy energy one would be vpon him. Thereupon, he straight quenched all the rebellion of the barbarous people, inuading them fodainely with his army, by the river of DANVEY, where in a great battell he onerthrew Syrmus, king of the TRIBALLIANS. Furthermore, having intelligence that § THE. BANS were revolted, and that the ATHENIANS also were confederate with them: to make them know that he was a man, he marched with his army towards the straight of Thermopiles, saying that he wold make Demosthenesthe Orator see (who in his orations, whilest he was in ILLYRIA, and in the country of the Triballians, called him child) that he was growne a fripling paffing through THESSALIE and should find him a man before the walles of ATHENS. When he came with his army vnto the gates of THEBES, he was willing to give them of the city occasion to repent them; and therefore onely demanded Phanix and Prothytes, authors of the rebellion; Furthermore, he proclaimed by trumpet, pardon and fafety vnto all them that would yeeld vnto him. The THEDAN'S on the other fide, demanded of him Philotas and Antipater, two of his chiefest scruants, & made the crier proclaime in the city, that all such as would defend the liberty of GRECE flould joyne with them. Then did Alexander leave the MACEDONIANS at liberty to make war with all cruelty. The THEBANS also fought with greater courage and desire then they were able, confidering that their enemies were many against one. And on the other side also. when the garrifon of the MACEBONIANS which were within the castle of CADM ALA, made a fallie vpon them, and gaue them charge in the rereward: then they being enuironed of all fides, were flaine in maner euery one of them, their city taken, destroyed, and razed euen to the hard ground. This he did, specially to make all the rest of the people of GRECE afraid by example of this great calamity & milerie of the THEBANS, to the end none of the should dare from thence foorth once to rife against him. He would cloke this cruelty of his vinder the complaints of his confederates, the Phocians & Plateians: who complaining to him of the iniuries the The EANS had offered, could not deny them inflice. Notwithflanding, excepting the priefts, and the religious, and all fuch as were friends vnto any of the Lords of MACEDON, all the friends and kinfimen of the poet Pindarus, & all those that had disswaded them which were the rebels, he fold all the rest of the citie of THEBES for slaves, which amounted to the number of thirty thousand perfons befides the that were flaineat the battel, which were fixe thou fand moc. Now among t the other miferies & calamities of the poore city of THEBES, there were certain THERE IN TOL diers, who having spoiled and defaced the house of Timoclea, a vertuous lady, & of noble parentage, they deuided her goods among them : and their Captaine having rauifhed her by force, af-A ked her, whether she had any where hidden any gold or filuer. The lady told him she had. Then leading him into her garden, the brought him vnto a wel: where the faid the hadcaft al her iewels and precious things, when she heard the city was taken. The barbarous THRACIAN stooped to looke into the well the standing behind him, thrust him in, & then threw stones enough on him, and fo killed him. The fouldiers when they knew it, tooke and bound her, and fo carried her vnto Alexander, When Alexander faw her countenance, & marked her gate, he supposed her at the first to be some great lady she followed the souldiers with such a maiestie and boldnesse. Alexander then asking her what she was : she answered, that she was the fifter of Theagenes, who fought a battell with king Philip beforethe citie of CHERONEA, where being general he was flaine, valiantly fighting for the defence of the liberty of GRECE. Alexander wondering at her noble anfwer and couragious deed, commanded no man should touch her nor her children, and so freely let her go whither she wold. He made league also with the ATHENIANS, though they were very fory for their miserable fortune. For the day of the solemne feasts of their mysteries being come they left it off, mourning for the THEBANS: courteoufly entertaining all those, that flying from THEBES came to the for fuccour. But whether it was for that his anger was past him, following therein the nature of Lyons: or because that after so great an example of cruelty, he would shew a fingular clemency againe: he did not onely pardon the ATHENIANS of all faults committed, but did also counsell them to looke wisely to their doings, for their citie one day should command all GRECE, if he chanced to dye. Men report, that certainely he oftentimes repented him that he had dealt fo cruelly with the THEBANS, and the griefe he tooke vpon it was cause that he afterwards shewed himselfe more mercifull vnto diuerse others. Afterwards also he did blame the fury of Bacchue, who to be reuenged of him, madehim kill Clitus at the table being drunke, and the Macedonians also to refuse him to go any further to conquerthe Indians, which was an imperfection of his enterprise, and a minishing also of his honour. Besides, there was neuer The BAN afterwards, that had escaped the fury of his victory, and did make any petition to him, but he had his suite. Thus was the estate of THEBES as you have heard. Then the GRE-CIANS having assembled a generall councell of all the states of GREECE within the straights of PELOPONNESSS, there it was determined that they would make warre with the Persians. Alexander Whereupon they chose Alexander Generall of all GREECE. Then diverse men coming to chosen Generall of all GREECE. visite Alexander, as well philosophers, as gouernours of states, to congratulate with him for his closed that Discourse Single with divides Congratulate with him for his Gree. election, he looked that Diogenes Sinopian (who dwelt at Corinth) wold likewise come as the rest had done: but when he saw he made no reckoning of him, and that he kept still in the suburbes of Conintu, at a place called Cranium, he went himselfe unto him, and found him laid all along in the Sunne. When Diogenes saw so many coming towards him, he sate vp a little, alexanders and looked full vpon Alexander. Alexander courteously spake vnto him, and asked him, if he talks with lacked any thing. Yea faidhe, that I do: that thou stand out of my Sunne a litle. Alexander Dingents. was so well pleased with this answer, and maruelled so much at that great boldnesse of this man, to see how small account he made of him; that when he went his way from him, Alexanders familiars laughing at Diogenes, and mocking him, he told them: Mafters fay what you lift, truly if I were not Alexander, I would be Diogenes. Alexander being destrous to heare what the Oracle of Apollo DELPHIAN Would fay vnto him touching the successe of his journey into Asia, he went vnto the citie of KELPHES. It chanced fo that he came thither in the daies which they call vnfortunate, on which daies no man vsed to aske Apollo any thing. This notwithstanding, he sent first vnto the Nunne which pronounced the Oracles to pray her to come vnto him. But she refused to come, alleadging the custome which forbad her to go. Thereupon, Alexander, went thither himselfe in person, and brought her out by sorceinto the temple. She seeing then that he would not be denied, but would needs haue his will, told him: My sonne, for that I see thou art inuincible. Alexander hearing that, fayd, he defired no other Oracle, and that he had as much as he looked for. Afterwards when he was euen ready to goe on with his voyage, he had diuerfe fignes and tokens from the gods: and amongst other, an image of the Poet orpheus made of cyprus, in the city of Lebeth & Es, in those daies did sweate maruellously. Many men fearing that pearing me figne, Aristander the soothsayer bad Alexander be of good cheare, and hope well; for he should obtaine noble victories that should neuer be forgotten, the which should make the poets and before hu iourney musitians sweate to write and sing them. Then, for his army which he led with him, they that do into Asa. fet downe the least number, say, that they were thirty thousand footmen, and fine thousand horsmen: & they that say more, do write, four eand thirty thousand footmen, and source thousand army in horsemen. Arisobalus writeth, that Alexander had no more butthreescore and tentalents to Asia. pay his fouldiers with: and Duris writeth, that he had no more prouision of victuals, then for thirty daies only. And Oneficritus fayeth moreouer, that hedid owe two hundred talents. Now, notwithstanding that he began this warre with so small ability to maintaine it, he would neuer take ship before he vnderstood the state of his friends, to know what ability they had to go with little state of his friends. him, and before he had given vnto fome, lands; and vnto others, atowne; and to others againe, lexander. the custome of some hauen, Thus by his bounty, hauing in maner spent almost the revenues of the crowne of Macedon, Perdiccas asked him: My Lord, what will you keepe for your selfe: · Hope, faydhe. Then, quoth Perdiccas againe, we will also have some part, since we go with you. and so refused the reuenew which the king had given him for his pension. Many others did also the like. But fuch as were contented to take his liberalitie, or would aske him anything, he gauethem very frankly, and in such liberalitie spent all the reuenew he had. With this desire and determination he went on to the straight of HELLESPONT, and going to the citie of ILIVM he did facrifice vnto Deana, and made funerall effusions vnto the demy gods (to wit, vnto the princes which died in the warre of TROIA, whose bodies were buried there) and specially vnto Achilles, whose graue he anointed with oile, and ranne naked round about it with his familiars. according to the ancient custome of funerals. Then he couered it with no legaies and flowers, faying, that Achilles was happy, who while he liued had a faithfull friend, and after his death an excellent herauld to fing his praise. When he had done, and went vp and downe the citic to see all the monuments and notable things there, one asked him, if he would fee Paris harpe. He answered againe, he would very faine see Achilles harpe, who played and sung vpon it all the famous acts done by valiant men in former times. In the meane time, Darius king of P B R S IA, har uing leanied a great army, fent his Captaines and Lieutenanes to tary Alexander at the riner of GRANICVS. There was Alexander to fight of necessity, being the onely barre to stop his entry into Asia. Moreover, the Captaines of the councell about him, were afraid of the depth of this river, and of the height of the banke on the other fide, which was very high and steepe, and could not be won withour fighting. And some fayd also that he should have speciall care of the ancient regard of the moneth; because the kings of MACEDON did never vie to put the army into the field in the moneth of Dason, which is Iune. For that, sayd Alexander, we will remedy soone: let them call it the second moneth, Artemisium, which is May. Furthermore Parmenio was of opinion, that he shold not meddle the first day, because it was very late. Alexander made answeragaine, that HELLESPONT wold blush for shame, if he were now afraid to passe ouer the river, fince he had already come over an arme of the fea. Thereupon he himfelfe first entred the river with thirteene guidons of horsemen, and marched forwards against an infinite number of arrowes which the enemies shot at him, as he was coming up the other banke, which was very high and steepe, and worst of all, full of armed men and horsemen of the enemies: which staied to receive him in battell ray, thrufting his men downe into the river, which was very deepe, and ranne so swift, that it almost caried them downe the streame: insomuch that men thought him more rash then wise, to leade his men with such danger. This not with standing, he was so wilfully bent that he would needs ouer, and in the end with great ado reconered the other fide, specially because the earth slidde away, by reason of the mudde. So when he was over, he was drinen to fight pell mell man to man, because his enemies did set vpon the first that were passed ouer, before they could put themselues into battell ray, with great cries, keeping their horfes very close together; and fought first with their darts, and afterwards came to the sword when their daers were broken. Then many of them fet vpon him alone, for he was cafilieto be knowne about the rest by his shield, and the hinder part of his helmet, about the which, there hung from the one fide to the other, a maruellous faire white plume. Alexander had a blow with a dart on his thigh, but it hurt him not. Thereupon Roefaces and Spithridates, both two chiefe Captaines of the Persians, setting vpon Alex inder at once, he left the one, and riding straight to Roefaces, who was excellently armed, he gave him such a blow with his launce, that he brake it in his hand, and straight drew out his sword, But so soone as they two had closed together, Spithridates comming at the one fide of him, raifed himfelfe vpon his stirrops, and gaue Alexander with all his might fuch a blow on his head with a battellaxe, that he cut the creast off his climfaned helmet, and one of the fides of his plume, and made such a gash, that the edge of his battellaxe dlexander againe, great Clitus preuenting him, thrust him through with a partisan; and at the very fame instant, Roefaces fell dead from his horse with a wound which Alexander gaue him with his fword. Now whileft the horsemen fought with such furie, the squadron of the battel! of the Macedonians footmen had passed the river, and both the battels began to march one against the other. The Persians stucke not manfully to it any long time, but straight villarie of turned their backes and fled, fauing the GRECIANS which tooke pay of king Darius: they drew together vpon a hill, and craued mercy of Alexander. But Alexander fetting vpon them, more of will then discretion, had his horse killed vnder him, being thrust through the slanke with a fword. This was not Bucephall, but another horse he had. All his menthat were slaine or hurt at this battell, were hurt amongst them valiantly fighting against desperate men. It is reported that there were flaine at this first battell, twenty thousand footmen of these barbarous people, and two thousand fine hundred horsemen. Of Alexanders side, Aristobulus writeth, that there were flaine foure and thirty men in all, of the which, twelue of them were footmen. Alexander to honour their valiantnesse, caused enery one of their images to be made in brasse by Lysippus. And because he would make the GRECIANS partakers of this victorie, he sent unto the ATHE-NIANS three hundred of their targets, which he had won at the battell; and generally vpon all the other spoiles he put this honorable inscription: Alexander the some of Philip, & the Grecians, excepting the Lacedamonians, have wonne this fivile upon the barbarous Asians. As for plate of goldor filier, also purple silkes, or other such precious things which he got among y Persians, he sent them all vnto his mother, a few except. This first victorie of Alexander, brought such a sudden change amongst the barbarous people in Alexanders behalfe, that the city selfe of SARDIS, the chiefe citie of the Empire of the barbarous people, or at the left through all the low countries and coasts vponthe sea, yeelded straight unto him; and the restalso, saving HALICARNASSUS and MILETVM, which did ftill refift him; howbeit at length, he tooke them by force. When he had so conquered all there about, he stood in doubt afterwards what Jewere best to determine. Sometime he had a maruellous desire, horly to follow Darins wherefocuer he were, and to venture all at a battell. Another time againe, he thought it better first to occupie himselfe in conquering these low countries, and to make himselfe strong with the money and riches he should find among them, that he might afterwards be the betterable to follow him. In the country of Lydia neare vnro the city XANTHVM, they fay, there is a spring that brake of it felf, & ouerflowing the banks about it, cast out a litle table of copper from the bottome, vponthe which were graued certaine caracters in old letters, which faid that the kingdome of the Persians should be destroyed by the GRECIANS. This did further so encourage Alexander, that he made hast to cleare all the sea coast, euen as far as CILICIA & PHOENICIA. But the wonderful good fucceffe he had, running along all the coaft of PAMPHILIA, gaue diverse historiographers occafion to set forth his doings with admiration, saying that it was one of the wonders of the world, that the fury of the fea, which viro all other was extreme rough, and many times would swell onerthe tops of the high rockes vpon the cliffes, fell calme vnto him. And it appeareth that Menander hunselfe in a comedy of his, doth wirnesse this wonderfull happinesse of Alexander, when merily he fayth:

> O great Alexander, how great is thy state? For thou with thy selfe maye ft thus infly debate: If any man living I list for to call, He cometh, and humbly before me doth fall. And if through the surges my journey doly, The waves give me way, and the fea becomes dry.

Yet Alexander himselse simply writeth in his epittles (without any great wonder) that by sea he passeda place called the ladder, and that to passe there, he tooke ship in the citie of Phaseli-DES. There heremained many daies: and when he faw the image of Theodectes PHASELITAN. standing in the market place, he went in adaunce thither one euening after supper, and cast The memoflowers and garlands vpon his image, honoring the memory of the dead, though it feemed but in 170 of the fport; for that he was his companion when he lined, by meanes of Aristotle and his philosophy. After that he ouercameal to the Pisidians, who thought to have refifted him; and conquered Alwander. all Phrygia besides. There in the city of Gordivs, which is said to be the anciet seat of king Mides, he faw the charret that is fo much spoken of, which is bound with the barke of a cornell with the same of t tree, and it was told him for a troth, of the barbarous people, that they beleeued it as a prophecy: Gordina in tree, and it was told him for a troth, or the Darbarous people, that they be clearly as a property that who soeuer could, vndoe the band of that barke, was certainly ordained to be king of all the phrygis, world. It is commonly reported, that Alexander proving to vndoe the band, and finding where king Midsa kept Midsa no ends to vndoe it by, they were so many fold wreathed one within the other, he drew out his fword, and cut the knot in the middest: so that then many ends appeared. But Aristobulus writeth, that he had quickly vidone the knot by taking the bolt out of the axtree, which holdeth the beame and body of the charret, and so seuered them a sunder. Departing thence, he conquered the Paphlagonians and Cappadocians; and understood of the death of Memnon, that was Darius Generall of his army by sea, and in whom was all their hope to trouble and withstand Alexander: whereupon he was the bolder to go on with his determination, to leade

phisitian,

his army into the high countries of Asia. Then did king Darius himselfe come against Alexander, having leavied a great power at Sysa, of fixe hundred thousand fighting men, trusting to that multitude, and also to a dreame, the which his wi sards had expounded rather to flatter him, then to tell him truly. Darius dreamed that he faw all the army of the MACEDONIANS on afire, and Alexander feruing of him in the selfe same attire that he himselfe wore when he was one of the chamber vnto the late king his predeceffor: and that when he came into the temple of Belus, he fuddenly vanished from him. By this dreame it plainly appeared, that the gods didfignifie vnto him, that the MACEDONIANS should have noble successe in their doings, and that Alexander should conquer all As IA, even as king Darius had done, when he was but Afgandes ynto the king; and that shortly after, he should end his life with great honour. This furthermore made him bold also, when he saw that Alexander remained a good while in CILICIA, fuppoling it had been for that he was affraid of him. Howbeit it was by reason of a sicknesse he had, the which some say he got by extreme paines and trauell, & others also, because he washed himself in the river Cydnus, which was cold as Ice. Howsoeuer it came, there was none of the other physicians that digit vindertake to cure him, thinking his disease vincurable, and no medicins to premaile that they could give him, and fearing also that the MACEDONIANS would lay it to their charge, if cilenander miscaried. But Philip ACARNANIAN, considering his master was very ill, and bearing himselfe of his love and good will towards him, thought he should not do that became him if he did not proue (feeing him in extremity & danger of life) the vtmost remedies of philicke, what danger soener he put himselfe into: and therefore tooke vpon him to minister vnto Alexander, and perfunded him to drinke it boldly if he would quickly be whole, and go to the warres. In the meane time, Parmenio wrot him a letter from the campe, aductifing him, that he should beware of Philip his physitian, for he was bribed and corrupted by Darius, with large promiles of great riches that he would give him with his daughter in mariage, to kill his mafter Alexander when he had read this letter, laid it under his beds head, and made none of his nearest familiars acquainted there with. When the houre came that he should take his medicine, Philip came into his chamber with other of the kings familiars, and brought a cup in his hand with the potion he should drinke. Alexander then gave him the letter, and withall, chearfully tooke the x cup of him, shewing no manner of feare or mistrust of any thing. It was a wonderfull thing and worth the fight, how one reading the letter, and the other drinking the medicine both at one inftant, they looked one ypon another, howbeit not both with like chearefull countenance. For Alexander looked merily upon him, plainly shewing the trust he had in his physician Phil p, and how much he loued him: and the physician also beheld Alexander like a man perplexed and amazed, to be fo falfly accused; and straight lift vp his hands to heaven, calling the godsto witnesse, that he was innocent; and then came to Alexanders bed side, and prayed him to be of good cheare, and boldly to do as he would aduife him. The medicine beginning to worke ouercame the difease, and draue for the time, all his naturall strength and powers to the lowest parts of his bodie: in so much as his speech failed him, and he fell into such a weakenesse, and almost fwounding, that his pulse did scant beate, and his sences were wel-neare taken from him. But that being past. Philip in few daies recoursed him againe. Now, when Alexander had gotten some strength, he shewed himselfe openly vnto the Machdonians for they would not be pacified, nor perswaded of his health virtill they had seene him. In king Darins campe, there was one Amyntas a Macedonian, and banish out of his countrey, who knew Alexanders disposition very well. He finding that Darius meant to meete with Alexander within the straights and vallies of the mountaines, befought him to tary rather where he was, being a plaine open countrey round about him; confidering that he had a great hoast of mento fight with a few enemies, and that it was most for his advantage to meete with him in the open field. Darius answered him againe, that he was afraid of nothing but that he would flie, before he could come to him. Amyntas replyed: For that O king, I pray you feare not: for I warrant you vpon my life he wilcome to Darliss con you, yea and is now onwards on his way coming towards you. All these perswasions of Amyntas could not turne Darius from making his camp to march towards Cilicia. At the felfe fame time alfo, Alexander went towards Syrt a to meet with him. But it chanced one night that the one of them miffed the other, and when day was come, they both returned backe againe: Alexander being glad of this hap, and making hast to meet with his enemie within the straights. Darius also seeking to winne Alexanders lodging from whence he came, and to bring his army out of the straights, began then to find the fault and error committed: for that he had shut himfelfe vp in the fraights (holden in on the one fide with the mountaine, and on the other with the sea, and the river of Pindarus that ranne betweene both) and that he was driven to disperse his army into diuerfe companies, in a stony and ill fauored country, ill for horsemento traucl; being on the contrary side a great advantage for his enemies, which were excellent good footmen, and but few in number. But now, as fortune gaue Alexander the field as he would wish it to fight for his aduantage, so could he tell excellently well how to set his men in battell ray to winne the victorie. For albeit that Alexander had the leffe number by many then his enemie, yet he had fuch policy and cast with him, that he foresaw all, and would not be enuironed. For he did put out the right wing of his battell a great deale further then he did his left wing, and fighting himfelf in the left wing in the formost rankes, he made al the barbarous people flie that stood before Darito and him howbeit, he was hurt on his thigh with a blow of a fword. Chares writeth, that Darius Alexander felse did hurt him, and that they fought together man to man. Notwithstanding Alexander selse writing of this battell vnto Antipater, fayth, that indeed he was hurt on the thigh with a fword. howbeir it put him to no danger: but he writeth northat Darius did hurt him. Thus having wona famous victory, and flaine aboue a hundred and ten thousand of his enemies, he could not yettake Darius, because he fled, having still foure or flue furlongs vantage before him: howbeit Darius in he tooke his charret of battell wherein he fought, and his bow also. Then he returned from the cities. chase, and found the Macedonian's sacking and spoiling all the rest of the campe of the barbarous people, where there was infinite riches, (although they had left the most part of their cariage behind them in the citie of DAMAs, to come lighter to the battel) but yet referred for himfeife all king Darius tent, which was full of great number of officers, of rich moneables, and of gold and filter. So, when he was come to the campe, putting off his armour, he entred into the bath and fayd: Come on, let vs go and and wash off the sweate of the battel in Darius owne bath. Nay, replyed one of his familiars againe, in Alexanders bath: for the goods of the vanquified are rightly the vanquishers. When he came into the bath, and saw the basons and cures, the boxes, and violles for perfumes, all of cleane gold, excellently wrought, all the chambers perfumed paffing sweetly, that it was like a paradife: then going out of his bath, and coming into his tent, feeing it fo ftately and large, his bed, the table, and supper, and all ready in such sumptuous fort, that it was wonderfull, he turned him vnto his familiars and fayd: This was a king indeed, was he not thinke ye? As he was ready to go to his supper, word was brought him, that they were bringing vnto him amongst other Ladiestaken prisoners, king Darius mother and his then, wile wife; and two of his daughters vnmaried: who having feene his charretand bow, burft out into lamentable cries, and violent beating of themselves, thinking Darius had been slaine, Alex-daughters, ander pawfed a good while and gaue no answer, pitying more their missfortune, then reioy-valexander. Cingathis ownegood hap. Then he presently sent one Leonarus vnto them, to let them understand, that Danus was alive, and that they should not neede to be afraid of Alexander, for he did not fight with Darius, but for his kingdome onely: and as for them, that they should have at his hands all that they had of Darius before, when he had his whole kingdome in his hands. As these words pleased the captine Ladies, so the deeds that followed, made them finde his clemency to be no leffe. For first, he suffered them to bury as many of the PERSIAN Lords as they ander onto would, even of them that had been flaine in the battell, and to take as much filkes of the fpoiles, the capture Ladies, iewels, and ornaments, as they thought good to honour their funerals with: and also did leffen no part of their honour, nor of the number of their officers and servants, nor of any iot of their estate which they had before, but did alow them also greater pensions then they had before. But about all, the princelieft grace, and most noble fauour that Alexander shewed vnto these captine Princesses, which had alwaies lined in honourable fame and chastitie, was this: That of Alexader they neuer heard word, or so much as any suspition that should make them as raid to be dishonoured or defloured but were privately amongst themselves, vnuisted or repaired vnto by any man, but of their owne, not as if they had been in a campe of their enemies, but as if they had been kept in some close monastery: although Darius wife (as it is written) was passing faire, as Darius also was a goodly Prince, and that his daughters likewise did resemble their father and mother. Alexander thinking it more princely for a king, as I suppose, to conquer himselfe, then to ouercome his enemics, didneither touch them, nor any other maide or wife, before he maried them, Barfine onely excepted; who being left Memnons widow (Generall of king

Darius by sea) was taken by the citie of DAMAS. She being excellently well learned in the Grecketongue, and of good entertainement (being the daughter of Artabazus, who came of a kings daughter) Alexander was bold with her by Parmenioes procurement (as Aristobulus writeth) who intifed him to imbrace the company of fo excellent a woman, and paffing faire befides. Furthermore beholding the other PERSIAN Ladies befide which were prisoners, what goodly faire women they were, he spake it pleasantly, that the Ladies of Persia made mens eyes foreto behold them. Norwithstanding, preferring the beautie of his continency before their fweete faire faces, he passed by without any sparke of affection towards them, more then if they had been images of stone without life. To confirme this; Philoxenus whom he had left his Licutenant in the low countries you the sea coast, wrote vnto him on a time, that one Theodorus a merchant of TARENTYM, had to fell two goodly yong boyes, maruellous faire: and therefore that he fent vnto him to know his pleasure, if he would buy them. Therewith he was so offended, that many times he cried out aloud: O my friends, what villany hath ever Philoxenus feene in me, that he should deuise (having nothing to do there) to purchase me such infamy? whereupon he wrote vnto him from the campe, with reprochfull words, that he should send that vile TARENTINE merchant Theodorus and his merchandife to the Deuill. He sharply punished also one Agnon, that wrote vnto him he would buy a young boy called Crobylus (who for beautie bare the onely name in Corint H) and bring him to him. Another time also, when he heard that Damon and Timotheus MACEDONIANS, Under Parmenioes charge, had deflowed two of the fouldiers wines that were strangers, and waged of him, he wrote vnto Parmenio to looke vnto it, and to examine the matter; and if he found them guiltie of the rape, that then he should put them both to death, as bruit beasts borneto destroy mankind. And in that letter he wrote thus of himfelfe: For my felfe, faid he, I have neither feene, nor defired to fee Darius wife: neither have I suffered any speech of her beautie beforeme. Moreouer he said, that he did winderstand that he was mortall by these two things: to wit, sleepe, and lust: for, from the weaknesse of our nature proceedeth sleepe, and sensuallity, He was also no greedy-gut, but temperate in eating, as he showed by many proofes: but chiefly in that he fayd vinto the princesse Ada, whom he adopted for his mother, and made her Queenc of CARIA. For when (fortheloue the bare him fine daily fent him fundry delicate diffics of meate, tarts, and marchpaines, and befides the meate it felic, the paftlers and cookes to make them, which were excellent workemen: How Lead. he answered that he could not tell what to do with them, for he had better cookes then those, appointed him by his governour Leonydas, to wit; for his dinner, to rife before day, and to march *by night; and for his supper, to eate litle at dinner. And my gouernour, sayd he, would oftentimes open the chefts where my bedding and apparrell lay, to feeif my mother had put any fine knackes or conceipts among them. Furthermore, he was leffe given to wine, then men would haue judged. For he was thought to be a greater bibber then he was, because he sate long at the boord, rather to talke then drinke. For ever when he dranke, he would propound fometedious matter, and yet but when he was at leifure. For having matters to do, there was < neither feast, banker, play, marriage, nor any pastime that could stay him: as they had done other Captaines, The which appeareth plainely by the shortnesse of his life, and by the wonderfull and notable deeds he did, in that litle time he lined. When he had leyfure, after he was vp in the morning, first of all he would do sucrifice to the gods, and then would go to dinner, s paffing away all the rest of the day, in hunting, writing something, taking vp some quarrell betweene fouldiers, or elfe in fludying. If he went any journey of no haftie bufineffe, he would exercise himselfe by the way as he went, shooting in his bow, or learning to get up or out of his charret fuddenly as it ranne. Oftentimes also for his pastime he would hunt the foxe, or catch birds, as appeareth in his booke of remembrances of euery day. Then when he came to his lodging, he would enter into his bath, and rubbe and annoint himselfe: and would aske his Mexander pantelers and carners, if his supper were ready. He would ever suppe late, and was very curious to sec, that cuerie man at his boord were alike serued; and would sit long at the table, prince 22. because he euer loued to talke, as we have told you before, Otherwise he was as noble a prince and gracious to waite vpon, and as pleasant, as any kingthat ener was. For he lacked no grace nor comelinesse to adorne a prince, saving that he would be some thing ouer busie in glorying of his owne deeds, much like vnto a bragging fouldier: neither was he contented himfelfe to please his owne humour that way, but would also suffer his familiars to sooth him even to his teeth. And this was many times the destruction of honest men about him, the which would never praife him in his prefence, hating the flatterers, nor yet durft fay leffe of the praifes which they gaue him. For of the first they were assumed, and by the second they fell in danger. After supper, he would wash himselfe againe, and sleepe vntill noone the next day following: and oftentimes allday long. For himfelfe, he was nothing curious of daintie dishes: for when any did fend him rare fruites, or fish, from the countries neare the sea side, he would fend them. abroad vnto his friends, & feldome keepe any thing for himfelf. His table not with standing was alwaies very honourably ferued, and did still increase his fare, as he did enlarge his conquests, till it came to the summe of ten thousand drachmaes a day. But there he stayed, and would not exceede that fumme: and moreover, commanded all menthat would feaft him, that they should not spend about that summe. After this battel of Is svs, he sent vnto the city of Damas, to take all the gold and filter, the cariage, & all the women and children of the PERSIANS which were left there, where the men of armes of the Thessalians sped them full well: for therefore did he fend them thither, because he saw that they had fought valiantly at the day of the battell: and so were the rest of his army also well stored with money. There the MACEDONIANS hauing tafted first of the gold, filuer, women, and barbarous life; as dogges by fent do follow the tracke of beafts, even fo were they greedie to follow after the goods of the Persians. First Alexander thought it best to winne all the sea coast. Thither came the Kings of CYPRVs and PHOENICIA, and deliuered up to him the whole Iland and all PHOENICIA, fauing onely the citie of TYRE. That citie he befieged seuen monethes together by land, with great bulwarkes & Alexander divers engines of batterie, and by sea, with two hundred gallies. During this siege, Alexander besieges dreamed one night, that Hereules held out his hand vnto him over the walles of the citie, and the citie, called him by his name: and there were divers Tyrians also that dreamed in like fort, that A- Alexanders pollotold them that he would go vnto Alexander, because he was not pleased with their doings dreame at in the citie. Thereupon they bound his image (which was of a wonderfull bignesse) with great the city of chaines, and nailed him downe fast to the base, as if he had bene a traitor that would have yeelded himselfe vnto their enemies, and called him Alexandrine, as much as fauouring Alexander. Alexander had there also another dreame; for he dreamed he saw a Satyre a farre off sporting Alexanders with him, and when he thought to have come neare to have taken him, he ftill escaped from found him: vntil at the length, after he had runne a good while after him, and intreated him, he fell into dreame a. his hands. The Soothfayers being asked what this dreame should fignific, answered probably, since by deniding Satyros into two, and then it is 32 Topos which fignifieth, the city of TYRE shall be thine. And they do yet shew vnto this day, the fountaine where Alexander thought he saw the Satyre. Continuing this fiege, he went to make warre with the ARABIANS, that dwell vpon describes the mountaine Antiliban, where he was in great danger of being cast away onely because he isomers as heard his tutor Lysmachus that followed him, say boastingly, that he was not inferiour, nor gainst the older then the Phoenix. For when they came at the foote of the mountaine, they left their horfes, and went up on foote: and Alexander was of so courteous a nature, that he would not leaue mons. his tutor Lysimachus behindhim, (who was so wearie that he could go no further) but because it was darke night, and for that the enemies were not farre from them, he came behind to encourage his tutor, and in manner to carie him. By this meanes vnawares, he was farre from his armie with very few men about him, and benighted besides: moreouer, it was verie cold, and the way was very ill. At the length, perceiving divers fires which the enemies had made, some in one place, and some in another, trusting to his valiantnesse, having alwayes provided remedie in extremitie, when the MAGEDONIANS were diffrested, himselfe ever put- Thecouting too his owne hand, he ranne vnto them that had made the fires next him, and killing two rage and of the barbarous people that lay by the fire fide, he fnatched away a fire-brand, and ranne agility of alexander, with it to his owne men, who made a great fire. At this the barbarous people were so affraid, that they ranne their way as fast as they could. Other also thinking to come and set vpon him, he flue them enery man, and fo lay there that night, himfelfe and his men without danger. Thus Chares reporteth this matter. Now for the fiege of Tyre, that fell out thus. Alexander caufed the most part of his armic to take rest, being ouerharried and wearied with so many battels as they had fought; and fent a few of his men onely to give affault vnto the citie, to keepe the Tyrian's occupied, that they should take no rest. One day the Soothsayer Ariflander facrificing vnto the gods, having confidered of the fignes of the intrailes of the beafts, Eucry body laughed to heare him: for that day was the very last day of the moneth. Alexander feeing him amated, as one that could not tel what to fay to it, feeking euer to bring those tokens to effect, which the Soothsayers did prognosticate, commanded them that they should not reekon that day the thirtieth day, but the feuen and twentieth: and immediatly vpon it made the trumpet found the allarme, & gaue a hotter affault to the wal, then he had thought to have done the chiefe city of Syria, therefell a clod of earth upon his shouldier, out of the which there flew a bird into the aire. The bird lighting vpon one of the engines of his batterie was caught with the nets made of finewes which couered ouer the ropes of the engines, Aristander did prognosticate, that it fignified he should be hurt in his shoulder, not with standing, that he should yet taketherowne. And indeed it came so to passe. When he sent great presents of spoyles which he wanne at the facke of this citie, vnto his mother Olympias, Cleopatra, and divers others of his friends: among other things, he fent vnto Leonidas his Gouernour, fine hundred talents weight of frankensence, and a hundred talents weight of myrrhe: remembring the hope he put him into when he was a child. For, as Alexander was vpon a day facrificing vnto the gods, he tooke both his hands full of frankensence to cast into the fire, to make a perfume thereof. When his Gouernour Leonidas faw him, he faid thus vnto him . When thou hast conquered the countrey where their fweetethings grow, then be liberall of thy perfume: but now, The citie of could not keepe in, but must needes runne to the affault to helpe their companions. The Tyri-Ans feeing the affault fo hote on every fide, their hearts began to faile them, and by this meanes kenby A.

was the city taken the felfe fame day. Another time also, when Alexander was before GAZA, spare that litle thou hast at this present. Alexander calling to mind at that time his admonition, wrote vnto him in this fort: We do fend thee plentie of frankensence and myrrhe, because thou shouldest no more be a niggard vnto the gods. There was brought vnto him a litle coffer also, which was thought to be the preciousest thing and the richest that was gotten of all the spoyles and riches, taken at the ouerthrow of Darius. When he saw it, he asked his familiars that were about him, what they thought fittest, and the best thing to be put into it. Some said one thing, xfome faid another thing : but he faid, he would put the Iliads of Homer into it, as the worthiest thing. This is confirmed by the best Historiographers. Now if that which the ALEXANDRIANS report vpon Heraclides words, betrue, then it appeareth that he did profite himselfe much by Homer in this iourney. For it is reported that when he had conquered AGYPT, he determined to build a great citie, and to replenish it with a great number of GRECIANS, and to call it after his name. But as he was about to inclose a certaine ground, which he had chosen by the aduice of his enginers and worke-mafters, the night before he had a maruellous dreame, that he faw an Alexanders old man standing before him, full of white haires, with an honourable presence, and coming towards him faid these verses: Within the forming fea there lies a certaine Iland, right Against the shore of Agapt, which of ancient Pharos hight. As soone as he arose y next morning, he went to see this Ile of PHAROs, the which at that time was a litle about the mouth of the riuer of Nilus, called Canobia, howbeit it is now joyned vnto firme land, being forced by mans hand. This he thought the meetest place that could be, to build the citie which he had determined. For it is as a tongue or a great barre of earth, broad inough, that separateth a great lake on the one side, & the sea on the other, the which doth loyne hard to a great hauen. Then he faid that Homer was wonderful in all his things, but that among ft others, he was an excellent Architector: and commanded that straight they should east the platforme of the citie, according to the situation of the place. Now they found at that time, no chalke, nor white earth there to mark withal, wherfore they were driue to take meale, & with that did mark out vpon the earth being blacke the compaffe of the town that was round and circular, and being deuided into two equall parts, either of them resembled the skirts and fashion of the MACE-DONIAN cloake. Alexander liked this draught passingly well. But there arose vpon the sodaine out of the river or lake, such an infinite multitude of great fowle of all sorts, that they covered the element as it had bene a cloud, and lighting within this circuit, did eat vp all the meale, and left not acrumme. Alexander liked not these signes. Notwithstanding, his Soothsayer bad him not be discouraged, for they told him it was a signe that he should build a citie there, fo plentifull of all things, that he should maintaine all forts of people. Then he commanded them, vnto whom he had given the charge of the building, that they should go forward with their worke, and he himselfe in the meane time, tooke his journey to go visite the temple of Itpiter Hammon. The journey was long, and there were many troubles by the way, but two journey pue dangers about all the rest most speciall; the first was lacke of water, because they had to trauell to theoremany dayes journey through a great defert; the fecond was, the danger of the rifing of the South wind by the way, to blow the fand abroade, which was of a wonderfull length. And it is reported, that on a time there arose such a tempest in that desert, that blew vp whole hils of sand, which flue fif. ie thousand men of Cambyfes armie. Euery man in Alexanders traine did know Cambyfes these dangers very well: howbeit it was hard to dissivade Alexander from any thing which he armystaine had a defire vnto. For, fortune fauouring him in all his attempts, made him constant and re- by fandbuls. folute in his determinations: and his noble courage besides, made him intincible in all things he tooke in hand, infomuch as he did not onely compell his enemies, but he had power also of time and place. In that voyage, in stead of these former dangers spoken of, he had many helpes, the which are supposed were sent him from the gods, by the oracles that followed afterwards. For in a certaine fort they have beleeved the oracles that were written of him. First of all, the wonderfull water and great showers that fell from the element did keepe him from feare of the first danger, and did quench their thirst, and moistened the drinesse of the fand, in such fort that there came a sweete fresh ayre from it. Furthermore, when the markes were hidden from the guides to shew them the way, and that they wandred vp and downethey could not tell where, there came crowes vnto them that did guide them flying before them: flying fast when they faw them follow them, and stayed for them when they were behind. But Challisthenes, writeth a greater ded slexit wonder then this, that in the night time, with the very noise of the crowes, they brought them database againe into the right way which had loft their way. Thus Alexander in the end, having passed ionray. through this wildernesse, he came vnto the temple he sought for: where the prophet or chiefe priest faluted him from the god Hammon, as from his father. Then Alexander asked him, if any of the murtherers that had killed his father, were leftaline. The priest answered him, & bad him take heede he did not blaspheme, for his father was no mortall man. Then Alexander againe rehearfing that he had spoken, asked him, if the murtherers that had conspired the death of Philip' his father were all punished. After that, he asked him touching his kingdome, if he would grant him to be King ouer all the world. The god answered him by the mouth of his prophet, he should: and that the death of Phelip was fully reuenged. Then did Alexander offer great presents vnto the god, and gaue money largely to the priests and ministers of the temple. This is that the most part of writers do declare, touching Alexanders demand, and the oracles given him. Yet did Alexander himselse write vnto his mother, that he had secret oracles from the god, which he would onely impart vnto her, at his returne into Maczdon. Others fay also, that the prophet meaning to falute him in the Greeketongue, to welcome him the better, would have faid vnto him, O Paidion, as much as deare sonne: but that he tripped a litle in his tongue, because, the Greeke was not his naturall tongue, and placed an, s, for an, n, in the latter end, faying, o Paidies, to wit, O sonne of Iupiter: and that Alexander was glad of that mistaking. Whereupon there ranne a rumour straight among his men, that Inpiter had called him his son. It is faid also, that he heard Pfammon the Philosopher in ÆGYPT, and that he liked his words very well, when The faying. he said that God was King of all mortall men. For (quothhe) he that commandeth all things, of planman must needs be God. But Alexander selfe spake better, and like a Philosopher, when he said: the Philosopher that God generally was father to al mortalmen, but that particularly he did elect the best fort for providence himselfe. To conclude, he shewed himselfe more arrogant vnto the barbarous people, and made of God. as though he certainly beleeued that he had bin begotten of some god; but vnto the GRECIANS he spake more modestly, of divine generation. For in a letter he wrote vnto the ATHENIANS afteribeth touching the city of Samos, he faid: I gaue you not that noble free city, but it was given you at that time by him, whom they called my Lord and father: meaning Philip. Afterwards also being ftriken with an arrow, &feeling great paine of it: My friends, said he, This bloud which is spilt, is mans bloud, and not as Homer faid,

No fuch as from th' immortall gods doth flow.

And one day also in a maruellous great thunder, when every man was afraid, Anaxarchus the Rhetoritian being present, said vnto him: O thou some of Iupiter, wilt thou do as much: No, said Nnn 2

he, laughing on him, I will not be so fearefull to my friends, as thou wouldst have merdisdaining the service of fish to my boord, because thou sees not princes heads served in And y report goeth alfo, that Alexander vpon a time, fending a litle fish vnto Hephastion, Anaxarchus should fav as it were in mockerie, that they which aboue others feeke for fame with great trouble and hazard of life, haue either small pleasure in the world, or else as little as others haue. By these proofes & reasons alleaged, we may thinke that Alexander had no vaine nor presumptuous opinion of him-· felfe, to think that he was otherwife begotten of a god, but that he did it in policie to keep other men vnder obedience, by the opinion conceined of his godhead. Returning out of PHOENICIA Alexander into AGYPT, he made many facrifices, feafts, and processions in honour of the gods, fundric madefeafts dances, tragedies, and fuch like pastimes, goodly to behold: not onely for the sumptuous setting out of them, but also for the good will and diligence of the setters forth of them, which stringed cuery one to exceed the other. For the kings of the Cyprians were the setters of them forth, as at ATHENS they draw by lot a citizen of every tribe of the people, to defray the charges of these pastimes. These kings were very earnest who should do best, but specially Nicocreon, king of Sa-LAMINA, in Cyprys: and Pasicrates, Lord of the city of Sol Bs. For it fel out to their lot to furnishtwo of the excellentest players; Pasicrates furnished Athenodorus, and Nicocreon Thessalus, whom Alexander loued fingularly well, though he made no shew of it, vntill that Athenodoras was declared victour, by the Judges deputed to give fentence. For when he went from the playes, he told them he did like the Judges opinion well, notwithftanding, he would have bene contented to have given the one halfe of his Realme, not to have seene Thessaus overcome. thenodorus being condemned vponatime by the ATHENIANS, because he was not in ATHENS at the feaft of Bacchus, when the Comedies & Tragedies were plaied, and a fine fet on his head for his absence:he besought Alexander to write vnto them in his behalfe, that they would release his penaltic. Alexander would not so do, but sent thither his money, whereof he was condemned, and payed it for him of his owne purse. Also when Lycon Scarphian, an excellent stageplayer had pleafed Alexander well, and did foift in a verse in his comedie, containing a petition of tentalents: Alexander laughing at it, gaue it him. Darius at that time wrote vnto Alexander. and vnto certaine of his friends also, to pray him to take ten thousand talents for the ransome of all those prisoners he had in his hands, and for all the countries, lands and figniories on this side the river of Euphrates, and one of his daughters also in mariage, that from thenceforth he might be his kinseman and friend. Alexander imparted this to his councell. Among them Parmenio faid vnto him: If I were Alexander, quoth he, furely I would accept his offer. So would I indeed quoth Alexander again, if I were Parmenio. In fine, he wrote againe vnto Darius, that if he would fubmit himself, he would vie him curteously: if not, that then he wold presently march towards him. But he repented him afterwards, when king Darins wife was dead with child: for without x diffimulation it grieued him much, that he had lost fo noblean occasion to shew his curtosic and clemencie. This not with franding, he gaue her body honourable buriall, sparing for no cost. Amongst the Eunuches of the Queenes chamber, there was one Tireus taken prisoner, among the women:who stealing out of Alexanders camp, taking his horse-backe, rode vnto Darius to bring him newes of the death of his wife. Then Darius beating of his head, and weeping bitterly, cried out aloud: O gods, what wretched hap have the Persians! that have not only had the wife and fister of their king taken prisoners cuen in his life time, but now that she is dead intrauel of child, she hath bene depriued of princely burial. Then spake the cunuch to him, and said: For her buriall, most gracious king, and for all due honor that might be wished her, Persia hath no cause to complaine of her hard fortune. For neither did Queene Statira your wife whilst she lived prisoner, nor your mother, nor daughters, want any part or iot of their honor they were wont to haue before, fauing onely to fee the light of your honour, the which, god oromafdes grant to restore again(if it be his will)vnto your Maiestie:neither was there any honor wanting at her death (to fer forth her flately funerals) that might be gotten, but more, was lamented also with the teares Kof your enemies. For Alexander is as merciful in victory as he is valiant in battell. Darius hearing the Eunuches wordes, being vexed in mind for very griefe, tooke the Eunuchafide into the fe-Dariostalle Cretest place of his tent, and faid vnto him: If thou be not, with the misfortune of the Persian, with Tirest become a Macedonian, but does in thy heart acknowledge Darius for thy fourraigne Lord and master: I pray thee, and do also consure thee, by the reuerence thou bearest vnto this bright light of the Sunne, and to the right hand of the King, that thou do tell me truly.

Are the fe the least eails which I lament in Statira, her imprisonment and death. And did she not in her life makevs more miferable by her dishonor, then if we had dishonorably fallen into the hands of acruell enemy? For, what honest communication, I pray thee, can a young victorious Prince haue with his enemics wife a prifoner hauing done her to much honour as he had done? Darius going on with these speeches, Tireus the cunuch fell downe on his knees, and belought him not to fay for neither to blemish the vertue of Alexander in that fort, nor yet so to dishonour his fifter and wife deceased, & thereby also to deprive himself of the greatest comfort he could wish to haue in his calamitie, which was, to be our come by an enemy that had greater vertues then a man could possibly haue; but rather that he should wonder at Alexanders vertue, who had x shewed himself chaster to the Ladies, then valiant against the Persians, And therewith all the eunuch confirmed the great honestie, chastitie and noble mind of Alexander, by many great and The condeepe oathes. Then Darius coming out among his friends againe, holding vp his hands vnto mendation the heavens, made this prayer vnto the gods: O heavenly gods, creators of men, and protectors deribuftion of Kings and Realmes: first, I befeech you grant me, that restoring the Persians against otheir tie. former good estate, I may leaue the Realme vnto my successors, with that glorie & fame I receined it of my predecessors that obtaining victorie, I may vie Alexander with that great honor and courtefie, which he hath in my mifery shewed vnto those I loued best in the world. Or otherwise if the time appointed be come, that the kingdome of Persia must needes have end, either thorough diaine reuenge, or by naturall change of earthly things: then good gods yet grant, that none but Alexander after me, may fit in Cyrus throne. Divers writers do agree, that these things came even thus to passe. Now Alexander having conquered all Asia on this side of the river daring. Euphrates, he went to meet with Darius, that came downe with ten hundred thousand fighting proper me men. It was told him by fome of his friends to make him laugh, that the flaues of his armie had in his deuided themselues in two parts, and had chosen them a Generall of either part, naming the one Darinsar-Alexander, and the other Darius and that at the first, they began to skirmish only with clods of miest un earth, and afterwards with fifts; but at the last, they grew so hor, that they came to plaine stones thousand and staues, so that they could not be parted. Alexander hearing that, would needes have the two figuring Generals fight hand to hand one with the other; and Alexander self did arme him that was called Alexander and Philotas the other which was called Darius. All the armie thereupon was ga-at the timer thered together to fee this combat betweene them, as a thing that did betoken good or ill lecke Emphrates. to come. The fight was sharpe betweene them, but in the end, he that was called Alexander onercame the other: and Alexander to reward him, gaue him twelve villages, with priviledge to goafter the Peas I AN manner. Thus it is written by Eratosthenes. The great battell that Alexander fought with Darius, was not (as many writers report) at Arbeles, but at Gaufameles, which fignifieth in the Persian tongue, the house of the Cammell. For some one of the ancient kings of Persia that had escaped from the hands of his enemies, flying vpon a dromedaric cammell, lodged him in that place, and therefore appointed the renenues of certaine villages to keepe the cammel there. There fel out at that time an eclipse of the Moone, in the moneth called Beedromion(now August) about the time that the feasts of the mysteries were celebrated at A-THENS. The eleuenth night after that, both the armies being in fight each of other, Darius kept his men in battell ray, and went himselfe by torch-light viewing his bands & companies. Alexander on the other fide whilest his MACEDONIAN fouldiers slep, was before his tent with Arifrander the Soothfayer, and made tertaine fecret ceremonies and facrifices vnto Apollo. The ancient captaines of the MACEDONIANS, specially Parmenio, seeing all the valley betwirt the river of Niphates, and the mountaines of the Gordierans, all on a bright light with the fires of the barbarous people, and hearing a dreadfull noise as of a confused multitude of people that filled their campe with the found thereof: they were amazed, and confulted, that in one day it was in maner vnpossible to fight a battell with such an incredible multitude of people. Thereupon they went vnto Alexander after he had ended his ceremonies, and did counfell him to give barrell by night, because the darkenesse thereof should helpe to keepe all seare from his men, which the fight of their enemies would bring them into. But then he gaue them this notable answer: I will not stealevictorie, quoth he. This answer seemed very fond and arrogant to some, that The maghe was so pleasant, being neare so great danger. Howbeit others thinke that it was a present nanimitie noble courage, and a deepe confideration of him, to thinke what should happen: thereby of Alexanto give Darius no manner of occasion (if he were overcome) to take heart againe, and to prove another battell, accusing the darknesse of the night as cause of his overthrow; as he had done as the first conslict, imputing his ouerthrow to the mountaines, the straights, and the sea. For faid he, Darius wil neuer leave to make wars with vs for lacke of men, nor municion, having fo large a realme as he hath, & fuch a world of people belides: but then he would no more hazard battel. when his heart is done, and all hope tiken from him, and that he feeth his armie at noone dayes ouerthrowne by plaine battell. After his Captaines were gone from him, he went into his tent, and laid him downe to fleepe, and flept all that night more foundly then he was wont to do beforeinformach as the Lords and Princes of his campe coming to waite vpon him at his vprifing; maruelled when they found him fo found affecpe, & therefore of themselues they commanded the fouldiers to eate. Afterwards, perceiuing that time came fast vpon them, Parmenio went into Alexanders chamber, and coming to his beds fide, called him twife or thrife by name, till at the last he awaked him, & asked him how he chanced that he slept so long, like one that had already ouercome, and that did not thinke he should fight as great and dangerous a battell as euer he did in his life. Why, faid Alexander, laughing on him : doeft thou not thinke we have alreadic overcome, being troubled no more with running after Darens vp and downe a countrey vtterly destroyed, as we should otherwise have bene compelled to have done, if he would not have come to battel, and destroyed the country beforevs? Now Alexander did not only show himself before the battell, but euen at the very instant of the battell, a noble man of courage, and of great indgement. For Parmento leading the left wing of his battell, the men of armes of the Back Re-ANS gaue such a fierce onlet vpon the MACEBONIANS, thit they made them give backe: and Mazensalfo, king Darens lieutenant, fent certaine troupes of horfemen out of their battel, to give cl a gevponthem that were left in the campeto guard the carriage, Parmenio being amazed with either of both attem ts, sent immediatly to aductife Alexander, that all their campe and cariage would be loft, if ne did not fend prefently to aid the rereward. When these newes came to Alexander from Farmeno, he had already given the fignall of battell vnto his men for to give charges Whereupon he answered the messenger that brought him these newes, that he should tell Parmento he was a mad man and out of his wits, not remembring that if they wan the battell, they should not only faue their owne cariage, but also win the cariage of their enemies; and if it were their chance to lose it, then that they should not neede to care for their cariage, nor for their flaues, but only to thinke to die honourably, valiantly fighting for his life. Having fent this meffage vnto Parmento, he put on his helinet. The rest of his armour for his body, he had put it on before in his tent, which was, a Sicilian cattocke, and vpon that a brigandine made of many folds of canuas with oyler-holes, which was gotten among the spoiles at the battel of Is svs. His head-peece was as bright as filter, made by Theophilus the armourer: his coller fute-like to the fame, all fet full of precious ftones, and he had a fword by his fide maruellous light, and of excellent temper, which the King of the CITIEIANS had given him, ving commonly to fight with his fword at any fet battel. His coate-armour was maruellous rich, and of fumptuous workmanthip, farre about all the reft he wore. It was of the workmanship of Hellicon, the which the RHO-DIANS gaue him for a prefent, & this he commonly wore when he went to battell. Now when he did fet his men in battell ray, or made any oration vnto them, or did ride along ft the bands to take view of them, he alwaies vied to ride vpon another horse to spare Bucephal, because he was then somewhat old: notwithstanding, when he meant indeed to fight, then Bucephal was brought vnto him, & as foone as he was gotten vp on his back, the trumpet founded, and he gaue charge, Then, after he had made long exhortations to encourage y men of armes of the Thessalians and the other GRECIANS allo, & when they had all promifed him they would flick to him like men, and prayed him to leade them, and giue charge vpon the enemies: he tooke his launce in his left hand, and holding vp his right hand vnto headen, befought the gods (as Callifhenes writeth) that if it were true he was begotten of Iupiter, that it would please them that day to helpe him, and to encourage the GRECIANS. The Southfayer Ariftander was then on horse backe hard by Alexander, apparelled all in white, and a crowne of gold on his head, who shewed Alexander when he made his prayer, an Eagle flying ouer his head, and pointing direcitly towards his enemies. This maruelloufly encouraged all the army that faw it, and with this ioy, the men of armes of Alexanders fide, encouraging one another, did fet spurres to their horse to charge vpon the enemies. This battel of the footmen of the Persians, began a litle to giue way, and before the foremost could come to giue them charge, the barbarous people surned their backes, and fled. The chase was great: Alexander driving them that fled vpon the middest of their owne battell, where Darius selfe was in person, he spied him a farre off, oner the foremost rankes in the middest of his battell, being a goodly tall Prince, standing in a chariot of warre, compassed in round with great troupes of horsemen, allset in goodly ordinance to receive the enemie. But when they faw Alexander at hand with fo grimme alooke, chafing them that fled, through those that yet keepe their rankes, there fel such a feare among them, that the most part dispersed themselves. Notwithstanding, the best and most valiant men fought it to the death before their King, and falling dead one vpon another, they did let them that the enemics could not fo well follow Darius. For they lying one by another on the ground, drawing on to the last gaspe, did yet take both men and horses by the legges to hinder them. Darius then feeing nothing butterror and destruction before his eyes, and that the bands which he had set before him for safegard, came backe vpon him, so as he could not deuise how to turne his chariot forward nor backward, the wheeles were so hindred and stayed with the heapes of dead bodies; and that the horse also being set you and hid in maner in this conslict tell to leaping and plunging for feare, so that the charrettiers could no longer guide nor drive them: he got vp vpon a mare that lately had a fole, and so saucd himselfe slying vpon her. And The string yet had he not thus escaped, had not Parmenio once againe fent vnto Alexander to pray him of Darius, to come and aidehim: because there was yet a great squadron whole together that made no countenance to flie. Somewhat there was in it, that they accused Parmenio that day to have dealt but flackly and cowardly, either because his age had taken his courage from him, or else for that he enuied Alexanders greatnesse and prosperitie, who against his will became over great. as Callisthenes faid. In fine, Alexander was angry with the fecond meffage, and yet told not his mentruly the cause why, but seigning that he would have them leave killing, and because also night came on , he caused the trumper sound retraite, and so went towards his armie, whom he thought to be in distresse. Notwithstanding, newes came, to him by the way, that in that place also, they had given the enemies the overthrow, and that they fled every way for life. The battell having this fuccesse, every man thought that the kingdome of the Persians was Alexanders vtterly ouerthrowne, and that Alexander likewise was become onely King of all As 1 A: where- third via upon he made sumptuous sacrifices vnto the gods, and gaue great riches, houses, lands, and flor of Day possessions vnto his friends and familiars. Furthermore, to show his liberalitic also vnto the libe alory GRECIANS, he wrote vnto them, that he would have all tyrannics suppressed throughout all to all men. GREECE, and that all the GRECIAN'S should line at libertie under their owne lawes. Particularly also he wrote vnto the Plat Elans, that he would reedifie their city againe, because their predecellors in times past, had given their countrey vnto the GRECIANS, to fight against the barbarous people for the defence of the comon libertie of all GRECE. He fent also into ITALY vnto the Chotonians, part of the spoile, to honour the memory of the valiant nesse, and good will of Phayllus their citizen, who in the time of their wars with the MEDES (when all the GRE-CIANS that dwelt in ITALY had for faken their naturall countrimen of GRECE it selfe, because they thought they could not otherwise scape) went with a ship of his vnto Salamina, which he armed and fet forth at his owne charges, because he would be at the battell, and partake also of the common danger with the Gree IAN's. Such honour did Alexander beare vnto proweffe, that he loued to reward and remember the worthy deedes of men. Then Alexander marching with his army into the countrey of Babylon, they all yeelded ftraight vnto him. When he came into the countrey of the ECBATANIANS, he maruelled when he faw an opening of the earth. out of the which there came continuall sparkes of fire as out of a well; and that hard by also the earth spued out continually a kinde of * maund or chalkie clay somewhat liquid, of such abundance, as it seemed like a lake. This maund of chalke is like vnto a kind of lime or clay, but it is so front easie to set on fire, that not touching it with any flame, by the brightnesse onely of the light and power that cometh out of the fire, it is fet on fire, and doth also set the aire on fire which is betweene in the country to the large of Napha, both. The barbarous people of that countrey, being defirous to shew Alexander the nature of try of the that Naptha, scattered the street that led to his lodging, with some of it. Then the day being shut barania, in, they fired it at one of the ends, and the first drops taking fire, in the twinkling of an eye, all the rest from one end of the street to the other was on a slame, and though it was darke and within night, lightened all the place thereabout. Alexander being in a bath at that time, and waited vpon by a page called Stenen, (a hard fauoured boy, but yet that had an excellent sweet voice to sing)

one Athenophanes an ATHENIAN, that alwayes nointed and bathed the King, & much delighted him with his pleasant conceits, asked him if he would see the trial of this Naptha vpon Steven: for if the fire tooke & went not out, then he would fay it had a wonderfull force, & was vnquenchable. The page was contented to haue it proued vpo him. But so soone as they had laid it on him. and did but touch it onely, it tooke straight such a flame, and so fired his body, that Alexander himselfe was in a maruellous perplexitie withal. And fure had it not bin by good hap, that there were many by, ready with veffels ful of water to put into the bath, it had bin vnpoffible to have faued the boy from being burnt to nothing; and yet so he scaped narrowly, and besides was sicke long after. Now some apply this Naptha vnto the fable of Medea, saying, that therewith she rub. bed the crowne & lawne flie gaue vnto the daughter of Creon at her mariage, fo much spoken of in the tragedies. For neither the crowne nor the lawne could cast fire of themselves, neither did the fire light by chance: but by oyling them with this Naptha she wrought a certaine aptnesse to receive more forcibly the operation of the fire, which was in place where the bride fate. For the beames which the fire cafteth out, have over fome bodies no other force, but to hear and lighten them; but fuch as have an oily dric humour, and thereby a fimpathy and proportionable conformitie with the nature of the fire it cafily inflameth & fetteth on fire, by the forcible impression of his beames Howbeitthey make a great questió of the cause of this natural force of Naptha, *or whether this liquid fubfrance & moist humor, that taketh fire so easily, doth some of the earth that is fatty & apeto coccine fire. For the country about Baby Lon is very hot, in fomuch as oftetimes barley being put into the ground, it bloweth it vp again, as if ŷ earth by vehement inflam. mation had a strong blast to cast it out; and men in the extremest heate in the sommer, do sleepe there vpo great leather budgets filled ful of fresh water. Harpalus, whom Alexander left there his Lieutenant and Gouernor of that country, defiring to fet forth and beautifie the gardens of the Kings pallace and walkes of the same, with all maner plants of GRECE, he brought all the rest to good paffe, fauing juic only, which the earth could neuer abide, but it euer died; because the heat the country and temper of the earth killed it and the my of it felfeliketh fresh aire & a cold ground. This digression is somewhat fro the matter, but peraduenture the Reader wil not think it trouble some, how hard focuer he find it, so it be not our tedious. Alexander having won the citie of Sv san he found within the castle foure thousand talents in ready coyne, gold & filter, besides other infinite treasure and inestimable, amongst the which (it is faid) he found to the value of fine thou-*ti femeth fand talents weight of *purple Hermiona filk, which they had locked up fafe, & kept the space of two hundred yeares faue ten, & yet the colour kept as fresh as if it had bin newly made. Some fay that the cause why it was so well kept, came by meanes of the dying of it with hony, in silkes. which before had bindled red, and with white oile in white filkes. For there are filkes feene of that colour of as long a time, that keepe colour as well as the other. Dino writeth furthermore, that the kings of PERSIA made water to be brought from the rivers of Nilus & Ister (otherwise called Danubie) which they did lock vp with their other treasure for a confirmatio of the greatnes of their Empire, & to shew that they were Lords of the world. The waies to enter into PERs 1 A being very hard of passage, and in maner unpassible, (both for the ilnesse of the waies, as also for the guard that kept them, which were the choisest men of Persia) Darius also being fled thither: there was one that spake the Greeke & Persian tongue (whose father was borne in the Alexanders country of Lycia, and his mother a Persian) that guided Alexander into Persia, by some compaffe fetched about not very long, according to the oracles answer of Alexander given by the mouth of the Nun Pythias, when he was a child: that a Lycian should guide and leade him against the Persians. There was then great flaughter made in Persia of the prisoners that were taken. For Alexander himselfe writeth, that he commanded the men should be put to the fword, thinking that the best way to serue his turne. It is faid also, that there he found a marnellous treasure of gold and filter in readic money, as he had done before in the city of Sysa: the which he caried away with all the reft of the Kings rich wardrobe, and with it laded ten thoufund moyles, and fine thousand camels. Alexander entring into the castle of the chiefe citie of PERSIA, faw by chance a great image of Xerxes lie on the ground, the which vnawares was throwne downe by the multitude of the fouldiers that came in thronging one vpon another. Thereupon he stayed, and spoke vnto it as if it had bene aline, saying I cannot tell whether I should passe by thee, and let thee lie, for the warre thou made it sometime against the GRE-CIANS: Or whether I should lift thee vp, respecting the noble minde and vertues thou haddest.

In the end, when he had stood mute a long time; confidering of it, he went his way: and meaning to refresh his weariearmy, because it was the winter quarter, he remained there 4. moneths together. The report goeth that the first time that Alexader fate under the cloth of state of king Darius, all ofrich gold, Demarathus Corinthian (who first began to love him, even in his father Philips time) burft out in teares for ioy (good old man) faying, that § GRECIAN'S long time dead before, were depriued of this bleffed hap, to fee Alexader fit in king Xerxes princely chaire. After that, preparing again to go against Darius, he would needs make merry one day, and refresh him felfe with fome banquet. It chanced for that he and his companions was bidden to a private feast prigatly, where was attembled fome fine curtifans of his familiars, who with their frieds taried at the banquet, Among ft them was that famous Than, borne in the countrey of ATTICA, and then concubing to Prolony, king of AGYPT after Alexanders death. She finely praifed Alexander, and Theirspartly in sporting wife, began to vtter matter in affection of her countrey, but yet of greater importance then became her mouth saying, that that day she found her selfefully recompended to Than the her great good liking, for al the paines she hadtaken, trauelling through al the coutries of As IA, barlee. following of his army, now that the had this fauor and good hap to be merry and pleafant, in the proud & stately pallace of the great kings of Persia. But yet it would do her more good for a recreation to burne Xerxes houle with the fire of ioy, who had burnt the city of ATHENS: and her felf to give the fire to it, before so noble a Prince as Alexander. Because ever after it might be faid, that the woman following his campe had taken more noble reuenge of the PERSIANS, for the wrongs and injuries they had done vnto GR B C B, then all the Captaines of GR B C B that ever were, had done, either by land or fea. When she had faid, Alexanders familiars about him, clapped their hands, and made great noise for joy faying: that it were as good a deed as could be possible. and perswaded Alexander vnto it. Alexander yeelding to their perswasions, rosevp, and putting a garland of flowers vpon his head, went foremost himselse; and all his samiliars sollowed after him, crying and duncing all about the castle. The other MACEDONIANS hearing of it also, came thither immediatly with torches light & great ioy, hoping that this was a good figure that Alexander meant to return eagain cinto Mac B Don, and not to dwell in the countrey of the barbarous people, fith he did burne & deftroy the kings caftle. Thus and in this fort it was thought perfectles to be burnt. Some writers thinke other wife; that it was not burnt with fuch sport, but by deter- fer on fire mination of the councell. But how focuer it was, all they grant, that Alexander did prefently repent him, and commanded the fire to be quenched straight. For his liberality, that good wil and reading for give, increased with his conquests; and when he did bestow gifts on any, he would befides his gift, ever give them good countenance, on whom he bestowed his grace and savor. And I will recite a few examples thereof. Ariflo being Colonell of the PEONIANS, having flaine one of his enemies, he brought him his head, and faid; fuch a prefent, O king, by vs, is ever rewarded with a cup of gold. Yea, quoth Alexander finiling vpon him, with an emptie cup. But I drinke to thee this cup full of good wine, and do give thee cup and all. Another time, he met with a poore MACEDONIAN that led a moyle loden with gold of the Kings: & when the poore moyle was fo wearie that she could no longer carrie her burden, the moyletter put it vpon his own back, and loded himfelfe withall, carying it fo a good prety way: howbeit in the end being ouerloden, was about to throw it downe on the ground. Alexander perceiuing it, asked him what burden he caried. When it was told him: wel, quoth he to the moyletter, be not weary yet, but carie it into the tent, for I giue it thee. To be short, he was angrier with them that would take nothing of him, then he was with those that would aske him somewhat. He wrotealso vnto Phocion, that he would take him no more for his friend, if he would refuse his gifts. It seemed that he had given nothing vnto a yong boy called Serapion (who ever did ferue them the ball that plaid at tennis) because he asked him nothing. Wherefore the King playing on a time, this yong boy threw the ball toothers that played with him, and not to himfelfe. The King maruelling at it, at the length faid vato him: Why my boy, doeft not thou give methe ball! because your Maiestie doth not aske it me, quoth he. Alexander then understanding his meaning, laughed at the boy, and did much for him afterwards. There was attending on him also one Proteas, a pleafant conceited man, and that could least finely, it chanced upon some occasion that Alexander fell out with him: whereupon some of his friends were intercessors vnto the King for him, & befought him to pardon him: & Protess himselfalso being present, craued pardon with teares in his eies. Alexander therupon forgaue him. Then presetly replied Proteas, I defire it may please your grace,

that I may receive some testimonic to assure me I am in your favor. Therupon the king straight commanded one to give him fluetalents. The goods and riches he gaue vnto his familiars and guard about him, were very great, as it appeared plainly by a letter which his mother Olympias wrote vnto him, to this effect: I know thou sparest not to give thy friends large gifts, & that thou makest much of them: but thereby thou makest them kings fellowes, they get many friends, and leaue thee post alone without any. His mother did many times write such like matters vnto him the which Alexander kept very fecret, fauing one day when he opened one of them, Hephieftion being present drew neare, & read the letter with him, as he was wont to do. Alexander did let him alone, but when he had read it, he pluckt the scale of armes from his finger, wherewith he did vse to seale his letters, and put it to Hephestions mouth. He gaue also vnto the son of Mazeus (that was the chiefest man about Darius) a second gouernment, besides that which he had before, & greater then the first. This yong nobleman refused it, saying why, and it please your Grace, before there was but one Darius, but you now make many Alexanders. He gaue vnto Parmenio alfo Lagoas house, where (as it is reported) he found a thousand talents worth of the spoiles & goods of the Svstans. He wrote also vnto Antipater, that he should keepe a guard about his person, for he had many enemies that lay in wait for him. He did fend also many goodly presents vnto his mother, but withal he wrote vnto her, that she wold meddle no more with his matters nor gifts, taking vp6 her the office of a captain. She storming at it, he patietly did brook her anger. Antipater another time, writing a long letter vnto him against his mother olympias, when he had read itoquer, lo, faid he, Antipater knoweth not, that one teare of the mothers eye wil wipe out ten thoufand fuch letters. Furthermore, Alexander perceiving on a time, that his friends became very diffolute and licencious in diet and life, and that Agnon THEIAN had his corked shoots nailed with filuer nailes; that Leonatus also caused divers camels to be lode amongst his cariage with powder of ÆGYPT, to put vpon him when he wrestled or vsed any other exercise of body; and that also they caried after Philotus, toies for chase and hunting, of a hundred furlong long; and that there were also that vsed precious perfumes and fweet fauors when they bathed these lues, more then there were that subbed themselues with plaine oyle; and that they had fine chamber laines to rub the in the bath, & to make their beds foft and delicate the wifely and court coully rebuked them and faid: I maruell, faid he, that you which have fought in fo often and great battels, do not remember that they which trauell, do fleepe more fweet & foundly, then they that take their eafe and do nothing and that you do not marke, that comparing your life, with the maner of life of the PERSIANS, to line at pleasure is a vilething, & to trauel is princely. And how I pray you, can a man take paine to dreffe his own horse, or to make cleane his lance or helmet, that for flothful curiofities fake, disdaineth to rub his own body with his fingers. Are you ignorant, that the tipe ⊀of honour in all our victory confisteth, in scorning to do that which we see them do, whom we haue vanquished and ouercome? To bring them therefore by his example, to acquaint themselues with hardinesse, he tooke more paines in warres and in hunting, and did hazard himselse more dangeroufly, then euer he had done before. Wherupon an Ambatfador of LACED EMON being prefent to see him fight with a Lion, and to kill him, said vnto him: Truly your Grace hath fought well with this Lion, and tried which of you two should be King. Craterus after that, caufed this hunting to be fet vp in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES; where are the images of the Lion, of the dogges, and of the King fighting with the Lion, and of himselfe also that came to helpe him, all those images being of copper, some made by Lysippus, the rest by Leochares. Thus Alexander did put himselfe vnto all icopardies, as well to exercise his strength and courage, as alfoto allure his men to do the like. This notwithstanding his friends and familiars hauing wealth at will, as men exceeding rich, they would needes live delicately and at case, and would take no more paines, misliking vtterly to go vp and downe the countries to make warre here and there, and thereupon began a litle to find fault with Alexander, and to speake euill of him. Which at the first Alexander tooke quietly, faying that it was honour for a King to X suffer himselfe to be slandered and ill spoken of, for doing of good. And yet the least good turnes he did vnto his friends, did shew his hearty loue and honour he bare them, as shall appeare vnto you by some examples that follow. Pencestas being bitten by a Beare, did let his friends, and friends vinderstand by letters, but he wrote nothing thereof vinto Alexander. Alexander was offended therewith, and wrote vnto him thus: Send me word at the least yet how thou doest, & whether any of thy fellowes did for sake thee at the hunting, to the end they may be punished.

Hephaltier

Alexander tic of his friends.

Hephastion being absent about certaine businesse he had, Alexander wrote vnto him, that as they were hunting a beast called Ichnewmon, Craterus vnfortunatly crossing Perdiccas dart, was striken through both his thighes. Pencestas being cured of a great disease, Alexander wrote vnto Alexippus his Phisition that had cured him, and gaue him thankes. Craterus also being ficke, he dreamed of him one night, and therefore made certaine facrifices for the recourty of his health, and fent vnto him, willing him to do the like. And when the Philizion Paufanias meanttogiue him a drinke of Elleborus, he wrote letters vnto him, telling him what danger he was in, and prayed him to be carefull how he received that medicine. He did also put Ephialses and Ciffus in prison, who brought him the first newes of Harpalus stying, because they did wrongfully accuse and slander him. When he had commanded there should be a bill made of all the old mens names, and diseased persons that were in his campe, to send them home againe into their countrey: there was one Eurylochus ÆGEIAN, that made his name be billed among the ficke persons, and it was found afterwards that he was not sicke; and confessed that he did it onely to follow a young woman called Telesippa, with whome he was in lone, who was returning homewards towards the sea side. Alexander asked him, whether this woman were free or bond: he answered him, that she was a curtizan free borne. Then said Alexander vnto Eurylochus, I would be glad to further thy loue, yet I cannot force her to tarie: but feeke to win her by giftes and faire words to be contented to tarie, fishence she is a free woman. It is a wonderfull thing to fee what paines he would take, to write for his friends, euen in such trisses as he did. As when he wrote into CILICIA for a servant of Seleucus that was fled from his master, sending straight commandement, that they should carefully lay for him. And by another letter he commendeth Peucestas, for that he had stayed and taken one Nicon, a slave of Graterus. And by one other letter also vnto Megabizus, touching another bondman that had taken sanctuarie in a temple, he commanded him also to seeke to entise him out of the san Stuarie, to lay hold on him if he could, but otherwise not to meddle with him in any case. It is said also, that at the first whe he vsed to sit in indgement to heare criminall causes, whilst the accuser went on with his complaint & accusation, he alwayes vsed to lay his hand ypon one of his eares, to keepe that cleane from the matter of accusation, thereby referuing it to heare the purgation and instification of the person condemned. But afterwards, the number of accusations that were brought before him, did so proude the condensed of the person conden and alter him, that he did beleeue the false accusations, by the great number of the true that were brought in. But nothing put him more in rage, then when he vnderstood they had spoken ill decander of him: and then he was fo fierce, as no pardon would be granted, for that he loued his honour more then his kingdome or life. Then at that time he went against Darrus, thinking that he meant to fight against bury understanding there are not a had role at the life. meant to fight againe: but vnderstanding that Bessus had taken him, then he gaue the THESSA- kenos hum. Alexander had then a maruellous long, hard, and painefull iour- Alexanders ney in following of Darius: for in eleuen dayes, he rode three thousand and three hundreth paintful furlongs, infomuch as the most part of his men were even weary, and done for lacke of water.

It chanced him one day to meete with certaine Macedonians that caried (vpon moyles) of Darius. goate skinnes full of water, which they had fetched from a river. They feeing Alexander in manner dead for thirst, being about noone, ranne quickly to him, and in a head peecebrought him water. Alexander asked them to whom they caried this water. They answered him againe, that they caried it to their children, but yet would have your Grace to liue: for though we lose them, we may get more children. When they had faid fo, Alexander tooke the helmet with water, and perceiting that the men of armes that were about him, and had followed him, did thrust out their neckes to looke vpon this water, he gauethe water backe againe vnto them that disconder had given it him, and thanked them, but dranke none of it: for faid he, if I drinke alone, all these to bisjoilmenhere will faint. Then they feeing the noble courage & courtefie of Alexander, cried out that dier, and be should lead them, and the course of the state of the he should lead them, and therewithall beganne to spurre their horses, saying, that they were Alexander not wearie nor athirst, nor did thinke themselves mortall, so long as they had such a King. regarded Euery man was alike willing to follow Alexander, yet had he but threefcore onely that entred not the with him into the commission of the with him into the commission of the second of the commission of the second of the commission of the commissio with him into the enemies campe. But at the length, with much ado, they found him layed along in a coach, having many wounds vpon his bodie, some of darts and some of speares. So he being almost at the last cast, called for fome drinke, and dranke cold water, which Poly fratus gaue him. To whom when he had drunk, he faid: this is my last mishap my friend, that having received this pleasure, I cannot requite thee: howbeit Alexander will recompence thee, & the gods Alexander, for the liberality and courtefie which he hath flewed ynto my wife and children, whom I pray thee embrace for my fake. Ar these last words, he tooke Polystratus by the hand, and so gaue vp the ghost. Alexander came immediatly after, and plainely fliewed that he was forie for his death and misfortune: and vndoing his own cloake he cast it you the bodie of Darius. After that, having by good hap gotten Bestine into his hands he tare him in peeces with two high straight trees which he bowed downwards. and tied his leggesto each of them: so that when the trees were let go, they gaue a fod aine cruell ierke vp. and caried either tree a peece of his body with it. Then Alexander having given Darius corpfe princely buriall, and embalmed him, he fent it vnto his mother, and received his brother Exathres for one of his friends. From thence he went into the courry of Hyrcania with all the flower of his army, where he faw the gulfe of the sca Caspium, which he thought of no lesse er Caspium. greatnes, then the sea of Pontys, howbeit calmer then the other seas be. He could not then certainely find out what it was nor from whence it came: but of likelihood he thought it was fome breaking out of y lake or marrish of Meotin. Yet fome ancient natural Phylosophers seemed to know truly what it was. For many yeares before Alexanders voyage and conquest, they wrote. that of the foure chiefest gulfes of the sea, which come from the Ocean, and do enter within maine land, that which is more Northerly, is the fea Caspium, which they call also Hyrcanium. As Alexander went through the country, certaine barbarous people fod ainly fet vpon them that led Bucephal his horse, and tooke him: but with that he was in such a rage, that he sent a Herauld into their countries to proclaime open warres vpon them, and that he would put man, woman, and child to the fword if they brought him not his horse againe. Whereupon, when his horse was returned home, & that they yeelded up their cities and forts into his hands, he did yfethem al very curreoufly, and moreouer did give them money for the ransome of his horse, which they Alexander reftored. Departing thence, he entred into the countrey of PARTHIA. There having lev fureegoth efter nough, he began to apparel himself after the sashion of the barbarous people, because he thought therby the better to win the hearts of the countrimen, framing himfelf vnto their own fashions: or elfeto trie the hearts of the Macedonians, to fee how they would like the manner of the PERSIANS (which he meant to bring them vnto) in reucrencing of him as they did their King. by litle and litle acquainting them to allow the alteration and change of his life. This not withstanding, he would not at the first take up the apparell of the MEDES, which was very strange, and altogether barbarous. For he went not without breeches, nor did we are a long gowne tray. ling on the ground, nor a high coptant hat, but tooke a meane apparell, betwixt the MEDES and the Persians, more modelithen the one, and more costly then the other, and yet at the first he did not weare it, but when he would talke with the barbarous people, or else privately amongst his friends and familiars. Afterwards notwithstanding, he shewed himself openly to the people in that apparell, when he gaue them audience. This fight grieued the MACEDONIANS much but they had his vertues in fuch admiration, that they thought it meete in some things he should take his owne pleasure, fithence he had bene often hurt in the warres, and not long before had his legge broken with an arrow; and another time, had fuch a blow with a frone full in his nocke, that it made him purre-blind a great while after, and yet neverthelesse he never eschewed any bodily danger; for he passed ouer the river of Orexarres, which he tooke to be Tanais, and having in battell overthrowne the Scythians, he followed them in chafe about an hundreth furlongs, notwithstanding that at that instant he had a loofenesse of bodie. This there came vnto him (as it is reported) the Queene of the Amazons, as many writers do testifie among the which are these, Clitarchus, Polycritus, Onesicritus, Antigenes, and Hister. But Chares, Piolomie, Anticlides and Philon THEBAN, Philip the Historiographer, Hecateus ERBERIAN, Philip CHALCIDIAN, and Duris SAMIAN, all these do write, that it was not true; and it seemethalfo that Alexander felfe doth confirme it. For, writing all things particularly vnto Antipater as they happened vnto him, he wrote vnto him that the King of Scythia offered him his daughter in mariage:but there he maketh no mention at all of any Amazon. It is also said, that Onesicritus long time after that did reade vnto king Lysimachus, the fourth booke of his historie, where he did speake of the AMAZON. Lysimachus similing, said vnto him: Why, and where was I then But for that matter, to credit it, or not to credit it, Alexanders estimation therby is neither impaired nor advanced. Furthermore, Alexander fearing that the MACEDONIANS, being weary with this long warre, would go no further, he left all the reft of his army behind, and tooke only twenty thousand footmen, and three thousand horsemen of the choisest men of his army. and with them inuaded the countrey of Hyrcania. There he made an oration vnto them, and told them, that the barbarous people of As 1 A had but seenethem as it were in a dreame; and if they should now returne backe into MACEDON, having but onely stirred them, and not altogether subdued Asia, the people offended with them would set upon them as they went home, as if they were no better than women. Neuertheleffe, he gaue any man leaue to returne that would, protesting therewith against them that would go, how they did for sake him, his friends, and those who had so good hearts towards him, as to follow him in so noble a journey, to conquer the whole earth vnto the Macabonians. This felf matter is reported thus in a letter which Alexander wrote vnto Antipater: and there he writeth furthermore, that having made this oration vnto them, they all cryed our, and bade him leade them into what part of the world with one he would. When they had granted their goodwils, it was no hard matter afterwards, to winne word of his the rest of the common fort, who followed the example of the chiefest. Thereupon he did brought the frame himselfethe more to live after the fashion of the country there, and enterchangeably al- Macedonifoto bring the men of that countrey vntothe maner of the Macedonians: being persuaded dience. that by this mixture and enterchange of maners one with another, he should by friendship more then force, make them agree louingly together, when that he should be so farre from the countrey of PBR sia. For this purpose therefore, he chose thirtie thousand of their children of that country, and fet them to learne the Greeke tongue, & to be brought vp in the discipline of wars after the Macedonians maner; and gaue them schoolemasters and Captaines to traine them in each faculty. And for the marrying of Roxane, he fancied her, feeing her at a feast where he was: Alexander which fell out as well for his turne, as if he had with better advice and counsell loued her. For the maried barbarous people were very proud of this match, when as they faw him make alliance with the in this fort, infomuch as they loued him better then they did before, because they saw in those things he was alwaies fo chast and continent, that notwithstanding he was maruellously in loue with her, yet he would not dishonorably touch this yong Lady, before he was maried into her. Furthermore, Alexander confidering that of the two men which he loued best, Hephastica liked well of his match, and went apparelled as himselfe did, and that Craterus contrarily did still yse the Macedonian maner, he dealt in all affaires with the barbarous people, by Hephestion, and with the GRECIANS & MACEDONIANS, by Craterus. To be short he loued the one, and honoredthe other: faying that Hephastion loued Alexander, and Craterus loued the king. Hereupon these two persons bare one another grudge in their harts, & oftentimes brake out in open quarrell:infomuch as on a time being in INDIA, they drew their fwords, and fought together, and diuerse of their friends ran to take part with either side. Thither came Alexander selfe also, who Haphastion openly before them all, bitterly tooke vp Hephastion, and called him foole and bedlem, faying, dost thou not know, that what socuer he bethat should take Alexander from me, he should never line? Privatly also, he sharply rebuked Craterus, & calling them both before him, he made them friends together, swearing by Iupiter Hammon, and by all the other gods, that he loued them two of all men living, neverthelesse if ever he found that they fell out together againe, they should bothdie for it, or he at the least that first began to quarell. So ener after that, they fay, there was neuer foule word nor deed between them, not so much as in sport onely. There was also one Philotas, the sonne of Parmenio, a man of great authority among the Macedonians, who next vnto Alexander was the most valiant man, the patientest to abide paine, the liberallest, and one that loued his men & friendes better then any noble man in the campe what soener. Of him it is reported, that a friend of his came to him on a time to borow money: and he commanded straight one of his me to let him haue it; His purse-bearer answered him, that he had none. Why, faid his master, doest thoutell me so : Hast thou not plate, and apparell to sell or gage to helpe him to some : Howbeit otherwise, he had such pride and glorie to shew his riches, to apparell who Phyhimselfe so sumptuously, and to be more fine and princked then became a private man, that this sufficient made him to be hated because he tooke upon him to be a great man, and to looke bigge on the and emied matter, which became him so ill fauouredly, & therefore every man through his own folly, fell of Alexan-with wine, did valuekily wreake his anger vpon Clitus. The manner of his misfortune was this. There came certaine men of the low countries from the fea fide, that brought apples of andersus GRECE VINO Alexander. Alexander wondering to see them so greene and faire, sent for Clitus to thew him them, and to give him fome of them. Clitus by chance did facrifice at that time vnto the gods, and left his facrifice to go vnto Alexander: howbeit, there were three weathers that followed him, on whom the accustomed sprinklings had bene done alreadic to have facrificed them. Alexander understanding that, told it to his Soothfayers, Aristander, and Cleomantis La-CONTAN; both did answer him, that it was an ill figne. Alexander thereupon gaue order flraight, that they should do facrifice for the health of clittus, and specially for that three dayes before he dreamed one night that he faw Clitus in a mourning gowne, fitting amongst the sonnes of Par- Alexanders menio, the which were all dead before. This notwithstanding, Clutus did not make an end of decement his facrifice, but came straight to support to the king, who had that day facrificed vnto Castor and class. Pollux. At this feaft there was old drinking, and all the supper time there were certaine verses fung and made by a Poet, called Pranichus (or as others fay, of one Picrion) against certaine Captaines of the Macedonians, which had not long before bin ouercome by the barbarous people; and onely to shame them, and to make the company laugh. With these verses, ancient men that were at this feast, became much offended, and grew angry with the Poet that made them, and the minftrell that fung them. Alexander on the other fide, and his familiars, liked them very well, and commanded the minstrell to sing still. Clitus therewithall being one taken with wine. and besides of a churlish nature, proud and arrogant, fell into greater choler, and said: that it was neither well nor honeftly done in that fort to speake ill of those poore MACE DONIAN CADtaines (and specially amongst the barbarous people their enemies) which were farre better men then they that laughed them to fcorne, although their fortune were worse then theirs. Alexander then replied, and faid, that faying fo, he pleaded for himfelfe, calling cowardlineffe, mis fortune. Then Clitus standing vp, said again: But yet this my cowardlinesse saucd thy life, that calleft thy felfe the sonne of the gods, when thou turneds thy backe from Spitbridges sword; and formely if the bloud which these poore Macedonians did shed for thee, and the wounds which they receiued on their bodies fighting for thee, haue made thee fo great, that thou disdainest now to finance. have king Philip for thy father, and wilt needs make thy felfe the fonne of Jupiter Hammer. Alexander being moued with these words, straight replied: O, villen, thinkest thou to scape vnpunished for these proud words of thine, which thou viest continually against me, making the Mia-CEDONIANS torebell against me? Clitus answered againe, Too much are we punished, Alexander, for our paines and feruice to receive fuch reward; may, most happy thinks we them that long fince are dead and gone, not now to fee the Macedonians foourged with rods of the MEDES, & compelled to curry fauour with y Persians, to have accesse vnto their king. Thus Clitus boldly speaking against Alexander, and Alexander agains answering and regiling him, the grauest men fought to pacific this stirre and tumult. Alexander then turning himselfe ynto Xenodochus CARDIN, and Artemius COLOPHONIAN: Doyou notthinke (faidhe) that the GRE-CIANS are amongst the MACEDONIANS, as demy gods that walke among brute beasts? Clitus for all this would not give over his impudency and malapertnesse, but cried out, and bad Alexander speake openly what he had to say, or else not to bid free men to come to sup with him that were wont to speake franckly if not, to keepe with the barbarous flaues that honoured his Per-SIAN girdle, and long white garment. Then could Alexander no longer hold his choler, but tooke an apple that was vpon his table, & threw it at Clitus, and looked for his sword, the which Aristophanes, one of his guard that waited on him, had of purpose taken from him. And when eucry man came straight about him to stay him, and to pray him to be contented; he immediatly role from the boord, and called his guard vnto him in the MACEDONIAN tongue (which was a figne of great trouble to follow after it) and commanded a trampeter to found the allarme. But he drawing backe, would not found: whereupon Alexander strake him with his fist. Notwithstanding, the trumpeter was greatly commended afterwards, for that he onely kept the campe that they rose not. All this could not quiet clims, whereupon his friends with much ado thrust him out of the hall but he came in againe at another doore, and arrogantly and virtue rently rehearsed this verse of the Poet Euripides, out of Andromaches tragedy: Alas for forow entil wayes in misliking with him. Infomuch as his owne father said one day vnto him: Son, I pray thee be more humble and lowly. This Philotas had long before bene complained vpon vnto Alexander because that when the carriage of king Darius army (which was in the city of DAMAS) was taken after the battel of CILICIA, among many prisoners that were taken & brought vnto Alexanders campe, there was one Antigona, a passing faire young curtifan, borne in the city of PIDNA. Philotas found meanes to get her, and like a yong manthat was in loue with her, making merry with her at the table, fondly let fall braue words and boafts of a fouldier, faying, that what notable things were done, they were done by himselfe and his father; and called Alexander at energy word, yong man, and faid, that by their meanes he held his name and kingdome. This curtifan told one of her friends whathe faid, and that friend told another friend, and so went from man to man (as commonly it doth) till at the length it came to Craserus eares. He tooke the curtifan, and brought her vnto Alexander, vnto whom she told as much as she had said before. Alexander bade her still make much of Philotas, and to tell him every word what he said of him. Philotas knowing nothing that he was thus circumuented, did euer frequent her company, and would be bold commonly to fpeake many foolish and undiscreet words against the king, sometime in anger, and fometime againe in a brauery. Alexander this notwithstanding, though he had manifest proofe and cause to accuse Philitas, yethe dissembled it for that time, and would not be knowne of it: either for that he knew Parmenioloued him or elfe for that he was affraid of their great power and authority. About that time there was one Limnus Chalastrian a MACEDONIAN. traiteroully that laid great and fecret wait to kill Alexander: and being in loue with a young man called Nicomachus, inticed him to helpe him to do this deed. The yong man wifely denied it, and told the fame to his brother called Balinus. He went vnto Philotas, & prayed him to bring them both before Alexander, for they had a matter of great importance to import vnto him. Philotas would not let him speake with the king (but why no man could tell) telling them, that the king had greater matters in hand, and was not at leifure. Then they went vnto another, and he brought them vnto Alexander, vnto whom they first opened the treason of Limnus conspired against him: & by the way they told also, how they had bin twise before with Philotas, who would not let them come in, nor speake with him. That angred Alexander greatly, and he was the more offended also when Limnus was flaine by him, whom he fent to apprehed him, refifting him for that he would not be taken: & thought that by his death, he had lost a great meanes to come to the light of this treason and conspiracy. Then Alexander frowning vpon Philotas, brought all his enemies vpon his backe, that of long time had hated him. For they began to speake boldly, that it was time for the king to looke about him, for it was not to be supposed that this Limnus Chalestrian of himfelfe durst have entred into that treason, but rather that he was a minister, and a chiefe instrument, fet on by a greater personage then he; and therefore that it stood Alexander vpon to examine them straightly which had cause to keepe this treason secret. After Alexander once gaue eare vnto such words and vehement presumptions, there was straight brought a thousand accufations against Philotas. Thereupon he was apprehended, and in the presence of diuerse Lords and familiars of the King put to the torture, Alexander felfe hanging behind, to heare what he would fay. It is reported, that when he heard how faintly and pitifully he befought Hepheflion to take pity vpon him, he faid vnto himselfe: Alas, poore Philotas, thou that hast so faint a heart, how durft thourake upon thee fo great matters? In fine Philoras was put to death, and immediatly after he was executed. Alexander fent also with speed vnto the Realme of Media to kill Parmento, who was his Lieutenant there, and one that had ferued king Philip his father, in his greatest affaires; and he onely of all other the old servants of his father had procured Alexander to take in hand the conquest of Asia: and who also of three sons which he brought out with him, had seene two of them dye before him, and afterwards was slaine himselfe with the third. This crueltie of Alexander made his friends affraid of him, and specially Antipater: who secretly sent Ambassadours vnto the ÆTOLIANS to make league with them, bewas affinid cause they themselves also were affraid of Alexander, for that they had put the Oeniades to death. Alexander hearing that faid, that he himselfe, and not the sonnes of the oemades, would be reuenged on the Atolians. Not long after that, followed the murther of Cline, the which to heare it fimply told, would feeme much more cruell then the death of Philotas. But reporting the cause and the time together in which it chanced, it will be found that it was not of set purpose, but by chance and vnfortunally, that Alexander being our come with

Then Alexander taking a partifan from one of his guard, as Clitus was coming towards him, and had lift up the hanging before the doore, he ranne him through the body, to that clitus fell to the ground, and fetching one grone, died presently. Alexanders choler had left him straight, and he became maruellous forowfull: and when he faw his friends round about him fay neuer a word, he pluckt the partifan out of his body, and would have thrust it into his owne throte. Howbeit his guard about him caught him by the hands, and caried him perforce into his chamber; and there he did nothing all that night but weepe bitterly, and the next day following, vntil fuch time as he was able to cry no more, but lying on the ground, only lay fighing His friends hearing his voice no more, were afraid, and came into his chamber by force to comfort him. But Alexander would heare none of them, fauing Aristander the Soothsayer, who remembred him of his dreame he had of clisus before, which was a prognoftication of that which had happened:whereby it appeared that it was his destiny, before he was borne. This seemed to comfort Alexander: Afterwards they brought in Callifthenes the Philosopher, a kinfman of Ariffotles. and Anaxarchus borne in ABDERA. Of thefetwo Callifthenes fought by gentle talke, not mouing any matter offensiue, to comfort Alexanders forow. But Anaxarchus that from the beginning had taken away by himselfe in the study of Phylosophy, being accounted a braine-sicke man, and one that dispised his companions, he coming into Alexanders chainber also with him, cried out at the dore as he came in: See, yonder is Alexander the Great whom all the world lookes vpon, and is afraid of fee where he lies, weeping like a flaue on the ground, that is afraid of the law, and of the reproch of men: as if he himfelfe should not give them law, and stablish the bounds of iustice or iniustice, sithence he hath ouercome to be Lord and master, and not to be subject and slaue to a vaine opinion. Knowest thou not that the Poets say, that Inpiter hath Themis, to wit, right and inflice placed on either hand of him? what fignifieth that, but all that the prince doth, is holy, right and iust: These words of Anaxarchus did comfort the sorowfull heart of king Alexander at that time, but therewithall, they made Alexanders manners afterwards more fierce and dissolute. For, as he thereby did maruellously grow in fauour with the king, euen so did he make the company of callisthenes (who of himselfe was not very pleasant, because of his grauity and sowernesse) much more hatefull and misliked then before. It is written also that there was certaine talke one night at king Alexanders boord touching the seasons of the yeare, and temperatnesse of the aire, and that Callistbenes was of their opinion which maintained, that the country they were in at that time was much colder, and the winter also sharper then in GRECE. Anaxarchus held the contrary opinion, and stifly maintained it, in somuch as Callisthenes said vnto him: And yet must thou grant, that it is colder here then there. For there all the winter time thou couldest go with a single cloake on thy backe onely, and here thou must haue three or foure garments vpon thee when thou art at thy boord. This galled Anaxarchus to the quicke, & made him more angry then before: and for the other Rhetoritians and flatterers, they did also hate him, because they saw him followed of yong men for his eloquence, and beloued also of old men for his honest life, the which was very graue, modest, & contented with his owne, desiring no mans else. Wherby men found, that the reason he alledged for following of Alexander in his woyage, was true: for he faid, that he came to bean humble futer to the king to restore his banished citizens into their countrey againe, and to replenish their city with inhabitants. Now, though his estimation made him chiesly to be enuied, yet did he himselse giue his enemies occasion to accuse him. For oftentimes being inuited by the king to supper, either he would not come, or if he came, he would be mute, and fay nothing, shewing by his granity and filence, that nothing pleased him that was either said or done. Whereupon Alexander selfe said on a time vnto him:

I cannot thinke that person wise. That in his owne cause hat h no eyes.

It is reported of him also, that being at supper on a time with the king, diverse requesting him to make an Oration on the sudden in commendation of the Macedonians, he made such an cloquent Oration vpon that matter, that all they that heard him, rose from the boord, and clapping their hands for ioy, cast no segayes and flowers vpon him. But yet Alexander at that time faid vnto him that which the Poet Euripides faid:

It is no maisterie to be eloquent, Inhandling of a plenteous argument.

Nay, but vtter then thy eloquence in reprouing of the MACEDONIANS, that hearing their faults, they may learne to amend. Then Callifthenes changing copy, spake boldly many things against the MACEDONIANS, declaring, that the diffention among st the GRECIANS did increase king Philips power, alledging these verses:

Where discord reignes in realme or towne -Euen wicked folke do winne renowne.

But by this occasion, he purchased himselfegreatill will of the Macedonians; infomuch, as Alexander solfe said at that time, that he had not so much shewed his eloquence, as the malice he bare vnto the Mac & Donians. Hermippus the historiographer writeth, that one Strabus a cleark of Callisthenes, did afterwards tell it vnto Aristotle in this fort; and that Callisthenes seeing king Alexander offended with him, did recite these verses of Homer three or foure times as he went:

> Patroclus who farre passed thee, Was flaine, as thou art like to be.

And therefore very wifely faid Aristotle, that Callistenes was eloquent, but not wife. For like a Philosopher, he stoutly stood against kneeling to the king, and faid that openly, which the no- Aristotle bleft and the ancientest men among the Macedonians durft but whisper one in anothers eare, though they did all vtterly mislike it : wherby he did yet deliuer Greeffo a great shame, and hopen, Alexander from a greater, bringing him from that maner of adoration of his person. This not-withstanding, he vndid himselfe, because he would seeme rather by presumption to bring him to it, then by reason to perswade him. Chares MITYLENIAN hath written, that Alexander hauing drunke at a certaine feast where he happed to be, reached his cup vnto one of his friends, who after he had taken it of him, rose vp first on his feete, and dranke also, turning him towards the gods; and first making folemne reuerence, he went and kissed Alexander, and then sate him downe againe. All the rest that were at the feast, did the like one after another, and Callisthenes also who tooke the cup when it came to his turne (the king not looking on him, but talking with Hephestion) after he had drunke, came vnto the king to kisse him, as others had done. Howbeit, one Demetrius called Phidon, faid vnto the king: kiffe him not, I pray your Grace, for he of all men hath done you no reverence. Alexander turned his head afide, and would not kiffe him. Then cried Callifthenes out aloud: Well, quoth he, then I will go my way, with leffe then others, by a kiffe. And thus began Alexanders grudge first against Callisthenes, by meanes whereof Hephastion was credited the better, when he said that Callesthenes had promised him to reverence Alexander, although that he had broken promise. After him also Lysimachus, Agnon, and diuerse others began to play their parts against him, saying, that this Sophister went bragging vp and downe, as if he had destroyed a whole tyranny; and that all the yong men followed him to honour him, as if among fo many thousand souldiers, neuer a man of them had so noble an heart as he. And therefore, when the treason of Hermolaus against Alexanders person was discoursed, they found the accusation probable, the which some false detractors had informed against Callisthenes: who had answered Hermolaus that asked him, how he could come to be so famous a. suspected of boue all men, thus: In killing the famousest person. And to animate him to go forward with treason a this treason, he had told him further, that he should not be afraid of a golden bed, but remember he had to do with a man, which was fometimes ficke and hurtas other men were. This notwithstanding, there was neuer a one of Hermolaus confederates, that would once name Callifibenes, what torments so ever they abid, to bewray who were their companions. And Alexanderselse also writing of this treason immediatly after, vnto Craterus, Attalus, and Alcetas, said, that their feruants which had bene racked & put to the torture, did constantly affirme, that they onely had conspired his death, and no man else was prime vnto it. But afterwards, he sent another letter vnto Antipater, wherein he directly accused Callisthenes, and said, that his seruants had alreadic bene stoned to death by the MACEDONIANS: howbeit that he himselfe would afterwards also punish the master, and those that had sent vnto him; and that had received the muriherers into their cities, who came of purpose to kill him. And therein he plainely shewed offended the ill will he bare vnto Aristotle, for that Callistenes had bene brought vp with him, being his kinsman, and the sonne of Hero, Aristotles neece. Some say that Alexander trussed Callisteness The death of the dea vp. Others againe report, that he died of ficknesse in prison. Neuerthelesse Chares writeth, that callishenes Callist benes was kept prisoner seuen moneths together, because he should have had his judgemet the rhenori-in open councell even in the prefence of Ariffotle himselfe: howbeit, being very fat, he was eaten in the end by lice, and so died, about the time that Alexander was hurt, fighting against the MALLIANS OXYDRACIANS, in the conquest of INDIA, but these things chanced a good while after. Demaratus Corinthian being very old, had a great defire to go fee Alexander: and when he had feene him, he faid that the GRECIANS which were dead long before, were deprined of that bliffe and happinesse, that they could not see Alexander sit in the royall seate of king Darim. Howbeit, he did not long enjoy the kings good will vnto him, for he died of a ficknesse soone after he came vnto his campe, and Alexander did honour his funerals; for all the army in their armour did cast vp a mount of earth sashioned like a tombe, which was a great compasse as bout, and foure fcore cubits high. His after safterwards were brought with honourable connoy, vnto the sea side, in a charet with foure horses richly set out. Alexander being ready to take his iourney to go conquer In DIA, perceiuing that his army was very heavy and vinweildfometore. moue, for the wonderfull carriage and spoiles they had with them; the carts one morning being loden, he first burnt his owne cariage & next his friends, and then commanded that they should also set the carriage of the Mace don i and on sire, which counsel seemed more dangerous to be resoluted of, then the proofe of the execution fell out difficult. For there were very few of them that were angry therewith, & the most part of them (as if they had bin secretly moued by some god) with loud cries of ioy, one of them gaue vnto another fuch necessary things as they had need of & afterwards of themselves did burneand spoile all the rest. This made Alexander much more rigorus the he was before, who befides that he was already become cruel enough, & with. The cruelly out mercy or pardon, did fharply punish enery man that offended. For having commanded Memander one of his friends, to keepe him a firing hold, he put him to death because he would not remaine there. Furthermore, he himself flue Or foldates (a Captaine of the barbarous people) with Amonstrom a dart, for that herebelled against him About that time, there was an eaw that had eaned a lambe which had vpon her head, the forme & purple colour of the kings hat, after the Persian maner called Tiara, having two from hanging on each fide of it. Alexander abhorred this monstrous figne, infomuch as he purged himfelf by certain Babylonian priefts, which he alwayes caried about with him for that purpose, and said vnto his friends: that this monster did not so much moue him for respect of himself, as he did for the, fearing that the gods after his death had perdestined the force and power of his kingdome to fall into the hands of some base cowardly perion. This not with standing, another figure and token which chanced in the neck of that, did take Asserting of away his feare and discouragement he had. For a MACEDONIAN called Proxenus, that had charge of the kings cariage, as he digged in a certaine place by the riner of Oxus, to fet vp the kings tent and his lodging, he found a certaine fat and oily veine, which after they had drawne out the first, there came out also another clearer, which differed nothing, neither, in smell, tast, nor fauour from natural oile, having the glosse & fatnesse so like, as there could be discerned no difference betweene them: the which was fo much more to be wondred at , because that in all that country there were no oliues. They fay also, That the water of the riner self of Oxus is very fort, and maketh their skins fat, which wash or bathe themselues therin. And yet it appeareth by that which Alexander felf wrote vnto Antipater, that he was very glad of it, putting that among it the greatest fignes which the gods had fent vnto him. The soothsayers did interpret this wonder, that it was a figne, that he should have a noble, but yet a painfull voyage: for the gods, faid they, have given oyle vnto men to refresh their wearinesse. And truely so did he sustaine many dangers in those warres, and was oftentimes hurt in fight. But the greatest losse he hadof his men, was for lacke of victuals, & by the infection of the aire. For he strining to ouercome fortune by valiantneffe, and her force by vertue, thought nothing impossible for a valiant man, neither any thing able to withfland a noble heart. It is reported, that when he went to befrege a ftrong hold which Sifimethres kept, being thought vnfaltable, and that his fouldiers were in despaire of it, he asked one Oxyathres, what heart Sissenthres had. Oxyathres answered him, that he was the verift coward in the world. O, that is well quoth Alexander: then it is to be wonne, if that be true thou faieft, fithence the Captaine of the peece is but a coward. So he tooke it on a fudden by putting Sistimushres in a great searc. After that also he did befrege another peece of as great strength and difficultie to affault as the other, and making the young fouldiers of the MACEDONIANS to go to the affault, he called one of them vnto him, whose name also was Alexander, vnto whom he takit thus: Alexander, this day thou must fight like a man rand it be but for thy names sake. The vong man did not forget his words, for he fought fo valiantly, that he was flaine, for whom Alexander was very fory. Another time when his men were afraid, and durst not come neare vnto the city of Nisa to affault it, because there ran a very deeperiuer hard by the walles, he came to Their of the rivers side, & said: O what a coward am I, that never learned to swim: and so prepared himfelf to swim ouer vpon his shield. After he had caused them to retire from the assault, there came ambaffadours vnto him, from the cities befieged, to craue pardon of him. They wondred at him at the first, when they saw him armed, without any pompe or other ceremonic about him: but much more, when a chaire was brought him to fit downe on, that he commanded the oldest man amongst them called Acuphis, to take it to him, and fit him downe. Acuphis maruelling at Alexanders great courtefie, asked him what they should do for him, thenceforth to be his good friends. I will, faid Alexander, that they from whom thou comest as Ambassadour vnto vs, do make thee their king; and withall, that they do fend mea hundred of their best men for hostages. Acuphis smiling answered him againe: but I shall rule them better, ôking, if I send you the worst and not the best. There was a king called Taxiles a very wise man, who had a great countrey in wie an-IN DIA, no lesse in bignesse and circuit then all AGYPT, and as full of good pasture and fruits as surround any country in the world could be: who came on a time to fainte Alexander, and faid vnto him: What should we need, Alexander, to fight, and make warres one with another, if thou comest not King Taxito take away our water, & our necessary comodities to line by: for which things, men of judge- levalke ment must needs fight. As for our goods, if I be richer then thou, I am readie to give thee of with Alexmine: & if I haue leffe, I will not thinke fcorne to thanke thee, if thou wilt giue me some of thine. Alexander being pleafed to heare him speake thus wisely, imbraced him, & said vnto him: Thin- Alexanders kest thou this meeting of ours can be without fight, for althese goodly faire words?no, no, thou answer to hast won nothing by that for I will fight & contend with thee in honestic and courtesie, because thou shalt not exceed me in bounty and liberality. So Alexander taking divers gifts of him, but giuing more vnto Taxiles, he dranke to him one night at supper, and said: I drinke to thee a thousand talents in gold. This gift misliked Alexanders friends: but in recompence thereof, he wanne the hearts of many of these barbarous Lords and Princes of that countrey. There was a certaine number of fouldiers of the Indians, the warlikest men of all that country, who being mercenarie foldiers, were ener entertained in feruice of the great free cities, which they valiantly defended, and did great hurt vnto Alexander in divers places. Alexander having made peace with them in a city where they were kept in, when they came abroad vpon furetic of this peace which they had made he met with them as they want had made he met with them as they want had made he met with them as they want had been as the want which they had made, he met with them as they went their way, and put them all to the fword. the peace ha There was but this onely fault, to blemish the honour of his noble deeds in all his warres: for in bad made. all things else he shewed mercy and equity. Furthermore the grave Philosophers and wise men of India did greatly trouble him also. For they reproued the kings & Princes of the Indians, for that they yeelded vnto Alexander, & procured the free cities to take armes against him. But by their occasion, he tooke divers of their cities. For king Porus, Alexander selfe writeth in his Epistles, all his acts at large which he did against him. For he saith, that both their campes lying on either side of the river of Hydaspes, king Porus set his Elephants vponthe banke of the river with their heads towards their enemies, to keepe him from passing ouer: and that he him. assazing felfe did continually make a noise and tumult in his campe to acquaint his men not to be afraid ding pount of the barbarous people. Furthermore, that in a darke night rulen, there was no Moone lists. of the barbarous people. Furthermore, that in a darke night when there was no Moone light, he tooke part of his footemen, and the choise of his horsemen, and went farre from his enemies to get ouer into a litle Hand. When he was come into the Hand, there fell a wonderful shower of raine, great winds, lightnings and thunders upon his campe, infomuch as he faw many of his men burnt by lightning in this litle Iland. This notwithstanding, he did not leaue to getouer to the other fide of the river. The river being fwollen with the great floud of raine that fell the night before, ouerflowing the bankes, it did eate into the ground where the water ranne; fo that Alexander when he had passed ouer the river, and was come to the other side, found himselse in very ill case, for that he could hardly keep his feete, because the earth was very slippery vnder him, and the rage of the water had caten into it, and broke it downe on enery fide. It is written of him, that then he faid vnto the Athenians: O Athenians, could ye thinke that I could take fuch paines, and put my felfe into fo many dangers, onely to be praifed of you. Thus onesscritus reporteth it. But Alexander selfe writeth, that they left their rafters or great peeces of timber pinned together, whereupon they had patted ouer the streame of the maine river; and that they waded through the other arme or gut of the water which had broken the earth, vp to their breasts, with their harnesse on their backes. Furthermore, when he had passed ouer both waters. he rode with his horfemen twenty furlongs before the battell of his footemen, thinking that if his enemies came to give him charge with their men of armes, that he was the stronger: and if they would also advance their footenen forward, that his footenen also should come time cnough. One of the twaine fell out as he had gueffed: for a thousand horsemen and threescore charrets armed with his enemies, gaue him charge before their great company; whom he ouer. threw, and tooke all their charrets, and flue foure hundred of the men at armes in the field. King Porus then knowing by those fignes that Alexander was there in person, and had passed ouer the riuer, he marched towards him with all his army in battel ray, fauing a few which he left behind to refift the Macedonians, if they should force to passe over the river. Alexander being afraid of the great multisude of his enemies, and of the terrour of the Elephants, did not give charge ypearlie middeft of the battell, but being himfelfe in the left wing, gaue charge vpon the corner of the enemies left wing, and also commanded them that were in the right wing to do the like. So both the ends of the enemies armie were broken and put to flight; and they that fled, ran vnto the Elephants, and gathered themselves together about them. Thus the battell being begun, the conflict continued long, infomuch as the enemies were feantly all ouerthrowne by three of the clocke in the afternoone. Most writers agree, that Porus was foure cubits and a shaft-length high, and that being upon an Elephants backe, he wanted nothing in height and bigneffe to be proportionable for his mounture, albeit it were a very great Elephant, and befides, that the Elephant did shew great wit and care to sauc the King his master. For whilest he perceived his mafter was ftrong enough, he luftily repulled those which came to affaile him: but when he found that he began to faint, having many wounds vpon his body, and arrowes sticking in it, then being afraid left his mafter should fall downe from his backe, he foftly fell on his knees, and gently taking his darts and arrowes with his trunke, which he had in his body, he pluckt them all from him one after another. Porus being taken, Alexander asked him, how he should handle him. Princely, answered Porus. Alexander asked him againe, if he would fay any thing elfe. I comprehend all, faid he, in this word Princely. Thereupon Alexander did not onely leaue him his prouinces and realmes, whereof before he was king, by the name of his Lieutenant, but gaue him many other countries also. When he had subdued all the free people, of the which there were fifteene feuerall nations, five thousand of no smalcities, besides an infinit number of villages and thrice as many other countries, he made Philip one of his friends, his Lieutenant of all those countries. His horse Bucephal died at this battell, not in the field but afterwards whilest he was in cure for the wounds he had on his body : but as Onesicritus saith he died euen worne for very age. Atexander was as forie for his death, as if he had loft any of his familiar friends: and for proofe thereof, he built a great citie in the place where his horse was buried, vpon the riuer of Hydaspes, the which he called after his name, Bv c EPHALIA. It is reported also, that having lost a dogge of his called Peritas, which he had brought vp of a whelpe, and loued very dearely, he built also a city, and called it after his name. Sotion writeth, that he heard it reported thus of Potamon LESBIAN. This last battell against king Porus killed the MACEDONIANS hearts, and made them that they had no defire to go any further to conquer INDIA. For finding that they had such ado to ouercome them, though they were but twenty thousand footemen, and two thousand horse, they spake ill of Alexander when he went about to compell them to passe ouer the river of Ganges, vnderstanding by the countriment hat it was two and thirtie furlongs over, and a hundred fadome deepe; and how that the banke of the river was full of fouldiers, horfemen and Elephants. For it was reported that y kings of the GANGARIDES, and the PRÆSIANS were on the other fide with four fcore thousand horsemen, two hundred thousand footenen, eight thouand Profits fand charrets or carts of warre well armed, and fix thousand Elephants of warre. This was no fable, nor friuolous tale: for a king called Androcottus (who raigned not long after) gaue vnto Scleuces, five hundred Elephants at one time, and conquered all In DIA with fixe hundred thoufand fighting men. Alexander then offended with his mens refusal, kept close in his tent for cerraine dayes, and lay vpon the ground, faying, that he did not thanke them for all that they had done thitherunto, vuleffe they passed ouer the river of Ganges also, and that to return backe againe, it was as much as to confesse, that he had bin ouercome. At the length, when he saw and considered that there was great reason in his friends perswasions which laboured to comfort him, and that his fouldiers came to the dore of his tent, crying and lamenting, humbly befeeching him to leade them backe againe; in the end he tooke pitie of them, and was contented to returne. This notwithstanding, before he departed from those parts, he put foorth many vaine returne out and false devices to make his name immortall among that people. He made armours of greater of India. proportion then his owne, and mangers for horses, higher then the common fort: moreouer, he made bits also farre heavier then the common fort, and made them to be throwne and scattered abroad in enery place. He built great alters also in honour of the gods, the which the kings bimfelse immortally of the PR #STANS haucin great veneration at this day, and passing ouer the river, do make facilfices there, after the manner of the GRECIANS. Androcottus at that time was a very yong man, King Anand faw Alexander himselfe, and faid afterwards, that Alexander had well-nearetaken and won drounter. all the countrey, the king which then reigned, was so hated of all his subjects for his wicked life, and base parentage he came of. Departing thence, he went to see the great sea Oceanum, and made diverse boats with oares, in the which he casily went downe the rivers at his pleasure. Howbeit, this his pleasant going by water, was not without warre: for he would land oftentimes, and didaffaile cities, and conquered all as he went. Yet in affailing the city of the Mal-LIANS, (which they fay are the warlikest men of all the Indians) he was almost slaine there. Alexander For having with darts repulfed the enemies from the wall, he himselfe was the first manthat set in danger foote on a ladder to get vp, the which brake affoone as euer he was gotten vpon the ramper. at the title Then the barbarous people coming together against the wall, did throw at him from beneath, and many times lighted vpon him. Alexander having few of his men about him, made no more ado, but leaped downe from the wall in the middest of his enemies, and by good happe lighted on his feete. His harnesse making a great noise with the fall, the barbarous people were afraid, thinking they had scene some light or spirit go before them: so that at the first they all betooke them to their legges, and ranne feattering here and there. But after that, when they came agains to themselues, and faw that he had but two Gentlemen onely about him, they came and set vpon him of all hands, and fought with him at the sword or push of the pike, and so hurt him very fore through his armour: but one amongst the rest, being somewhat farther off, gaue him such a terrible blow with an arrrow, that he strake him through his curaces. and shot him in at the side vnder his breast. The blow entred so into his body, that he fell downe on one of his knees. Whereupon, he that had stricken him with his arrow, ranne fodainly to him with a cimiter drawnein his hand; howbeit as Peucestas and Limneus stepped before him, and were both hurt, Limneus was flaine prefently, and Peucestas fought it out, till at the length Alexander selfe slue the barbarous man with his owne hand, after he had many grietious wounds vpon his bodie. At the length he had a blow with a dart on his necke, that so aftonied him, that he leaned against the wall looking vpon his enemies. In the meane time the Ma-CEDONIANS compassing him round about, tooke him, and caried him into his tent halfe in a fwound, and was past knowledge: whereupon there ranne a rumour straight in the campe, that Alexander was dead. They had much ado to cut the arrow afunder that was of wood: fo his curaces being plucked off with great paine, yet were they to plucke the arrow head out of his bodie, which stucke in one of his bones: the which (as it is reported) was foure fingers long, and three fingers broad. So that when they plucked it out, he fwounded fo oft, that he was almost dead. This notwithstanding, he ouercame the danger, and escaped. Being very weake, he kept diet a long time to recouer himselfe, and neuer came out of his tent vntill he heard the Ma-CEDONIANS Cry, and make great noise about his tent, desirous to see him. Then he put on a night-gowne, and came out amongst them all: and after he had done sacrifice vnto the gods for recourry of his health, he went on his journey againe, and in the fame did conquer many great countries, and tooke divers goodly cities. He did also taketen of the wise men of the country, which men do all go naked, & therfore are called GYMNOSOPHIST E, (to wit, Philosophers of The wife INDIA) who had procured Sabbas to rebell against him, and had done great hurt vnto the Ms-CEDONIANS. And because they were taken to be the sharpest and readiest of answer, he did put them (as hethought) many hard questions, and told them he would put the first man to death, Alexanders that answered him worst, and so the rest in order; and made the eldest among them Judge of questions their answers. The question he asked the first man, was this:

I Whether the dead or the living were the greater number? He answered, The living; for the dead faid he are no more men-

2 The fecond man he asked: Whether the earth or the fea brought forth most creatures : He answered. The earth. For the sea, said he, is but a part of the earth.

To the third man: Which of all beafts was the subtilest? That (said he) which man hitherto

To the fourth: Why he did make Sabbas rebell? Because, said he, he should like honourably,

To the fift, Which he thought was first, the day or the night He answered, the day, by a day. The king finding his answer strange, added too this speech: Strange questions must needs haue strange answers.

Coming to the fixth man, he asked him: How a man should come to be belouted? If he be a good man, faid he, not terrible.

To the feuenth, How a man should be a god? In doing a thing, said he, impossible for a man. To the eight: Which was the stronger, life, or death. Life, said he, that suffereth to many

And vnto the ninth and last man: how long a man should live? Vntill, said he, he thinke if better to die then to liue.

When Alexander had heard these answers, he turned vnto the Judge, and bade him give his iudgement vpon them. The Iudge faid, they had all answered one worse then another. Then shalt thou die first, said Alexander, because thou hast given such sentence: Not so ô king, quoth he, if thou wilt not be a lyer-because thou saidest, that thou wouldest kill him first, that had anfwered worlt. In fine, Alexander did let them go with rewards. He fent Onesferitus also vnto the other wife men of the Indians, which were of greatest fame among them, and that led a solitarie and quiet life, to pray them to come vnto him. This Onesicritus the Philosopher, was Diogenes the Cyniks scholer. It is reported, that Calanus one of these wise men, very sharply & proudly bade him put off his clothes to heare his words naked or otherwise that he would not speake to him, though he came from Inpiter himselfe. Yet Dandamis answered him more gently. For he having learned what manner of men Socrates, Pythagoras, and Diogenes were, faid: that they feemed to have bene wife men, and well borne, notwithstanding that they had reverenced the law too much in their life time. Others write not with standing, that Dandamis said nothing else, but asked why Alexander had taken fo painfull a journey in hand, as to come into India, For Calarus, (whose right name otherwise was Sphines) king Taxiles perswaded him to go vnto Alexander:who because he faluted those he met in the INDIAN tongue, saying, Cale, as much to say, as God fauc ye, the GRECIANS named him Calanus. It is reported, that this Calanus did flow Alexander a figure and fimilitude of his kingdome, which was this. He threw downe before him a dry searc peece of leather, & then put his foot vpon one of the ends of it. The leather being troden downe on that fide, rose vp in all parts else, and going vp and downe withall, still treading vpon the fides of the leather, he made Alexander fee, that the leather being troden downe, on the one fide did rife up of all fides else, untill fuch time as he put his foot in the midst of the leather, and then all the whole leather was plainealike, his meaning thereby, was to let Alexander understand, that the most part of his time he should keepe in the middest of his country, and not to go farre from it. Alexander continued seven moneths travelling vpon the rivers, to go see the great fea Oceanum. Then he tooke ship and failed into a litle Hand called Seyllvstis, howbeitothers call in Psirvicis. There he landed, made facrifices vnto the gods, & viewed the greatnes and nature of the fea Oceanum, and all the fituation of the coasts upon that fea, as far as he could go. Then he made his prayers vnto the gods, that no conquerour lining after him should go beyond the bounds of his journey and conqueft, and so returned homeward. He commanded his ships should fetch a compasse about, and leave India on the right hand: and made Nearchus Admirall of all his fleet, and Onesieritus chiefe Pilote. He himselfe in the meane time went for Desarit, by land through the country of the ORITES, and there he found great scarcitie of victuals, and lost many of his men so that he caried not out of In bia the fourth part of his men of war which he brought thither, which were in all fixe fcore thousand footmen, and fifteene thousand horsemen. Some of them died of grienous diseases: others by ill diet: others by extreme heate and drought, & the most part of them by hunger, trauelling through this barren country, where the pooremen lined hardly, and had only a few sheepe which they fed with sea fish, that made their fleth fauour very ill fauouredly. At the length, when in three fore dayes journey he had paine-followed diuers other charrets concred over fome with goodly rich arras & purple filke others with trim fresh boughs, which they renued at every fields end; and in those were Alexanders other friends and Captaines with garlands of flowers upon their heads, which dranke and made merry together. In al this army, there was neither helmet, pike, dart, nor target seene: but gold & piping on their flutes and shalmes, and women singing and dancing, and fooling by the way as they went. In all this diffolute marching through the country, and in the midst of their drunkennesse, they mingled with it sport, that every man did strive to counterfert all the insolencies of Bacebus, as if god Bacebus himfelfe had bene there in perfon, & had led the mummery. When he came vnto y kings castle of GEDROSTA, he staid there also certain daies to refresh his army with feafting & banqueting. It is faid, that one day when he had drunk hard, he went to fee the games for duncing, and among ft them, the games which a yong man called Bagoas had fet forth, (with whom Alexander fell in liking) and bare the bell. This Bago is being in his dancing garments, came through the Theater, & fate him downe by Alexander. The MACEDONIANS were foglad of it, that they shouted & clapped their hands for ioy, crying out aloud to kisse him: so that in fine he tookehim in his armes and kiffed him before them all. Thither came Nearchus his Admirall vnto him, who made report what he had feene and done in his nauigation. Alexader was fo glad of that, as he was defirous to faile by sea himselfe; and so entring into the sea Oceanum by the mouth of Euphrates, with a great fleete of ships, to compasse in all the coasts of Arabia and A. tent he built a great number of ships in y city of Thapsacvs, & fent for mariners, shipmasters what so thou art, and whence seeuer thou commest, for I know thou shalt come: I am Cyrus that conquered the Empire of Persia: I pray thee ennie me not for this little earth that concreth my body. These words pierced Alexanders heart, when he confidered the vncertaintie of worldly things. There also Calanus the Indian Philosopher, having had a flux a little while, prayed that they would make him a stacke of wood, such as they vie to burne dead bodies on, and then rode thither on horsebacke; and after he had made his prayer vnto the gods, he cast those sprinklings upon him which were vsed to be sprinkled at the funerals of the dead: then cutting off a locke of his haire before he went vpon the woodstacke, he bad all the Macedonians that were there farewell. and shoke them by the hands, praying them that day to be merrie, and drinke freely with the king, whom he would fee shortly after in the city of BABYLON. When he had faid these words. he laid him downe voon the woodstacke, couered his face, nor neuer stirred hand nor foot, nor quitched when the fire tooke him, but did facrifice himself in this forr, as the maner of his countrey was, that the wife men should so facrifice themselves. Another Indian also, who followed Inlins Cafar, did the like many yeares after in the city of ATHENS: and there is his tombe yetto be seene, commonly called the INDIANS tombe. When Alexander came from seeing this facrifice of Calanus, he did bid diverse of his friends and Captaines to support to him, and there did bring forth a crowne for a reward vnto him that dranke best. He that dranke most of all other, was one Promachus, that dranke foure gallons of wine, and won the crowne worth a talent: but he lived not aboue three daies after. And of other alfo that fell in sport to quaffing, who should drinke most, there died of them (as Chares writeth) one and fortie persons, of an extreme cold that tooke them in their drunkennesse and wine. When they were in the city of Sysa, he maried cert line of his friends, and himselfe also maried Statiza, one of king Darius daughters dispofing also of the other Persian Ladies (according to their estate and birth) vnto his best friends. He made also a folemne feast of common mariages amongst the MACEDONIANS, of them that had benemaried before. At which feast it is written, that nine thousand persons sitting at the boords, he gaue vnto euery one of them a cup of gold to offer wine in honour of the gods. And there also amongst other wonderfull gifts, he did pay all the debts y MACEDONIANS ought vnto their creditours, the which amounted vnto the fumme of ten thousand talents, sauing a hundred and thirtielesse. Whereupon Antigenes with one eye, falfly putting in his name amongst the number of the debters, and bringing in one that faid he had lent him money, Alexander caufed him to be payed:but afterwards when it was proued to his face, that there was no fuch matter, Alexander then was so offended with him, that he banished him his court, and deprived him of his Captaineship, notwithstanding that he had before shewed himselfe a valiant man in the warres. For when he was but a young man he was shot into the eye, before the city of PERIN-TE, which king Philip did befiege; and at that prefent time they would have pluckt the arrow out of his eye, but he neuer fainted for it, neither would suffer them to pull it out, before he had first drinen his enemies within the walles of their citie. He took this infamie very inwardly, and he was so sorie for it, that every man might see he was like to die for sorrow. Then Alexander fearing he should die, did pardon him, and bade him besides keepe the money which was given him. Now the 30000, young boyes which Alexander had left to the government of Captaines, to traine and exercise them in the discipline of warre, they being growne strong men, and lusty youths, excellently well trained and readie in armes, Alexander rejoyced when he saw them. This notwithstanding did much discourage the MACEDONIANS & made them greatly afraid, warsby .d. because they thought that from thenceforth the king would make lesse account of them. For when Alexander would have fent the ficke and impotent persons, which had bene maimed in the warres, into the low country to the sea side, they answered him, that so doing he should do them great wrong, to fend these poore men from him in that fort (after they had done him al the seruicethey could)hometo their country & friends, in worse case the he took the from thence. And therefore they faid, if he would fend away some, let him send them all away as men vnserniceable, specially sithence he had now such goodly yong dancers about him, with whom he might go conquer the world. Alexander was maruellously offended with their proud words, infomuch that in his anger he reuiled them all, pur away his ordinary guard, and took other PERsians in their place, making some the guard about his own person; others, his vshers, heraulds, and ministers to execute his will and commandement. The poore Machonians seeing Alexander thus waited on, and themselves so shamefully rejected, they let fall their stoutnesse, and after they had commoned of the matter together, they were ready to teare themselues for spite and malice. In fine, when they had laid their heads together, they confented to go vnto his tent, and without weapons, naked in their shirts, to yeeld themselves vnto him weeping and howling, befeeching him to do with them what pleased him, and to vsethem like wretched vnthankefull creatures. But Alexander, though his anger was now fomewhat pacified, did not receive them the first time, neither did they also go their waies, but remained there two daies & nights together in this pitifull state, before the dore of his tent, lamenting vnto him, & calling him their soueraigne, and king; vntill that he came himfelfe out of his tent the third day, & feeing the poore The clemenwretches in this grieuous and pitifull state, he himselffel a weeping a long time. So, after he had wand lia little rebuked them, he called them courteoufly, and gaue y impotent & ficke persons leaue to depart home, rewarding them very honorably. Furthermore he wrote vnto Antipater his lieutenant, that he should give them alwaies the highest place in all common sports & assemblies, and that they should be crowned with garlands of flowers. Moreouer, he commanded that the orphants whose parents were flaine in the wars, should receive the pay of their fathers. After Alexander was come vnto the city of ECBATANA, in the kingdome of MEDIA, and that he had difpatched his weightiest causes, he gaue himself again vnto publike sports, seasts and pastimes; for that there were newly come vinto him out of GRECE, 3000. excellent inafters and deutlers of such sports. About that time it chanced, that Hephastion fell sicke of an ague. But he being a young man of warre, did not regard his mouth as he should have done, but having spied oportunitie that his Phisitian Glaucus was gone vnto the Theater, to see the sports & pastimes, he went to dinner, and cate a rosted Capon whole, and dranke a great pot full of wine, which he had caufed to befet in water: whereupon his feauer took him fo forely, that he lined not long after. Alexander vnwisely tooke the chance of his death, and commanded all the haires of his horse and of Hophessis. mules to be presently shorne, intoken of mourning; and that all the battlements of the walles of ... cities also should be ouerthrown, and hung vp poore Glaneus his Phisitian vpona crosse, &commanded that no minstrell should be heard play of any kind of instrument within his campe: the death of vntill that there was brought him an oracle from Iupiter Hammon, commanding that Hephastion H. theftion. should be worshipped and sacrificed vnto, as a demy god. In the end, to passe ouer his mourning and forrow, he went vnto the warres, as vnto an hunting of men, and there subdued the people of the Coss ÆIANS, whom he pluckt vp by the rootes, and flue man, woman, and child. And this was called the facrifice of Hephoftions funerals. Alexander furthermore being defirous to bestow tenne thousand talents cost vpon his obsequies and funerals, and also to exceede the charge by the rarenesse and excellencie of workmanship, amongst all other excellent workemafters, he defired one Staffcrates: for he had ever passing invention, and his worke was alwayes Staffcrates flarely and fumptuous in any newthing he tooke in hand. For hetalking one day with Alex- anextelleus ander, tould him, that of all the mountaines he knew in the world, he thought there was none ker. more excellent to refemble the statue or image of a man, then was mount Athoin THRACIA; and that if it were his pleasure, he would make him the noblest and most durable image, that should be in the world, which in his left hand should hold a city to containe tenthousand perfons, and out of his right hand, there should run a great river into the sea. Yet Alexander would not hearken to him, but then was talking with other workemen of more strange inuentions, and farregreater cost. Now as he was ready to take his journey to go vnto BABYLON, Nearcus his Admirall came againe vnto him from the great sea Oceanum, by the river of Euphrates; and told him, how certaine Chaldean Soothfayers came vnto him, who did warne him that he should not go into BABYLON. Howbeit Alexander made no reckoning of it, but went on. But when he came hard to the wals of BABYLON, he faw a great number of crowes fighting and killing one of another, and some of them fell down dead hard by him. Afterwards being told him that Apollodorus the gouernor of the city of BABYLON, having facrificed vnto the gods, to know what should happen to him, he sent for the foothfayer Pythagoras, to know of him if it were true. The foothfayer denied it not. Then Alexander asked him, what figures he had in the facrifice. He answered that the liner of the beast had no head. O gods, said Alexander then, this is an ill figne: notwithstanding he did Pythagoras no hurt, but yet he repented him that he did not belecue Nearchus words. For this respect therefore Alexander lay much abroad in the country fro fignes be BABYLON, and did take his pleasure rowing vp & down the riner of Euphrates. Yet had he ma- fore Alexny other ill fignes and tokens one vpon another, that made him affraid. For there was a tame death, affe that killed one of the greatest and good lieft Lions in all BABYLON, with one of his feet. An other time when Alexander had put off his clothes, to be annointed to play at tennis, when he should put on his apparell againe, the yong gentlemen that played with him, found a man set in his chaire of estate, having the kings diademe on his head, and his gowne on his backe, & said neuer a word. Then they asked him what he was? It was long before he made them answer, but ar the length coming to himselfe, he said, his name was Dionysius, borne in Messina: and being accused for certaine crimes committed, he was sent from the sea thither, where he had bin along time prisoner; and also that the god Serapis had appeared vnto him, and vndone his irons, & that he commanded him to take the kings gowne, and his diademe, & to fit him down in his chaire of estate, and say neuer a word. When Alexander heard it, he put him to death according to the counsell of his Soothsayers: but then his mind was troubled, and feared that the gods had forsaken him, and also grew to suspect his friends. But first of all, Alexander seared Antipater and his fons about all other. For one of them called tolas, was his first cup-bearer; and his brother called Caffander, was newly come out of GRECE vnto him. The first time that Caffander saw some of the barbarous people reuerencing Alexander, he having bene brought vp with the libertie of GRECE, and had neuer seene the like before, sell into a loud laughing very vnreuerently. Therewith king Alexander was so offended, that he tooke him by the haire of his head with both his hands, & knocked his head & the wall together. Another time also when Cassander did answer fome that accused his father Antipater, king Alexander tooke him vp sharply, and said vnto him: What fay est thou, faid he? Doest thou thinke that these men would have gone so long a journey as this, falfly to accuse thy father, if he had not done them wrong? Cassander againe replied vnto Alexader and faid, that that was a manifest proofe of their falseaccusation, for that they did now accuse him being so farre off, because they thought they could not sodainly be disproued. Alexander thereat fell a laughing a good, and faid, lo, thefe are Ariftotles quiddities to argue pro & com tra: but this will not faue you from punishment, if I find that you have done these men wrong. In fine, they report that Caffander tooke fuch an inward feare and conceit vpon it, that long time after when he was king of MACEDON, & had all GRECE at his commandement, going vp and down in the city of DELPHES, & beholding the monuments and images that are there, he found one of Alexander; which put him into such a sodaine feare, that the haires of his head stood vpright, and his body quaked in such fort, that it was a great time before he could come to himself againe. Now after that Alexander had left his trust and confidence in the gods, his mind was so troubled and afraid, that no strange thing happened vnto him, (how litle socuer it was) but he tooke it straight for a signe and prediction from the gods: so that his tent was alwayes full of Priests, and Soothsayers, that did nothing but sacrifice and purifie, and tend vpon divinements. So horrible a thing is the mistrust and contempt of the gods, when it is begotten in the hearts of men; and superstition also so dreadful, that it filled the guiltie consciences and searefull hearts, like water distilling from aboue: as at that time it filled Alexander with all folly, after that seare had once possessed him. This notwithstanding, after that he had received some answers touching Hephestion from the Oracle of Iupiter Hammon, he left his forrow, and returned againe to his banquets and feastings. For he did sumptuously feast Nearchus, and one day when he came out of his bath according to his manner, being readie to go to bed, Medius one of his Capraines befought him to come to a banquet to him to his lodging. Alexander went thither, and dranke there all that night and the next day, fo that he got an ague by it. But that came not (as some write) by drinking vp Hercules cup all at a draught; neither for the sodaine paine he felt betweene his shoulders, as if he had bene thrust into the backe with a speare: for all these were thought to be written by some for lies and fables, because they would have made the end of this great tragedy lamentable & pitifull. But Aristobulus writeth, that he had such an extreame feuer and thirst withall; that he dranke wine, and after that fell a rauing; and at the length died the thirtieth day of the moneth of Iune. In his houshould booke of things passed daily, it is written, that his feuer being vpon him, he flept at his hote house on the eighteene day of June. The next morning after he was come out of his hote house, he went into his chamber, and passed away all that day with Medius, playing at dice; and at night very late, after be had bathed himselfe and sacrificed vnto the gods, he fell to meate, and had his feuer that night. And the twentieth day also, bathing himselfe againe, and making his ordinarie facrifice to the gods, he did sit downe to eate within his stone, hearkening vnto Wearchus that told him strange things he had seene in the great fea Occanum. The one and twentieth day also having done the like as before, he was much more inflamed then he had bene, and felt himselfe very ill all night, and the next day following in a great feauer; and on that day he made his bed to be remoued, and to be fet up by the fish ponds, where he communed with his captaines touching certaine roomes that were void in his army, and commanded them not to place any man that were not of good experience. The three and twentieth day having an extreame feauer upon him, he was caried vnto the facrifices, and commanded that his chiefest Captaines onely should remaine in his lodging, and that the other meaner fort, as Centeniers and Lieutenants of bands, that they should watch and ward withour. The foure and twentieth day, he was caried vnto the other pallace of the kings. which is on the other fide of the lake, where he flept a litle, but the feauer neuer left him; & when his Captaines and Noblemen came to do him humble reuerence, and to fee him, he lay speechleffe. So did he the five and twentieth day also: insomuch as the MACEDONIANS thought he was dead. Then they came and knocked at the pallace gate, and cried out vnto his friends and familiars, and threatened them, so that they were compelled to open them the gate. Therupon the gates were opened, and they coming in their gownes, went vnto his bed fide to fee him. That felfe day Python and Selaucus were appointed by the kings friends to go to the temple of the god Serapis, to know if they should bring king Alexander thither. The god answered them, that they shold not remone him from thence. The eight and twentieth day at night Alexander died. Thus The death it is written word for word in maner, in the houshold booke of remembrance. At that present of Alexan. time, there was no suspition that he was poysoned. Yet they say, that sixe yeares after, there ap- der the peared some proofe that he was poysoned. Whereupon his mother Olympias put many men to death, and cast the ashes of solar into the wind, that was dead before, for that it was said he gaue him poyfon in his drinke. They that thinke it was Aristotle that counselled Antipater to do it, by whose meane the poyson was brought, they say that Agnothemis reported it, having heard it of superfield king Antigonus owne mouth. The poyson (as some say) was cold as ice, and falleth from a rocke for the poyson the territory of the city of Nonacris, and it is gathered as they would gather a dew into the lovander. horne of the foot of an affe, for there is no other kind of thing that will keep it, it is so extreame cold and piercing. Others maintaine, and fay, that the report of his poyfoning is vntrue; and for proofe thereof they alleadge this reason, which is of no small importance, that is: That the chiefest captaines fell at great variance after his death, so that the corps of Alexander remained many dayes naked without buriall, in a hote drie countrie, and yet there neuer appeared any figne or token vpon his body, that he was poyfoned, but was still a cleane and faire corps as could be. Alexander left Roxane great with child, for the which the MACEDONIANS did her great honour: but she did malice Statira extreamely, and did finely deceive her by a counterfeit letter she fent. as if it had come from Alexander, willing her to come vnto him. But when she was come, Roxane Statica killed her and her fister, & then threw their bodies into a wel, and filled it vp with earth, by Per-

Cinna and

T what time Sylla was made Lord of all, he would have had Cafar put away his wife Cornelia, the daughter of Cinna Dictator: but whe he faw he could neither with any promise nor threat bring him to it, he tooke her ioynter away from him. The cause of Casars ill will vnto Sylla, was by meanes of mariage: for Marius the elder, maried his fathers owne fifter, by whom he had Marius the younger, whereby Cafar and he were cousin germaines. Sylla being troubled in weightic matters, putting to death so many of his enemies, when he came to be conquerour, he made no reckening of C.esar: and he was not contented to be hidden in safetie, but came and made suite vnto the people for the Priesthoodship that was voide, when he had scant any haire on his face. Howbeit he was repulsed by Syllaes meanes, that secretly was against him. Who, when he was determined to have killed him, some of his friends told him, that it was to no purpose to put so young a boy as he to death. But Sylla told them againe, that they did not confider that there were many Marians in that yong boy. Cafar vnderstäding that, folcout of Rome, and hid himfelf a long time in the country of the SABINES, wandring still from place to place. But one day being caried fro house to house, he fell into the hands of Syllaes fouldiers, who fearched all those places, and took them whom they found hidden. C.esar bribed the captaine, whose name was Cornelius, with two talents which he gaue him. After he had escaped the thus, he went vnto the sea side, & took ship, & sailed into BITHYNIA to go vnto king Wicomedes. When he had bin with him a while, he took sea againe, & was taken by pyrats about the Ile of Рнапмасува: for those pyrats kept all vponthesea coast, with a great fleet of ships and boates. They asking him at the first 20 talents for his ransome, Cafar laughed them to scorne, as though they knew not what a man they had taken, & of himself promised them 50. talents. The he fent his men vp & down to get him this mony, so that he was left in maner alone among these theenes of the Cilicians, (which are the cruellest butchers in the world) with one of his friends, and two of his flaues only: and yet he made fo litle reckoning of them, that when he was desirous to sleepe, he sent vnto them to command them to make no noise. Thus was he 38 daies among them, not kept as prisoner, but rather waited vpon by them as a Prince. All this time he would boldly exercise himselse in any sport or pastime they would go to. And otherwhile also he would write verses, and make orations, and call them together to say them before them: and if any of them seemed as though they had not vnderstood him, or passed not for them, he called them blockheads and brute beafts, and laughing, threatened them that he would hang them vp. But they were as merry with the matter as could be, and took all in good part, thinking that this his bold speech came through the simplicity of his youth. So when his ransome was come from the city of MILETVM, they being paid their mony, and he againe fet at liberry; he then prefently armed and manned certaine shappes out of the hauen of Milry, to follow those thecaes, whom he found yet riding at anker in the fame Iland. So he tooke the most of them, and had the spoile of their goods; but for their bodies, he brought them into the city of PERGAMYS & there committed them to prison, whilest he himselfe went to speake with Iunius, who had the government of Asia, as vnto whom the execution of these pirats did belong, for that he was Prator of that countrey. Eurthis Prætor having a great fancy to be fingering of the money, because there was good flore of it, answered that he would consider of these prisoners at better ley sure. Castar leaving Innius there, returned again vnto Per Gamvs, and there hung vp all thefetheeues openly vpon a croffe, as he had offentimes promifed them in the Ile he would do, when they thought he did but ieast. Afterwards when Syllaes power began to decay, Cafars friends wrote vnto him, to pray him to come home again. But he failed first vnto RHODEs, to study there a time vnder Apollonius the fon of Molon, whose scholer also cicero was, for he was a very honest man, and an excellent good Rhetoritian. It is reported, that Cafar had an excellent natural gift to speake well cofare do before the people, and besides that rare gift, he was excellently wel studied, so that doubtlesse he was counted the second man for eloquence in his time, & gaue place to the first, because he wold be the first and chiefest man of war & authority, being not yet come to the degree of perfection to speak wel, which his nature could have performed in him, because he was given rather to follow wars, and to manage great matters, which in the end brought him to be Lord of all Rome. And therefore in a booke he wrote against that which Cicera made in the praise of Cato, he prayeth the readers not to compare the stile of a souldier with the eloquence of an excellent Orator, that had followed it the most part of his life. When he was returned againe vnto Rome, he accused Dolabella for his ill behauiour in the gouernement of his Provinces, and he had divers cities of GRECE that gaue in cuidence against him. Notwithstanding, Dolabella at the length was dismissed. Cafar, to require the good will of the GRECIANS which they had shewed him in his accusation of Dolabella, tooke their cause in hand, when they did accuse Publius Antonius before Marcus Lucullus, Prætor of Macedon: and followed it so hard against him in their behalfe, that Antonius was driven to appeale before the Tribunes at Rome, alleaging, to colour his appeale withall, that he could have no inflice in GRECE against the GRECIANS. Now Cafar immediatly wanne many mens good wils at Rome, through his eloquence, in pleading of their causes, and the people loued him maruellously also, because of the courte our manner he had? to speake to every man, and to vse them gently, being more ceremonious therein then was looked for in one of his yeares. Furthermore, he ener kept a good boord, and fared well at his ta- celar loued ble, and was very liberall befides: the which indeed did advance him forward, and brought befitted. him in estimation with the people. His enemies judging that this fauour of the common people would foone quaile, when he could no longer hold out that charge and expence, fuffered lower of the him to runne on, till by litle and litle he was growne to be of great strength and power. But in people. fine, when they had thus given him the bridle to grow to this greatnes, and that they could not then pull him backe, though indeede in fight it would turne one day to the destruction of the whole state and commonwealth of Rome: too late they found, that there is not so litle a beginning of any thing, but continuance of time will foone make it ftrong, when through contempt there is no impediment to hinder the greatnesse. Thereupon, Cicero like a wise shipmaster that feareth the calmenesse of the sea, was the first manthat mistrusting his manner of dealing in the commonwealth, found out his craft and malice, which he cunningly cloked under the habite of outward courtefie and familiarity. And yet, said he, when I consider how finely he combeth his circuit faire bush of haire, and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scratch his head with one singer under ment onely, my mind gives me then, that fuch a kind of man should not have so wicked a thought in of cafar. his head, as to ouerthrow the state of the commonwealth. But this was long time after that. The The lone of first shew and proofe of the love and goodwil which the people did beare vnto Casar, was when the people he sued to be Tribune of the souldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thousand footmen) standing against and some Caius Pompilius, at what time he was preferred and chosen before him. But the second and more manifest proofe then the first, was at the death of his aunt Iulia, the wife of Marine the older. International in

But first of all, Alexander feared Antipater and his fons about all other. For one of them called Iolas, was his first cup-bearer; and his brother called Cassander, was newly come out of GRECE vnto him. The first time that Cassander saw some of the barbarous people reverencing Alexander, he having bene brought vp with the libertie of GRECE, and had neuer feene the like before, fell into a loud laughing very vnreuerently. Therewith king Alexander was so offended, that he tooke him by the haire of his head with both his hands, & knocked his head & the wall together. Another time also when Cassander did answer fome that accused his father Antipater, king Alexander tooke him vp sharply, and said vnto him: What fay est thou, faid he. Doest thou thinke that these men would have gone so long a journey as this, falfly to accuse thy father, if he had not done them wrong cassander againe replied vnto Alexader and faid, that that was a manifest proofe of their false acculation, for that they did now accuse him being so farre off, because they thought they could not sodainly be disproued. Alexander thereat fell a laughing a good, and faid, lo, thefe are Ariffotles quiddities to argue pro es com tra: but this will not faue you from punishment, if I find that you have done these men wrong. In fine, they report that Caffander tooke such an inward feare and conceit vpon it, that long time after when he was king of MACEDON, & had all GRECE at his commandement, going vp and down in the city of DELPHES. & beholding the monuments and images that are there, he found one of Alexander; which put him into fuch a fodaine feare, that the haires of his head flood vpright, and his body quaked in fuch fort, that it was a great time before he could come to himself againe. Now after that Alexander had left his trust and confidence in the gods, his mind was so troubled and afraid, that no strange thing happened vnto him, (how litle socuer it was) but he tooke it straight for a figne and prediction from the gods: so that his tent was alwayes full of Priests, and Soothsayers, that did nothing but sacrifice and purishe, and tend vpon divinements. So horrible a thing is the mistrust and contempt of the gods, when it is begotten in the hearts of men; and superstition also so dreadful, that it filled the guiltie consciences and fearefull hearts, like water distilling from aboue: as at that time it filled Alexander with all folly, after that feare had once possessed him. This notwithstanding, after that he had received some answers touching Hephastion from the Oracle of Iupiter Hammon, he left his forrow, and returned agains to his banquets and feastings. For he did sumptuously feast Nearchus, and one day when he came out of his bath according to his manner, being readie to go to bed, Medius one of his Capraines befought him to come to a banquet to him to his lodging. Alexander went thither, and dranke there all that night and the next day, so that lie got an ague by it. But that came not (as fome write) by drinking vp Hercules cup all at a draught; neither for the sodaine paine he felt betweene his shoulders, as if he had bene thrust into the backe with a speare: for all these were thought to be written by some for lies and fables, because they would have made the end of this great tragedy lamentable & pitifull. But Aristobulus writeth, that he had such an extreame feuer and thirst withall; that he dranke wine, and after that fell a rauing; and at the length died the Ariftobulus thirtieth day of the moneth of Iune. In his houshould booke of things passed daily, it is written, that his feuer being vpon him, he flept at his hote house on the eighteene day of June. The next morning after he was come out of his hote house, he went into his chamber, and passed away all that day with Medius, playing at dice; and at night very late, after be had bathed himselfe and sacrificed vnto the gods, he fell to meate, and had his feuer that night. And the twentieth day also, bathing himselfe againe, and making his ordinarie facrifice to the gods, he did fit downe to eate within his stone, hearkening vnto Wearchus that told him strange things he had seene in the great fea Oceanum. The one and twentieth day also having done the like as before, he was much more inflamed then he had bene, and felt himselfe very ill all night, and the next day following in a great feauer; and on that day he made his bed to be removed, and to be fet vp by the fish ponds, where he communed with his captaines touching certaine roomes that were void in his army, and commanded them not to place any man that were not of good experience. The three and twentieth day having an extreame feauer vpon him, he was caried vnto the facrifices, and commanded that his chiefest Captaines onely should remaine in his lodging, and that the other meaner fort, as Centeniers and Lieutenants of bands, that they flould watch and ward without. The foure and twentieth day, he was caried vnto the other pallace of the kings. which is on the other fide of the lake, where he flept a little, but the feauer neuer left him: & when his Captaines and Noblemen came to do him humble reuerence, and to fee him, he lay speechleffe. So did he the five and twentieth day also: insomuch as the Macedonians thought he was dead. Then they came and knocked at the pallace gate, and cried out with his friends and familiars, and threatened them, to that they were compelled to open them the gate. Therupon the gates were opened, and they coming in their gownes, went vnto his bed fide to fee him. That felfe day Python and Seleucus were appointed by the kings friends to go to the temple of the god Serapia, to know if they should bring king Alexander thither. The god answered them, that they shold not remove him from thence. The eight and twentieth day at night Alexander died. Thus The death it is written word for word in maner, in the houshold booke of remembrance. At that present of alexans. time, there was no suspicion that he was poysoned. Yet they say, that six eyeares after, there appeared some proofe that he was poy soned. Whereupon his mother olympias put many men to death, and call the aftes of Iolas into the wind, that was dead before, for that it was faid he gaue him poy son in his drinke. They that thinke it was Aristotle that counselled Antipater to do it, by whose meane the poyson was brought, they say that Agnothemis reported it, having heard it of superfield king Antigonus owne mouth. The poyfon (as fome fay) was cold as ice, and falleth from a rocke for the pay in the territory of the city of Nonacris, and it is gathered as they would gather a dew into the devander. home of the foot of an affe, for there is no other kind of thing that will keep it, it is fo extreame cold and piercing. Others maintaine, and fay, that the report of his poyfoning is vntrue; and for proofe thereof they alleadge this reason, which is of no small importance, that is: That the chiefell captaines fell at great variance after his death, so that the corps of Alexander remained many dayes naked without buriall, in a hote drie countrie, and yetthere never appeared any figne or token upon his body, that he was poyfoned but was still a cleane and faire corps as could be. Alexander left Roxane great with child, for the which the MACEDONIANS did her great honour: but fine did malice Statira extreamely, and did finely deceive her by a counterfeit letter fine fent. as if it had come from Alexander, willing her to come vnto him. But when she was come, Roxane killed her and her fister, & then threw their bodies into a wel, and filled it vp with earth, by Perdiscass help and confent. Perdiscas came to be king immediatly after Alexanders death by means Roxane. of Aridaus, whom he kept about him for his guard and fafety: This Aridaus, being borne of a Aridaus, strumpet and common woman, called Philinna, was halfe lunaticke, not by nature nor by chance, but as it is reported, put out of his wits when he was a young towardly boy, by drinkes which Olympias caused to be given him, and thereby continued franticke.

in safetie, but came and made suite vnto the people for the Priesthoodship that was voide, when he had scant any haire on his face. Howbeit he was repulsed by Syllaes meanes, that secretly was against him. Who, when he was determined to have killed him, some of his friends told him, that it was to no purpose to put so young a boy as he to death. But Sylla told them againe, that they did not confider that there were many Marians in that yong boy. Cafar understäding that, ftole out of Rome, and hid himselfalong time in the country of the Sabines, wandring still from place to place. But one day being caried fro house to house, he fell into the hands of Syllaes fouldiers, who fearched all those places, and took them whom they found hidden. Casar bribed the captaine, whose name was Cornelius, with two talents which he gaue him. After he had escaped the thus, he went vnto the sea side, & took ship, & failed into BITHYNIA to go vnto king Nicomedes. When he had bin with him a while, he took sea againe, & was taken by pyrats about the Ile of Phan Macvsa: for those pyrats kept all vpon the sea coast, with a great fleet of ships and boates. They asking him at the first 20. talents for his ransome, Cafar laughed them to scorne, as though they knew not what a man they had taken, & of himself promised them 50 talents. The he sent his men vp & down to get him this mony, so that he was left in maner alone among these theeues of the Cilicians, (which are the cruellest butchers in the world) with one of his friends, and two of his flaues only and yet he made fo litle reckoning of them, that when he was desirous to sleepe, he sent vnto them to command them to make no noise. Thus was he 38 daies among them, not kept as prisoner, but rather waited vpon by them as a Prince. All this time he would boldly exercise himselfe in any sport or pastimethey would go to. And otherwhile also he would write verses, and make orations, and call them together to fay them before them : and if any of them seemed as though they had not understood him, or passed not for them, he called Cefartooke fea and went vnto Nicomedes king of By Cafar tathem blockheads and brute beafts, and laughing, threatened them that he would hang them vp. But they were as merry with the matter as could be, and took all in good part, thinking that this his bold speech came through the simplicity of his youth. So when his ransome was come from the city of MILETVM, they being paid their mony, and he againe fet at liberty; he then prefent ly armed and manned certaine shippes out of the hauen of MILETVM; to follow those theeues, whom he found yet riding at anker in the same Iland. So he tooke the most of them, and had the spoile of their goods, but for their bodies, he brought them into the city of PERGAMYS & there committed them to prison, whilest he himselfe went to speake with Iunius, who had the government of Asia, as vinto whom the execution of these pirats did belong, for that he was Prator of that countrey. Butthis Prator having a great fancy to be fingering of the money, because there was good flore of it, answered that he would consider of these prisoners at better leysure: Casar leauing Junius there, returned again vnto Per GAMVs, and there hung vp all these theeues openly vpon a crosse, as he had oftentimes promised them in the He he would do, when they thought he did but icast. Afterwards when Syllaes power began to decay, Casars friends wrote vnto him, to pray him to come home again. But he failed first vnto RHODEs, to study there a time vnder Apollonius the fon of Molon, whose scholer also Cicero was, for he was a very honest man, and an excellent good Rhetoritian. It is reported, that Cafar had an excellent natural gift to speake well cafar elobefore the people, and besides that rare gift, he was excellently wel studied, so that doubtlesse he was counted the second man for eloquence in his time, & gaue place to the first because he wold be the first and chiefest man of war & authority, being not yet come to the degree of perfection to speak wel, which his nature could have performed in him, because he was given rather to sollow wars, and to manage great matters, which in the end brought him to be Lord of all Rome. And therefore in a booke he wrote against that which Cieere made in the praise of Cate, he prayeth the readers not to compare the stile of a fouldier with the eloquence of an excellent Orator, that had followed it the most part of his life. When he was returned againe vnto Roms, he accused Dolabella for his ill behauiour in the gouernement of his Prouinces, and he had divers cities of GRECE that gaue in euidence against him. Notwithstanding, Dolabella at the length was dismissed. Cefar, to require the good will of the GRECIANS which they had shewed him in his accusation of Dolabella, tooke their cause in hand, when they did accuse Publius Antonius before Marcus Lucullus, Prætor of MACEDON: and followed it so hard against him in their behalfe, that Antonius was driven to appeale before the Tribunes at Rome, alleaging, to colour his appeale withall, that he could have no inflice in GRECE against the GRECIANS. Now Cafar immediatly wanne many mens good wils at Rome, through his eloquence, in pleading of their causes, and the people loued him maruellously also, because of the courteous manner he had to speake to euery man, and to vse them gently, being more ceremonious therein then was looked for in one of his yeares. Furthermore, he ever kept a good boord, and fared well at his ta- 1 Celar loved ble, and was very liberall besides: the which indeed did advance him forward, and brought hospitality. him in estimation with the people. His enemies judging that this fauour of the common people would foone quaile, when he could no longer hold out that charge and expense, suffered lower of the him to runne on, till by litle and litle he was growne to be of great strength and power. But in prople. fine, when they had thus given him the bridle to grow to this greatnes, and that they could not then pull him backe, though indeede in fight it would turne one day to the destruction of the whole state and commonwealth of Rom E: too late they found, that there is not so litle a begin ning of any thing, but continuance of time will foone make it frong, when through contempt there is no impediment to hinder the greatnesse. Thereupon, Cicero like a wise shipmaster that feareththe calmenesse of the sea, was the first manthat mistrusting his manner of dealing in the commonwealth, found out his craft and malice, which he cunningly cloked under the habite of outward courtefie and familiarity. And yet, faid he, when I confider how finely he combeth his citerosis faire bush of haire, and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scratch his head with one finger uses in the second series and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scratch his head with one finger uses the second series and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scratch his head with one finger uses the second series and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scratch his head with one finger uses the second series and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scratch his head with one finger uses the second series and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scratch his head with one finger uses the second series and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scratch his head with one finger uses the second series and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scratch his head with one finger uses the second series and head series are series as the second series and head series are series as the second series are series as the second series are series as the second series and head series are series as the second series are series are series as the second series are series are series as the second series are onely, my mind gives me then, that fuch a kind of man should not have so wicked a thought in of casa. his head, as to ouerthrow the state of the commonwealth. But this was long time after that. The The lone of first shew and proofe of the loue and goodwil which the people did beare vnto Cafar, was when the Rome he fued to be Tribune of the fouldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thousand footmen) standing against "no ceffer. Caius Pompilius, at what time he was preferred and chosen before him. But the second and more court has manifest proofe then the first, was at the death of his aunt Iulia, the wife of Marius the elder.

For being her nephew, he made a solemne oration in the market place in comendation of her. & at her burial did boldly venture to shew forth the images of Marius: the which was the first time that they were seene after Syllaes victorie, because that Marius and all his confederates had bene proclaimed traitors and enemies to the commonwealth. For when there were fome that cried out vpon Cafar for doing of it, the people on the other fide kept a stirre, and reioyced at it, clapping of their hands, and thanked him, for that he had brought as it were out of hell, the remembrance of Marius honour againe into Rome, which had so long time bene obscured and buried. And where it had bene an ancient custome of long time, that the Romaines vied to make funerall orations in praise of old Ladies and matrons when they died, but not of young womens Cafar was the first that praised his own wife with funeral oration when she was dead, the which also did encrease the peoples goodwils the more, seeing him of so kind and gentle nature. After the buriall of his wife, he was made Treasurer vnder Antistius Vetus Prætor, whom he honoured euer after: fo that when himselfe came to be Prætor, he made his sonne to be chosen Treasurer. Afterwards, when he was come out of that office, he maried his third wife Pompeta, hauing a daughter by his first wife, Cornelia, which was maried vnto Pompey the Great. Now for that he was very liberall in expences, buying (as some thought) but a vaine and short glory of the fauour of the people, (where indeede he bought good cheape the greatest things that could be:) some say, that before he bare any office in the commonwealth, he was growne in debt, to the summe of thirteene hundred talents. Furthermore, because he was made overseer of the worke, for the high way called Appius way, he disburfed a great fumme of his owner money towards the charges of the fame. And on the other fide, when he was made Ædilis, for that he did shew the people the pastime of three hundred and twenty couple of sword players, and did besides exceede all other in sumptuousnesse in the sports and common seasts, which he made to delight them withall, (and did as it were drowne all the stately shewes of others in the like, that had gone before him) he so pleased the people, and wan their loue therewith, that they denised daily to give him new offices for to requite him. At that time there were two factios in Rome, to wit, the faction of Sylla, which was very strong and of great power; and the other of Marius, which then was vnder foote, and durst not shew it selfe. But Colar because he would renew it againe, euen at that time when he being Ædilis, all the feasts and common sports were in their greatest russe, he secretly caused images of Marius to be made, and of victories that caried triumphs; & those he set up one night within the Capitoll. The next morning when every man faw the gliftering of these golden images excellently well wrought, shewing by the inscriptions, that they were the victories which Marius had won vpon the CIMBRES, curry one maruelled much at the boldnesse of him that durst set them vp there, knowing well enough who it was. Hercupon it ran straight through all the city, & euery man came thither to see them. Then some cried out vpon Cafar, & faid, it was a tyranny which he meant to fet vp, by renewing of fuch honours as before had bene troden vnder foot & forgotten, by common decree and open proclamation; and that it was no more but a bait to gage the peoples good wils, which he had fet out in the stately shewes of his comon playes, to see if he had brought them to his lure, that they wold abide such parts to be played, & a new alteration of things to be made. They of Marius faction the other side, incouraging one another, shewed theselues straight a great nuber gathered together, & made the mount of the Capitoll ring again with their cries and Clapping of hands: infomuch as the teares ran down many of their cheeks, for very ioy, when they faw y images of Marius, & they extolled Cafar to the skies, judging him the worthiest man of althe kinred of Marius. The Senate being affembled therupon, Catulus Luctatias, one of y greatest authority at that time in Rome, rose, & vehemetly inueighed against Casar, & spake that the which ever since hath bin noted much that Cafar did not now couertly go to worke, but by plain force fought to alter the state of the comonwealth. Neuerthelesse, Cafar at that time answered him so, that the Senat was fatisfied. Thereupon they that had him in estimation did grow in better hope then before, and perswaded him, that hardily he should give place to no man, and that through the goodwill of the people, he should be better then all they, and come to be the chiefest man of the city. At that time the chiefe Bishop Metellus died, and two of the notablest men of the citie, and of greatest authoritie (Isauricus and Catulus) contended for his roome: Casar not withstanding their contention, would give neither of them both place, but presented himselfe to the people, and made fuite for it as they did. The fuitebeing equall betwixt either of them, Catulus, because he was a man of greater calling and dignity than the other, doubting the vncertainty of the election, fent vnto Cefar a good fumme of money, to make him leave off his fuite. But Cefar fent him word againe, that he would lend a greater fumme then that, to maintaine the fuite against him. When the day of the election came, his mother bringing him to the doore of his house, Cafar weeping, killed her, and faid: Mother, this day thou shalt fee thy sonne chiefe Bishop of Rome, or banifhed from Rome. In fine, when the voyces of the people were gathered together, and the strife well debated, Cafar wannethe victory, and made the Senate and Noble men all affraid of him, Cafar made for that they thought that thencefoorth he would make the people do what he thought good. Then Catulus and Pifo fell flatly out with Cicero, and condemned him for that he did not bewray Cafar, when he knew that he was of conspiracy with Catiline, and had oportunity to have done cafar in it. For when Catiline was bent and determined, not onely to overthrow the state of the commonwealth, but vtterly to destroy the Empire of Rome, he escaped out of the hands of instice retwith for lacke of sufficient proofe, before his full treason and determination was knowne. Notwith- Catilinein standing he left Lentulus and Cethegus in the city, companions of his conspiracy: vnto whom, whether Cafar did give any fecret helpe or comfort, it is not well knowne. Yet this is manifest, that when they were continced in open Senate, Cicero being at that time Confull, asking cuery mans opinion in the Senate, what punishment they should have, and every one of them till it came to Cafar, gaue sentence they should die: Cafar then rising vp to speake, made an oration (penned and premeditated before) and faid, that it was neither lawfull, nor yet their cu- Cefarwens flome did beare it, to put men of such Nobility to death (but in an extremity) without lawfull inditement and condemnation. And therefore, that if they were put in prison infomecity of confinators ITALY, where Cicero thought best vntill that Catiline were ouerthrowne, the Senate then might at their pleasure quickly take such order therein, as might appeare best vnto their wisedomes. This opinion was thought more gentle, and withall was vitered with fuch a paffing good grace and cloquence, that not onely they which were to speake after him did approuchts but fuch also as had spoken to the contrary before, reuoked their opinion, and stucke to his, vntil it came to Cato and Catulus to speake. They both did sharply inneigh against him, but Cato chiefly: who in his oration made Cafar suspected to be of the conspiracy, and stoutly spake against him, infomuch that the offenders were put into the hads of the officers to be put to death. tim against Cafar coming out of the Senate, a company of young men which guarded cicero for the fafety of cafar. his person, did set upon him with their swords drawne. But some say, that Curio couered C.esar with his gowne, and tooke him out of their hands. And Cicero felfe, when the yong men looked vpon him, beckened with his head that they shold not kil him, either fearing the fury of the people, or else that he thought it too shameful and wicked a part. But if that were true, I maruel why Cicero did not put it into his booke he wrote of his Confulship. But certainly they blamed him afterwards, forthat he took not the opportunity offered him against Casar, only for ouermuch feare of the people, that loued him very dearely. For shortly after, when Cafar went into the Senate, to cleare himselfe of certaine presumptions and false accusations objected against him, and being bitterly taunted among them, the Senate keeping him longer then they were wont: the people came about the councell-house, and called out aloud for him, bidding them let him out. Cato then fearing the infurrection of the pooreneedy persons, which were they that put all their hope in Cafar, and did also moue the people to stirre, did perswade the Senate to make a franke distribution of corne vnto them, for a moneth. This distribution did put the commonwealth to a new charge of fine hundred and fifty Myriades. This counsell quenched a present great feare, and did in happy time scatter and disperse abroad the best part of Casars force and power at such time as he was made Prætor, and that for respect of his office he was most to be seared. Yet all the time he was officer, he neuer fought any alteration in the common-wealth, but contrarily he himself had a great misfortune sel on his house, which was this. There was a yong noble man of the order of the PATRICIAN'S, called Publius Clodius, who lacked neither wealth nor cloquence P. Clodius but otherwise as insolent and impudent a person, as any was else in Rome. He became in who Powloue with Pompeia Cesars wife, who misliked not withall: not withstanding she was so straightly piaces are looked to, and Aurelia (Casars mother) an ho st Gentlewoman had such an eye of her, The good that these two louers could not meete as they we d, without great perill and difficulty. him, asked him merily, if there were any contending for offices in that town, and whether there were any strife there among st the noble men for honor. Cafar speaking in good earnest, answered: I cannot tell that faid he, but for my part I had rather be the chiefest man here, then the second person in Rome. Another time also when he was in Spaine, reading the history of A-levanders acts, when he had read it, he was forowfull a good while after, and then burft out in weeping. His friends feeing that, maruelled what should be the cause of his sorow. He answe-being no elder then my selfe is now, had in old time wonne so many nations and countries: and that I hitherunto haue done nothing worthy of my felfe: Therefore when he was come into the CALLECIANS and Lysitanians, he conquered all, and went as far as the great fea Oceanum, fubduing all the people which before knew not the ROMAINES for their Lords. There he tooke order for pacifying of the warre, and did as wifely take order for the establishing of peace. For he did reconcile the cities together, and made them friends one with another, but specially he pacified all fuites of law, and ftrife betwixt the debtors and creditors, which grew by of their debtors, untill fuch time as they had payed them felues; and that the debtors should have ming vnhappily at the very time when the Confuls were chosen, he fent to pray the Senate to do him that factour, that being absent he might by his friends sue for the Consulfhip. Cato at the first did vehemently inuey against it, vowching an expresse law to the contrary. But afterwards, perceiving that notwith standing the reasons he alledged, many of the Senators (being wonne by Cafar) fauored his request, yet he cunningly sought all he could to preuent them, prolonging time, in dilating his oration vntill night. Gafar thereupon determined rather to give ouer the fuite of his triumph, and to make fuite for the Confulfhip; and so came into the city; and had fuch a deuice with him, as went beyond them all but Cato only. His deuice was this: Pompey many menthought, that caused the civill warre but rather it was their agreement together, who ioyned all their powers first to overthrow the state of the Senate and Nobility, and afterwards the ouerhardnesse and austerity of the Senate, they draue him against his will to leane vnto the people: and thereupon having Crassus on the one side of him, and Pompey on the other, he asked them openly in the affembly, if they did give their confent vnto the lawes which he had put foorth. They both answered they did. Then he prayed them to stand by him against those that threatened him with force of fword to let him. Craffus gave him his word, he would, Pompey also did the like, and added thereunto, that he would come with his sword and target both, against them that would withstand him with their swords. These words offended much the Senate, being farre vnmeete for his grauity, and vndecent for the maiesty and honor he caried, and most of all vncomely for the presence of the Senate whom he should have reverenced and were red them, Do you not thinke, faid he, that I have good cause to be heavie, when king Alexander

Now the Romaines having a custome, that coloribation fuch as demanded honor of triumph, should remaine a while without the city, and that they on diers salled the other fide which fued for the Consulship, should of necessity be there in person: Casar com-and Crassus, two of the greatest personages of the city of Rome being at larre together, Casar case remade them friends, & by that meanes got vnto himselfe the power of them both, for by colour concileto of that gentleach & friendship of his, he subtilly (vnwares to the all) did greatly alter & change the strengths commonwealth. they fell at jarre one with another. But Cato that then forefaw and prophecied many times what catos fore, would follow, was taken but for a vaine man: but afterwards they found him a wifer man then fish and happy in his counsel. Thus C.efar being brought vnto the affembly of the election, in the middest class first of the fetwo noble persons, whom he had before reconciled together, he was there chosen Con- confusibile full with Calphurnius Bibulus, without gaine-faying, or contradiction of any man. But when the Noblemen of the Senate Lex agree were against his deuice, he desiring no better occasion, began to cry out, and to protest; that by rid, claime to be peculiar vnto them, faying: that she is king Midas mother. How beit the Romain as hold opinion, that it is a nimph of the woods maried vnto the god Faunus. The GRECIANS, they fay also, that she was one of the mothers of the god Bacchus, whom they dare not name. And for proofe hereof, on her feast day, the women make certaine tabernacles of vine twigges, & leaves of vine branches; and also they make as the tale goeth, a holy dragon for this goddeile, and do fee it by her : besides, it is not lawfull for any man to be present at their sacrifices, no not within the house it selfe where they are made. Furthermore, they say, that the women in these facrifices do many things amongst themselves, much like vnto the ceremonies of Orpheus. Now when the time of this feast came, the husband (whether he were Prætor or Confull) and all his men and the boyes in the house, do come out of it, and leaue it wholly to his wife, to order the house at her pleasure, and there the sacrifices & ceremonies are done the most part of the night, and they do besides passethe night away in songs and musick. Pompeia Casars wife, being that yeare to celebrate this feast, clodius who had yet no haire on his face, and thereby thought he should not be bewrayed, difguifed himfelf in a finging wenches apparell, because his face was very like vnto a yong wench. He finding the gates open, being fecretly brought in by her chambermaid that was made priny vnto it, she left him, and ranne to Pompeia her mistresse, to tell her that he was come. The chamber-maid taried long before she came againe, in somuch as Cledius being weary waiting for her where she lest him, he tooke his pleasure, and went from one place to another in the house, which had very large roomes in it, still shunning the light; and was by chance met withall by one of Aureliaes maides, who taking him for a woman, prayed her to play. Clodius refufing to play, the maide pulled him forward, and asked him what he was: Clodius then answered her, that he taried for Abra one of Pompeiaes women. So Aureliaes maid knowing him by his voice, ranne straight where the lights and Ladies were, and cried out, that there was a man disguised in womans apparell. The women therewith were so amazed, that Aurelia caused them presently to leave off the ceremonies of the facrifice, and to hide their secret things, and having seene the gates fast locked, went immediatly vp and downethe house with torch-light to fecke out this man: who at the last was found out in the chamber of Pompeiaes maid, with whom he hid himselfe. Thus clodius being found out, and knowne of the women, they thrust him out of the doores by the shoulders. The same night the women told their husbands of this chance as foone as they came home. The next morning, there ranne a great rumour through the city, how Clodius had attempted a great villany, and that he deserved, not onely to be punished of them whom he had flandered, but also of the commonwealth and the gods. There was one of the Tribunes of the people that did indite him, and accuse him of high treason to the gods. Furthermore, there were also of the chiefest of the Nobilitie and Senate, that came to depose against him, and burthened him with many horrible and detestable facts, and specially with incestcommitted with his owne fister, which was maried vnto Lucullus. Notwithstanding the people stoutly defended Clodius against their accusations: and this did helpe him much against the ludges, which were amazed, and afraid to stirre the people. This not with standing, Cafar presently put his wife away, and thereupon being brought by Clodius accuser to be a witnesseagainst him, he answered, he knew nothing of that they objected against Clodius. This answer being cleane contrary to their expectation that heard it, the accuser asked Casar, why then he had put away his wife: Because I will not, said he, that my wife be so much as suspected. And fome say, that Casar spake truly as he thought. But others thinke, that he did it to please the common people, who were very desirous to saue Clodius. So Clodius was discharged of this accusation, because the most part of the Iudges gaue a confused iudgement, for the scarethey stood in one way of the danger of the common people, if they condemned him, and for the ill opinion on the other side of the Nobility, if they did quithim. The government of the protince of Spaine being fallen vnto Cafar, for that he was Prætor, his creditors came & cried out vpon him, and were importunate of him to be payed. cafar being vnable to satisfie them, was compelled to go vnto crassus, who was the richest man of all Rome, and that stood in need of Cafars boldnesse and courage to withstand Pompeys greatnesin the commonwealth. Crassus became his surety vnto his greediest creditors for the summe of eight hundred and thirty talents? whereupon they suffered C. esar to depart to the government of his province. In this journey it is reported, that passing ouer the mountaines of the Alpes, they came through a litle poore village that had not many housholds, and yet poore cottages. speeches fitter for a rash light headed youth, then for his person. Howbeit the common people on the other fide, they reioyced. Then Cafar because he would be more assured of Pompeys power and friendship, he gaue him his daughter Iulia in mariage, which was made sure before vnto Seruilius Capio, and promifed him in exchange Pompeys daughter, who was fure also vnto Faustus the sonne of Sylla. And shortly after also, Casar selfe did mary Calphurnia, the daughter of Pifo, whom he caused to be made consull, to succeed him the next yeare following. Cato then cried out with open mouth, and called the gods to witnesse, that it was a shamefull matter, and not to be suffered, that they should in that fort make hanocke of the Empire of Roma, by such horrible bawdy matches, distributing among themselues through those wicked mariages, the gouernements of the provinces, and of great armies. Chalphurnius Bibulus, fellow Confull with Cafar, perceiving that he did contend in vaine, making all the refistance he could to withstand this law, and that oftentimes he was in danger to be flaine with Cato, in the market place and affembly, he kept close in his house all the rest of his Consulship. When Pompey had maried Inlia, he filled all the market place with fouldiers, and by open force authorised the lawes which Cafar madein y behalfe of the people. Furthermore, he procured that Cafar had GAVLE on this fide and beyond the Alpes, and all ILLYRIA, with four legions granted him for fine yeares. Then Cato standing up to speake against it, Cafar bad his officers lay hold on him, and carie him to prison, thinking he would have appealed vnto the Tribunes. But Cato said neuer a word, when he went his way. Cafar perceiuing then, that not onely the Senators and Nobilitie were offended, but that the common people also for the reverence they bare vnto Catoes vertues, were ashamed, and went away with silence; he himselfe fecretly did pray one of the Tribunes that he would take Cato from the officers. But after he had played this part, there were few Senators that would be Præsident of the Senate vnder him, but left the city, because they could not away with his doings. And of them, there was an old man called Confidius, that on a time boldly told him, the rest durst not come to councell, because they were afraid of his souldiers. Cefar answered, him again: and why then, does not thou keepe thee at home, for the same feare? Considius replied, because my age taketh away feare from me for having so short a time to live, I have no careto prolong it further. The shamefullest part that Casar played while he was Confull, seemeth to bethis: when he chose P. Clodius Tribune of the people, that had offered his wife such dishonor, and prophaned the holy ancient mysteries of the women, which were celebrated in his owne house. Clodius sued to be Tribune to no other end, but to destroy Cicero: and Casar selfe also departed not from Rome to his army before he had fetthem together by the eares, and driven Cicero out of ITALY. All these things they say he did, before the warres with the GAVLES. But the time of the great armies and conquests he made a fterwards, and of the war in the which he subdued all the GAVLES (entring into another course of life farre contrary vnto the first) made him to be knowne for as valiant a souldier and as excellent a captain to leade men, as those that afore him had bene counted the wifeft and most valiant Generals that ever were, and that by their valiant deeds had archieued great honour. For who foeuer would compare the house of the Fabians, of the Scipioes, of the Metellians, yea those also of his owne time, or long before him, as Sylla, Marius, thetwo Lucullians, and Pompey felfe:

Whose fame ascendeth up unto the heavens: It will appeare that Cafars prowesse, & deeds of armes, did excell them all together. The one, in the hard countries where he made wars: another, in enlarging the realmes and countries which he joyned vnto the Empire of Rome : another, in the multitude and power of his enemies who he ouercame: another in the rudenesse and austere nature of men with whom he had to do, whose maners afterwards he softned and made civill: another, in courteste and elemencie which he vsed vnto them whom he had conquered: another, in great bounty and liberality bestowed vnto them that served vnder him in those warres: and in fine, he excelled them all in the number of battels he had fought, and in the multitude of his enemies he had flaine in battell. For in leffe then ten yeares warre in GAVLE he tooke by force and affault aboue eight hundred townes, he conquered three hundred seuerall nations: and having before him in battell thirtie hundred thousand souldiers, at fundry times, he slueten hundred thousand of them, and tooke as many more prisoners. Furthermore, he was so entirely beloued of his souldiers, that to do him seruice (where otherwise they were no more then other men in any private quarrell) if Casars honour were touched, they were inuincible, and would so desperately venture themselues, and with such fury, that no man was able to abide them. And this appeareth plainly by the example of Acilius:who in abattel by fea before the city of MARSELLLES, bording one of his enemies ships, one cut off his right hand with a fword; but yet he forfooke not his target which he had in his left hand, but thrust it in his enemies faces, and made them flie, so that he wanne their ship from of acilians them. And Cassus Scena also, in a conflict before the city of Dyrraghivm, having one of his us, and dieves put out with an arrow, his shoulder striken through with a dart, and his thigh with another, wersoibers and having received thirty arrowes vpon his shield, he called to his enemies, & made as though of casars he would yeeld vnto them. But when two of them came running to him, he claue one of their shoulders from his body with his sword, and hurt the other in the face: so that he made him turne his backe, and at the length faued himselfe, by meanes of his companions that came to helpehim. And in BRITAINE also, when the Captaines of the bands were driven into a marrish or bogge full of mire and dirt, and that the enemies did fiercely affaile them there, Cafar then standing to view the battell, he saw a private souldier of his thrust in among the Captaines; and fought to valiantly in their defence that at the length he drauethe barbarous people to flye, and by his meanes faued the Captaines, which otherwise were in great danger to have bene cast away. Then this fouldier being the hindmost man of all the Captains, marching with great paine though the mire and dirt, halfe swimming, and halfe on foote, in the end got to the other side, but lest his shield behind him. Casar wondering at his noble courage, ranne to him with joy to embrace him. But the poore fouldier hanging downe his head, the water standing in his eyes, fell downe at Cafars feete, and befought him to pardon him, for that he had left his target behind him. And in Arrick & alfo, Scipio having taken one of Cafars ships, and Granius Granius Petronius abord on her amongst other, not long before chosen Treasurer; he put all the rest to Petronius. the fword but him, and faid he would give him his life. But Petronius answered him againe, that Cefars fouldiers did not vse to haue their lines ginen them, but to gine others their lines: x and with these words he drew his sword, and thrust himselfe through. Now Casars selfe did breed this noble courage and life in them. First, for that he gaue them bountifully, and old honor them also, shewing therby, that he did not heape up riches in the warres to maintaine his life afterwards in wantonnesse and pleasure, but that he did keepe it in store, honourably to reward their valiant service: and that by so much hethought himselfe rich, by how much he was liberall in rewarding of them that had deserved it. Furthermore, they did not wonder so much at his valiantnesse in putting himselse at every instant in such manifest danger, and in taking so extreme paines as he did, knowing that it was his greedy defire of honour that fet him on fire, and pricked him forward to do it: but that he alwayes continued all labour and hardnesse, more then his body could beare, that filled them all with admiration. For , concerning the constitution of his body, he was leane, white, and foft skinned, and often subject to head-ach, and otherwhile to the falling ficknesse (the which tooke him the first time, as it is reported, in Con- casar had DVBA, a city of SPAINE:) but yettherefore yeelded not to the disease of his body, to make it a shefalling cloake to cherish him withall, but contrarily, tooke the paines of warre, as a medicine to cure his ficke body, fighting alwayes with his difeafe, trauelling continually, liming foberly, and commonly lying abroad in the field. For the most nights he slept in his coach or litter, and thereby bestowed his rest, to make him alwayes able to do something; and in the day time, he would trauell vp and downethe countrey to fee townes, castles, and strong places He had alwayes a secretary with him in the coach, who did still write as he went by the way, and a fouldier behind him that caried his fword. He made such speed the first time he came from Rome, when he had his office, that in eight dayes he came to the riuer of Rhone. He was so excellent a rider of horse from his youth, that holding his hands behind him, he would gallop his horse vpon the spurre. In his warres in GAVLE, he did further exercise himselfe to indite letters as he rode by the way, and did occupy two secretaries at once with as much as they could write: and as Oppin writeth, more then two at a time. As it is reported, that Cafar was the first that deuised friends might talke together by writing cyphers in letters, when he had no leasure to speake with them Thetempefor his vegent businesse, & for the great distance besides from Rome. How little account Casar rance of made of his diet', this example doth proue it. Cafar supping one night in MILLANE with his Galarinhis friend Valerius Leo, there was served Sperage to his boord, and oyle of perfume put into it cafarsiniin stead of fallet oyle. He simply eate it, and found no fault, blaming his friends that were offended: and told them, that it had bene enough for them to have abstained to eate of that they friend.

misliked, and not to shame their friend, and how that he lacked good manners that found fault with his friend. Another time as he trauelled through the country, he was driven by fowle weather on the sudden to take a poore mans cottage, that had but one litle cabin in it, & that was so narrow, that one man could but scarce lye in it. Then he said to his friends that were about him: Greatest roomes are meetest for greatest men, & the most necessary roomes for the sickest perfons. And thereupon he caused Oppius that was sicke to lye there all night: and he himselfe with the rest of his friends, lay without doores, under the easing of the house. The first warre that Cafar made with the Gavles, was with the Helvetians and Tigorinians, who hauing set fire on all their good cities, to the number of twelue, & foure hundred villages besides, came to inuade that part of GAVLE which was subject to the ROMAINES, as the CIMBRI and TEVT ON'S had done before, vnto whom for valiantnesse they gaue no place: and they were alfo a great number of them (for they were three hundred thousand soules in all) whereof there were an hundred, foure score, and ten thousand fighting men. Of those, it was not Cafar himfelfe that ouercame the TIGVRINIANS, but Labienus his Lieutenant, that ouerthrew them hy the river of Arax. But the Helvetians themselves came suddenly with their army to set you him, as he was going towards a city of his confederates. Cafar perceiuing that, made half to ger him some place of strength, and there did set his men in battell ray. When one brought him his horse to get vp on, which he vsed in battell, he said vnto them: When I have ouercome mine enemies, I will then get vp on him to follow the chafe, but now let vs give them charge. Therewith he marched forward on foote, and gaue charge; and there fought it out a long time, beforc he could make them fliethat were in battell. But the greatest trouble he had, was to distresse their campe, and to breake their strength which they had made with their carts. For there, they that before had fled from the battell, did not only put themselues in force, and valiantly fought it out; but their wives and children also fighting for their lives to the death, were all slaine, and the battell was feant ended at midnight. Now if the act of this victory was famous, vnto that he also added another as notable, or exceeding it. For of all the barbarous people that had escaped from this battell, he gathered together againe aboue an hundred thousand of them, and compelled them to returne home into their countrey which they had for saken, and vnto their townes also which they had burnt: because he feared the Germaines would come ouerthe river of Rheyne, and occupie that countrey lying voide. The fecond warre he made, was in desence of the GAVLES against the GERMAINES: although before, he himselfe had caused Ariouistus their king, to be received for a confederate of the Romains. Notwithstanding, they were growne very vnquiet neighbours, and it appeared plainly, that having any occasion of fered them to enlarge their territories, they would not content them with their own, but meant to inuade and possesse the rest of GAVLE. Casar perceiving that some of his Captaines trembled for feare, but specially the young Gentlemen of noble houses of Rome, who thought to have gone to the warres with him, as onely for their pleasure and gaine, the called them to councell, and commanded them that were afraid, that they should depart home, and not put themselves in danger against their wils, sith they had such womanish faint-harts, to shrink when he had need of them. And for himselse, he said, he would set vpon the barbarous people, though he had left him but the tenth legion onely, faying that the enemies were no valianter then the Cim-BRI had bene, nor that he was a Captaine inferiour vnto Marius. This oration being made, the fouldiers of the tenth legion fent their Lieutenants vnto him, to thank him for the good opinion he had of them: and the other legions also fel out with their Captaines, and all of them together followed him many dayes iourney with good will to ferue him, vntill they came within two hundred furlongs of the campe of the enemies. Ariouistus courage was well cooled, when he faw Cafar was come, and that the Romaines came to feeke out the Germaines; where they thought, and made account, that they durst not have abidden them: and therefore nothing mistrusting it would have come so to passe, he wondered much at Casars courage, and the more when he saw his owne army in a maze withall. But much more did their courage fall, by reason of the soolish womens prophesies they had amongst them, which did foretell things to come: who confidering the waves and trouble of the rivers, and the terrible noyse they made running downe the streame, did forwarne them not to fight vntill the new Moone. Casar having intelligence thereof, and perceiving that the barbarous people thereupon stirred not, thought it best then to set vpon them, being discouraged with the superstitious seare, rather then losing time, he should tarie their leisure. So he did skirmish with them even to their forts and litle hils where they lay, and by this meanes provoked them fo, that with great fury they came downe to fight. There he ouercame them in battell, and followed them in chafe, with great flaughter, three hundred furlongs, euen vnto the River of Rheyn: and he filled all the fields thitherto with dead bodies and spoyles. Howbeit Arionistus flying with speed, got ouer King Ario the river of Rheyn, and escaped with a few of his men. It is faid that there were slaine fourcfcore thousand persons at this battell. After this exploite, Casar left his army amongst the Sn- Cesar. QVANES to winter there: and he himfelfe in the meane time, thinking of the affaires at ROME, went ouer the mountaines into GAVLE about the river of Po, being part of his province which he had in charge. Forthere the river called Rubico, devideth the reft of ITALIE from GAVLE on this fide of the Alpes. Cefar lying there, did practife to make friends in Rome, because ma. nv came thither to see him: vnto whom he granted their suites they demanded, and sent them homealfo, partly with liberall rewards, and partly with large promifes and hope. Now during all this conquest of the GAVLES, Pompey did not consider how Cafar enterchangeably did conquer the GAVLES with the weapons of the ROMAINES, and wanne the ROMAINES againe with the money of the GAVLES. Cofar being advertised that the BELGE (which were the warlikest men of all the GAVLES, and that occupied the third part of GAVLE) were all vp in armes, and had raifed a great power of men together; he straight made towards them with all possible speede, and found them spoyling and ouerrunning the countrey of the GAVLBS, their neighbours and confederates of the ROMAINES. So he gaue them battell, and they fighting cowardly, he ouerthrew the most part of them, which were in a troupe together; and slue such the Believe a number of them, that the Romains passed over deepe rivers and lakes on foote, vpon descently their dead hadies, the rivers were so full of them. After this overthrow, they they dead record. their dead bodies, the rivers were fo full of them. After this overthrow, they that dwelt nearest vnto the feafide, and were next neighbours vnto the Ocean, did yeeld themfelues without any compulsion or fight: whereupon, he led his army against the NERVIANS, the stoutch warriers of all the BELGE. They dwelling in the wood countrey, had conueyed their wives, children and goods, into a maruellous great forrest, as farre from their enemies as they could; and warrier of being about the number of fix score thousand fighting men and more, they came one day & set all the Belvpon Cefar, when his armie was out of order, and fortifying of his campe, litle looking to have fought that day. At the first charge, they brake the horsemen of the ROMAINES, and compass fing in the twelfth and feuenth legion, they flue all the Centurions and Captaines of the bands. And had not Cafar felfe taken his shield on his arme, and flying in amongst the barbarous people, made a lane through them that fought before him; and the tenth legion also seeing him in danger, run vnto him from the top of the hill wherethey flood in battell, and broken the rankes of their enemies, there had not a Romain E escaped aliue that day. But taking example of Cafars valiant neffe, they fought desperatly beyond their power, and yet could not make the NER- The Nerve VIANS flie, but they fought it out to the death, till they were all in a maner flaine in the field. It flains by is written that of threefcore thousand fighting men, there escaped onely but five hundred; and cester. of four e hundred Gentlemen and counfellers of the Romain B, but three faued. The Senate vinderstanding it at Rome, ordained that they should do facrifice vinto the gods, and keepe feasts and folemne processions fifteene daies together without intermission, having neuer made the like ordinance at Rome, for any victory that euer was obtained. Because they saw the danger had benemaruellous great, so many nations rising as they did in armes together against him; and further, the love of the people vnto him made his victory much more famous. For whe Cafar had fet his affaires at a ftay in GAVLE, on the other fide of the Alpes, he alwaies vied to lie about the river of Pointhe winter time, to give direction for the establishing of things at Rome, at his pleasure. For, not onely they that made suite for offices at Rome were chosen Magistrates, by meanes of Cafars money which he gaue them, with the which bribing the people, they bought their voices, and when they were in office, did all that they could to increase Casars power and greatnesse: but the greatest and chiefest men also of the Nobility, went into Lyca vinto him. As Pompey Craffus, Appius Prætor of SARDINIA, and Nepos, Proconfull in SPAINE. Infomuch Lords of that there were at one time, fix score sergeants carving rods and axes before the Magistrates; and aboue two hundred Senators befides. There they fell in confultation, and determined that Pom-Pey & Crassias should again be chosen Consuls the next year following. Furthermore, they did appoint, that Cafar should have money againe delivered him to pay his army; and besides, did proroge the time of his government flue yeares further. This was thought a very strange and an vnreasonable matter vnto wise men. For they themselues that had taken so much money of Carfar, perswaded the Senate to let him have money of the common treasure, as though he had had none before: yea to speake more plainly, they compelled the Senate vnto it, fighing and lamenting to fee the decrees they passed. Cato was not there then, for they had purposely sent him before into CYPRVS. Howbeit Faonius that followed Catoes steps, when he saw that he couldnot prevaile, nor withftand them, he went out of the Senate in choler, & cried out among it the peop ble, that it was a horrible shame. But no man did hearke to him; some for the reverence they bare vnto Pompey, and Craffus; and others fauouring Cafars proceedings, did put all their hope and trust in him:and therefore did quiet themselves, and stirred not, Then Cafar returning into GAVIR beyond the Alpes vnto his army, found there a great warre in the countrey. For two great nations of GERMANY had not long before passed over the river of Rheyn, to conquer new lands: & the one of these people were called IPES, & the other TERIDES. Now touching the battel which Cafar fought with them, he himfelfedoth describe it in his Commentaries, in this fort. That the barbarous people having fent Ambassadours vnto him, to require peace for a certaine time, they notwith standing, again st the law of armes, came & set vpon him as he trauelled by the way, infomuch as eight hundred of their men of armes ouerthrew fine thousand of his horsemen, who nothing at all mistrusted their coming. Againe, that they sent him other Ambassadors to mocke him once more: but that he kept them, and therewith caused his whole army to march against them, thinking it a folly, & madnesse, to keep faith with such trayterous barbarous breakers of leagues. Canntins writeth, that the Senate appointing against o do new facrifice, procef. fions, and feasts, to give thankes to the gods for this victorie, Cato was of contrarie opinion, that Cafar should be delinered into the hands of the barbarous people, for to purge their citie and commonwealth of this breach of faith, and to turne the curfe vpon him that was the author of it. Of these barbarous people, which came ouer the Rheyn (being about the number of foure hundred thousand persons) they were all in maner staine, saving a very sew of them, that slying from the battell got ouer the river of Rheyn againe, who were received by the SICAMBRIANS. another people of the Germaines. Cafar taking this occasion against them, lacking no good. wil of himself besides, to have the honor to be counted the first Romaine that ever passed over the river of Rheyn with an armie, he built a bridge ouer it. This river is marvellous broad, and runneth with great furie, and in that place specially where he built his bridge, for there it is of a great breadth from one fide to the other; and it hath fo ftrong and fwift a ftreame befides, that men casting downe great bodies of trees into the river (which the streame bringeth downe with it) did with the great blowes & forcethercof maruellously shake the posts of the bridge he had fet vp. But to preuent the blowes of those trees, and also to breake the furie of the streame, he made a pile of great wood about the bridge a good way, & did forcibly ramme them into the bottome of the river; so that in ten daies space, he had set up and finish his bridge of the goodliest carpenters worke, and most excellent invention to see to, that could be possibly thought or deuised. Then passing ouer his army vpon it, he found none that durst any more fight with him. For the Swevians, which were the warlikest people of all Germany, had gotten themselues with their goods into wonderfull great vallies and bogges, full of woods and forrests. Now when he had burnt all the countrey of his enemies, and confirmed a league with the confederates of the Romaines, he returned backe againe into Gavle after he had taried eighteene dayes at the most in Germany, on the other side of the Rheyn. The journey he made also into England was a noble enterprise, and very commendable. For he was the first that failed the West Ocean with an army by sea, & that passed through the sea Atlanticum with his army to make warre in that fo great and famous Iland (which many ancient writers would not beleeue that it was so indeed, and did make them vary about it, saying it was but a fable and a lie) and was the first that enlarged the Romaine Empire, beyond the earth inabitable. For twice he paffed ouer the narrow sea against the firme land of GAVLE, and fighting many battels there, did hurt his enemies more then inrich his owne men; because, of men hardly brought vp, and poore, there was nothing to be gotten. Whereupon the warre had no fuch successe as he looked for, and therefore taking pledges onely of the King, and imposing a yearely tribute vpon him, to be payed vnto the people of Rome, he returned againe into GAVLE. There he was no fooner landed, but he found letters ready to be fent oner the fea vnto him:

in the which he was aduertifed from Rome, of the death of his daughter, that the was dead with child by Pompey. For the which Pompey, and G. efar both, were maruellous for rowfull: and their of mila cafriends mourned also, thinking that this alliance which maintained the common-wealth (that fart daughotherwife was very tickle) in good peace and concord, was now feuered, and broken afunder, and the rather likely, because the child lived not long after the mother. So the common people at Rome tooke the corps of Iulia, in despite of the Tribunes, and buried it in the field of Mars. Now Cafar being driven to devide his armie (that was very great) in fundry garrifons for the winter time, and returning againe into ITALY as he was wont, all GAVLE rebelled againe, and The rebelhad raised great armies in every quarter to set vpon the Romaines, and to assay if they could lion of the distresse their forts where they lay in garrison. The greatest number and most warlike men of Gaules. thefe GAV LES, that entred into action of rebellion, were led by one Ambiorix: and first did fer vpon the garrifons of Cotta, and Titurius, whom they flue, and all the fouldiers they had about them. Then they went with threefcore thousand fighting men to befiege the garrifons which Tienties, Quintus Cicero had in his charge, and had almost taken them by force, because all the souldiers with their were enery man of them hurt; but they were so valiant and couragious, that they did more then men (as they fay) in defending of themselves. These newes being come to Cesar, who was farre from thence at that time, he returned with all possible speed, and leavying seven thousand fouldiers, made hafte to helpe Cicero that was in fuch diffresse. The GAVLES that did besiege Cicero, vnderstanding of Casars coming, raised their siege incontinently, to go and meete him: making account that he was but a handfull in their hands, they were 10 few. Cafar to deceive them still drew backe, and made as though he fled from them, lodging in places meete for a Captainethat had but a few, to fight with a great number of his enemies; and commanded his men in no wife to stirre out to skirmish with them, but compelled them to raise vp the rampiers of his campe, and to fortifie the gates, as men that were afraid, because the enemies should the leffe effeeme of them: vntill at length he tooke oportunity, by their diforderly coming to affaile the trenches of his campe, (they were growne to fuch a prefumptuous boldnesse and celar state brauerie,) and then fallying out vpon them, he put them all to flight with flaughter of a great the Gaules number of them. This did suppresse all the rebellions of the GAVLES in those parts, and furthermore he himselfe in person went in the middest of winter thither, where he heard they did rebell: for that there was come a new fupply out of ITALY of three wholelegions, in their roome which he had loft: of the which, two of them Pompey lent him, and the other legion he himselfe had leauied in Gavi a about the river Po. During these stirres, brake forth the beginning of the greatest and most dangerous warre that he had in all GAVLE, the which had bene fecretly practifed of long time by the chiefest and most warlike people of that country, who had leauled a wonderfull great power. For every where they leavied multitudes of men, and great riches besides, to fortisse their strong holds. Furthermore, the countrie where they rose, was very ill to come vnto, and specially at that time being winter, when the rivers were frosen, far. the woods and forrests coursed with snow, the medowes drowned with flouds, and the fields fo deepe of fnow, that no wayes were to be found, neither the marrifles nor rivers to be differned, all was fo ouerflowne and drowned with water: all which troubles together were inough (as they thought) to keepe Cafar from fetting vpon the rebels. Many nations of the Gavies were of this conspiracie, but two of the chiefest were the AVERNIANS and CARNVIES: who had chosen Virgingentorix for their Lieutenant Generall, whose father the GAVLES be- Verilingen. fore had put to death, because they thought he aspired to make himselfe king. This Vercingen- toris captorix deuiding his armie into divers parts, and appointing divers Captaines over them, had taine of the gotten to take his part, all the people and countries thereabouts, even as farre as they that dwell *Owards the sea*Adriaticke, having further determined (vnderstanding that Rome did con-Jarspire against Casar) to make al GAV LE rise in armes against him. So that if he had but taried a little that in this longer, vntill Cafar had entred into his civill wars, he had put all ITALY in as great feare and dan-Ser, as it was when the CIMBRI did come and invade it. But Cafar, that was valiant in all affaics and dangers of warre, and that was very skilfull to take time and opportunitie; so soone as he of the dangers of warre, and that was very skilfull to take time and opportunitie; so soone as he of the dangers of warre, and that was very skilfull to take time and opportunitie; so soone as he of the dangers of warre, and that was very skilfull to take time and opportunitie; so soone as he of the dangers of warre, and that was very skilfull to take time and opportunitie; so soone as he of the dangers of warre, and that was very skilfull to take time and opportunitie; so soone as he of the dangers of warre, and that was very skilfull to take time and opportunities. vndcrstood the newes of this rebellion, he departed with speed, & returned backe the selfsame which; to way which he had gone, making the barbarous people know, that they shold deale with an army inuincible, and which they could not possibly with stand, considering the great speed he had some. made with the same, in so sharpe and hard a winter. beleeued, that a post or currer could have come in so short a time from the place where he was vnto them, they wondred when they faw him burning and destroying the countrey, the towns and ftrong forts where he came with his armie, taking all to mercy that yeelded vnto him: you till fuch times as the Henri tooke armes against him, who before were wont to be called the brethren of the ROMAINES, and were greatly honoured of them. Wherefore Cafars men when they understood that they had joyned with the rebels, they were maruelloully fory, & half dif. couraged. Thereupon, Cafar departing from those parts, went through the country of the LIN-GONES, to enter the countrey of the *Byrgonians, who were confederates of the ROMAINS. and the nearest vnto ITALY on that side, in respect of all the rest of GAVLE. Thither the enemics came to fet vpon him, and to enuiron him on all fides, with an infinite number of thousands of fighting men. Cafar on the other fidetaried their coming, and fighting with them a long time. he made them so afraid of him, that at length he ouercame the barbarous people. But at the first. it seemeth notwithstanding, that he had received some overthrow: for the ARVERNIANS she wed a fword hanged vp in one of their temples, which they faid they had won from Cefar. Infomuch as Cafar felfe coming that way by occasion, faw it, and fell alaughing at it. But fome of his friends going about to take it away, he would not fuffer them, but bad them let it alone, and touch it not for it was an holy thing. Notwithstanding, such as at the first had saued themselves by flying, the most part of them were gotten with their king into the city of ALEXIA, the which Cafar went and befreged although it feemed inexpugnable, both for the height of the wals, as alio for the multitude of fouldiers they had to defend it. But now during this fiege, he fell into a maruellous great danger without, almost incredible. For an armie of three hundred thoufand fighting men of the best men that were among all the nations of the GAVLES, came against him being at the fiege of ALEXIA, besides them that were within the citie, which amounted to the number of three core and ten thousand fighting men at the least: so that perceiving he was flut in betwixt two fo great armies, he was driven to fortifie himselfe with two wals, the one against them of the civie, and the other against them without. For if those two armies had ioyned together, Cofar had benevetterly undone. And therefore, this fiege of ALEXIA, and the battell he wan before it, did deferuedly winne him more honour and fame then any other. For there, in that instant and extreme danger, he shewed more valiantnesse and wisdome then he did in any battell he fought before. But what a wonderfull thing was this? that they of the city neuer heard any thing of them that came to nide them, vntill Cefar had ouercome them; and furthermore, that the Romaine's themselves which kept watch vpon the wal that was built against the city, knew also no more of it then they, vntill it was done, and that they heard the cries and lamentations of men and women in ALEXIA, when they perceived on the other fide of the citie fuch a number of gliftering shields of gold and filter, such store of bloudy corslets and armors, fuch a deale of place and moueables, and fuch a number of tents and paullions after the fashion of the GAVLES, which the ROMAINES had gotten of their spoiles in their camp. Thus suddenly was this great armie vanished, as a dreame or vision: where the most part of them were slaine that day in battell. Furthermore, after that they within the citic of ALEXIA had done great hurt to Cefar and themselves also, in the end, they all yeelded themselves. And Vercingentorix (he that was their king and Captaine in all this warre) went out of the gates excellently well armed. and his horse furnished with rich capacifon accordingly, and rode round about Gesar, who sate in his chaire of estate. Then lighting from his horse, he tooke off his caparison and furniture, and vnarmed himselfe, and laid all on the ground, and went and sate downe at Casar feete, and said neuer a word. So Cafar at length committed him as a prisoner taken in the warres, to leade him afterwards in the triumph of Rome. Now Cefar had of long time determined to destroy Pompey, and Pompey him also. For Crassus being killed amongst the PARTHIANS, who onely did see, that one of them two must needs fall, nothing kept Cafar from being the greatest person, but because he destroyed not Pompey, that was the greater: neither did any thing let Pompey to withstad that it should not come to passe, but because he did not first ouercome Casar, whom onely he feared. For till then, Pompey had not long feared him, but alwayes before fet light by him, thinking it an easie matter for him to put him downe when he would, fith he had brought him to that greatnesse he was comevnto. But Cafar contrarily, having had that drift in his head from the beginning, like a wrestler that studieth for trickes to ouershrow his aduersary, he Went farre from Rome, to exercise himselfe in the warres of GAVEE; where he did traine his . army army, and presently by his valiant deeds did increase his same and honour, by these meanes became Cefar as famous as Pompey in his doings, and lacked no more to put his enterprise in execurion, but fome occasions of colour, which Pompey partly gaue him, and partly also the time delivered him, but chiefly, the hard fortune and ill government at that time of the commonwealth at Rome. For they that made fute for honour and offices, bought the voyces of the people The peoples with readie money, which they gaue out openly to viury, without shame or feare. Thereupon royees bought at the common people that had fold their voyces for money, came to the market place at the day of election, to fight for him that had hired them: not with their voyces, but with their bowes, money. flings, and fwords. So that the affembly feldome times brake vp, but the pulpit for Orations was defiled and sprinckled with the bloud of them that were slaine in the market place, the city remaining all that time without gouernment of Magistrate, like a ship left without a Pilote. Infomuch as men of deepe judgement and discretion, seeing such fury and madnesse of the people, thought themselues happy if the commonwealth were no worse troubled then with the abfolute state of a Monarchy and soueraigne Lord to gouernethem. Furthermore, there were many that were not afraid to speake it openly, that there was no other help to remedy the troubles of the commonwealth, but by the authority of one man onely, that should command them all: and that this medicine must be ministred by the hands of him, that was the gentlest Phisition, meaning couertly Pompey. Now Pompey vsed many fine speeches, making semblance as though he would none of it, and yet cunningly vnderhand did lay all the irons in the fire he could, to bringit to passe, that he might be chosen Dictator. Cato finding the marke he shot at, and fearing lest in the end the people should be compelled to make him Dictator, he perswaded the Senate rather to make him fole Conful, that contenting himfelf with that more iust and lawful gouernment, he should not couet the other vnlawfull. The Senate following his counsell, did not onely makehim Confull, but further did proroge his gouernment of the prouinces he had. For he had two prouinces, all Spaine and Africke, the which he gourned by his Lieutenants and fur- pompsy, gother, he received yearely of the common treasure to pay his fouldiers a thousand talents. Hereupon Casar took occasion also to fend his men to make suite in his name for the Consulship, and also to hauethe gouernment of his provinces proroged. Pompey at the first held his peace, But Marcellus and Lentulus (that otherwise hated Casar) withstood them, and to shame and dishonor time to be him, had much needlesse speech in matters of weight. Furthermore they took away the freedom confull, and from the Colonies which Cafar had lately brought vnto the city of Novymcomym in Gavle towards ITALY, where Calar not long before had lodged them. And moreouer, when Marcel-provoged. lus was Confull, he made one of the Senators in that city to be whipped with rods, who came to Rome about those matters; and said, he gaue him those markes, that he should know he was no Romaine citizen, and bade him go his way, and tell Cafar of it. After Marcellus Confulship, Casar setting open his cofers of the treasure he had gotten among the GAVLES, did frankly give it out amongst the Magistrates at Rome, without restraint or spare. First, he set Curio y Tribune better cleare out of debt: and gaue also vnto Paul the Consull a thousand fine hundred talents, with magistrates which mony he built that notable pallace by the market place, called Paules Bafilick, in the place at Rome. of Fuluius Basilick. Then Pompey being afraid of this practise, began openly to procure, both by himselfe & his friends, that they should send Casara successor; and moreover, he sent vnto Casar for his two legions of men of warre which he had lent him., for the conquest of GAVLE. Casar fent him them againe, and gaue every private fouldier, two hundred and fiftie filuer Drachmaes. Now, they that brought these two legions backe from Cesar, gauc out ill and seditious words against him among the people, and did also abuse Pompey with false perswasions and vaine hopes, informing him that he was maruellously defired and wished for in Casars campe: and though in buted by Rome, for the malice and secret spite which the governors there did beare him, he could hard. Satterers. ly obtaine that he defired, yet in GAVLE he might assure himselfe, that all the army was at his commandement. They added further also, that if the fouldiers there did once returne over the mountaines againe into ITALY, they would all straight come to him, they did so hate Cafar, because he wearied them with too much labour and continuall fight: and withall, for that they sufpected he aspired to be king. These words breeding security in Pompey, and a vaine conceit of himselfe, made him negligent in his doings, so that he made no preparation of warre, as though he had no occasion to be afraid: but only studied to thwart Casar in speech, & to crosse the suites hemade. Howbeit Cafar passed not of all this. For the report went, that one of Casars Captaines which was fent to Rome to profecute his fuite, being at the Senate doore, and hearing that they denied to proroge Cafars time of gouernment which he fued for , clapping his hand vpon his fword, he faid: Sith he will not grant it him, this shall give it him. Notwithstanding, the requests that Cafar propounded, caried great femblance of reason with them. For he said, that he was contented to lay downe armes, so that Pompey did the like: and that both of them as private persons should come and make suite of their citizens to obtain honourable recompence: declaring vnto them, that taking armes from him, and granting them vnto Pompey, they did wrongfully accuse him ingoing about to make himselfe a tyrant, and in the meane time to grant the other meanes to be a tyrant. Curio making these offers and persuasions openly before the people, in the name of Cafar, he was heard with great reioycing and clapping of hands, and there was fome that cast flowers and no fegaves you him when he went his way, as they commonly vieto do vnto any man, when he hath obtained victory, and won the games. Then Antonius one of the Tribunes. brought a letter sent from Casar, & made it openly to be read in despite of the Consuls. But Scipio in the Senate, Pompeys father in law, made this motion that if Cofar did not dismisse his armie by a certain day appointed him, the Romains should proclaime him an enemy vnto Rome. Then the Confuls openly asked in the presence of the Senators, if they thought it good that Pompey. should dismisse his army: but few agreed to that demand. After that againe they asked, if they liked that Cafar should dismisse his armie thereto they all in maner answered, yea, yea. But when Antonius requested agains that both of them should lay downe armes, then they were all indifferently of his mind. Notwithstanding, because Scipio did insolently behave himselfe, and Marcellus alfo, who cried, that they must vie force of armes, and not mens opinion against a theese, the Senate role straight vponit without further determination; & men changed apparel through the city because of this diffention, as they vseto do in a common calamity. After that, there came other letters from Cafar, which feemed much more reasonable; in the which he requested that they would grant him GAVLE, that lieth betweene the mountaines of the Alpes and ITA-LIE and ILLYRIA, with two legions onely, and then that he would request nothing else; vntill he made suite for the second Consulship. Cicero the Orator, that was newly come from the gouernment of CILICIA, trauelled to reconcile them together, and pacified rempey the best he could: who told him he would yeeld to any thing he would have him, fo he did let him alone with his army. So Cicero perswaded Casars friends to be contented, to take those two provinces, and fixe thousand men only, that they might be friends and at peace together. Pompey very willingly yeelded vnto it, and granted them. But Lentulus the Confull would not agree to it, but shamefully draue Curio and Antonius out of the Senate: whereby they theselues gaue Casar a happy occasion and colour, as could be, stirring vp his fouldiers the more against them, when he shewed them these two noble menand Tribunes of the people that were driven to slie, disguised like flaues, in a carriers cart. For, they were driven for feare to steale out of Rome, disguised in that maner. Now at that time, Cafar had not in all about him aboue five thousand footmen, and Tribunes of three thousand horsmen: for the rest of his army, he lest on the other side of y mountaines to be brought after him by his Lieutenants. So confidering that for the execution of his enterprise, he should not need so many men of warre at the first, but rather suddenly stealing vpon them, to make them afraid with valiantneffe, taking benefit of the opportunity of time; because he should more easily make his enemies afraid of him coming so suddenly when they looked not for him then he should otherwise distresse them, assayling them with his whole army, in giving them leisure to prouide further for him: he commanded his Captaines and Lieutenants to go before, without any other armor the their fwords, to take the city of ARIMINVM (agreateity of Gavle being the first city men come to, when they come out of GAVLE) with as little bloudshed and tumult, as they could possible. Then committing that force & army he had with him, vnto Hortensius one of his friends, he remained a whole day together, openly in the fight of euery man, to see the sword players handle their weapons before him. At night he went into his lodging, and bathing his bodie a litle, came afterwards into the hall amongst them, and made merrie a while with them, whom be had bidden to supper. Then when it was well forward night, and very darke, he rose from the table, and prayed his company to be merry, and no manto stir, for he would straight come to them againe: how beit he had secretly before commanded a few of his truftiest friends to follow him, not altogether, but some one way, and some another way. He himselfe in the meane time tooke a coach he had hired, and made as though he would have gone fome other way at the first, but sodainly he turned backe againe towards the citie of ARIMINVM. When he was come vnto the litle river of Rubicon, colors which deuided GAVLE on this side the Alpes from ITALIE, he stayed upon a sodaine. For, the doubtfell nearer he came to execute his purpose; the more remorse he had in his conscience; to think what an enterprise he tooke in handland his thoughts also fell out more doubtfull, when he entred inro confideration of the desperatnesse of his attempt. So he fell into many thoughts with himfelfe, and spake neuer a word, waiing sometime one way, sometime another way, and oftenrimes changed his determination contrary to himfelf. So did he talke much also with his friends he had with him, amongst whom was Asinius Pollio, telling him what mischiefes the beginning of this paffage ouer that river would breed in the world, and how much their posterity and they that lived after them, would speake of it in time to come, but at length, casting from him with a noble courage all those perillous thoughts to come, & speaking these words which valiant men commonly fay, that attempt dangerous and desperate enterprises; Aman can be but once undone, The Greek come on, he passed over the river; and when he was come over, he ran with his coach and never flaved for that before day light he was within the city of Ariminum, and tooke it. It is faid, that freeh. Call the night before he passed ouer this river, he dreamed a damnable dreame; that he carnally knew the die. his mother. The city of ARIMINVM being taken, & y rumor therof dispersed through al ITALY the city of euen as if it had bin open war both by fea and land, & as if all the lawes of Rome, together with Ariminum. the extreme bounds and confines of the same had bene broken vp: a man would have said, that seems not onely the men and women for feare, as experience proued at other times, but whole cities dreame. themselves leaving their habitations, fled from one placeto another throughall ITALIE. And Rome it felfe also was immediatly filled with the flowing repaire of all the people their neighbours thereabouts, which came thither from all parts like droues of cattell, that there was nei- profession therofficer nor magistrate that could any more command them by authoritie, neither by any Cafars comipersivation of reason bridle such a confused & disorderly multitude: so that Rome had in manerdestroyed it self for lacke of rule and order. For in all places, men were of contrary opinions, and there were dangerous stirres and tumults every where, because they that were glad of this trouble, could keepe in no certaine place, but running vp and downe the citie, when they met with others in diners places, that feemed either to be afraid or angry with this tumult (as otherwise it is impossible in so great a citie) they flatly fell out with them, and boldly threatned them with that that was to come. Pompey himfelfe, who at that time was not a litle amazed, was yet much more troubled with the ill words some gaue him on the one side, and some on the other. For fome of them reproued him, & faid, that he had done wifely, and had paid for his folly, because he had made Casar sogreat and strong against him and the commonwealth. And other agained id blame him, because he had refused the honest offers and reasonable conditions of peace, which Casar had offered him, suffering Lentulus the Confull to abuse him too much. On the other fide, Phaonius spake vnto him, and bad him stampe on the ground with his foote: for Pompey being one day in a brauery in the Senate, faid openly: Let no man take thought for preparation of warre, for when he lifted, with one stampe of his foote on the ground, he would fill all ITALY with fouldiers. This notwithstanding, Pompey at that time had a greater number of fouldiers then Cafar: but they would neuer let him follow his owne determination. For they brought him so many lies, and put so many examples of feare before him, as if Casar had benealready at their heeles, and had won alkio that in the end he yeelded vnto them, and gaue place to their fury & madnesse, determining (seeing allthings in such tumult and garboile) that there was no way but to forfake the city, & thercupon commanded the Senate to follow him, & not a man pomper flito tary there, ynleffe he loued tyranny more then his own liberty & the comonwealth. Thus the ethiron Colulsthesclues, before they had done their comon facrifices accustomed at their going out of Rome. the city, fled every man of them. So did likewise the most part of the Senators, taking their own things in hast, such as came first to hand, as if by stealth they had taken them from another. And there were some of the also that alwaies loued Cafar, whose wits were the so troubled & besides themselves with the fearethey had conceived, that they also fled, and followed the streame of this tumult, without manifest cause or necessitie. But aboue all things, it was a lamentable sight to fee the city it selfe, that in this feare & trouble was left at all aduenture, as a ship tossed in storme of sea, for saken of her Pylors & despairing of her safety. This their departure being thus miserable, yet men esteemed their banishment (for the loue they bare vnto Pompey) to be their naturall

Labienus Country, and reckened Rome no better then Cafars campe. At that time also Labienus, who was one of Cafars greatest friends, and had bin alwaies vsed as his Lieutenant in the wars of GAVLE and had valiantly fought in his cause, he likewise for sooke him then, and fled vnto Pompey. But Colar fent his mony and cariage after him, and then went and encamped before the city of Con-FINIVM, the which Domitius kept with thirtie cohorts or enfignes. When Domitius faw he was besieged, he straight thought himselfe but vndone; and dispairing of his successe, he bad a Phifitian, a flaue of his, giue him poifon. The Phifitian gaue him a drinke which he dranke, thinking to have died. But shortly after, Domitius hearing them report what clemencie and wonderfull courtefie Cafar vsed vnto them he tooke, repented him then that he had drunke this drinke, and began to lament & bewaile his desperate resolution taken to die. The Phisitian did comfort him againe, and told him that he had taken a drinke, onely to make him fleepe, but not to destroy him. Then Domitius reioyced, and went straight and yeelded himselfe vnto Cafar; who gaue him his life, but he notwithstanding stole away immediatly, and sled vnto Pompey. When these newes were brought to Rome, they did maruelloufly rejoyce and comfort them that ftil remained there: & moreouer there were of them that had for faken Rome, which returned thirher againe. In the meane time Cafar did put all Domitius men in pay, and he did the like through all the cities, where he had taken any Captaines, that leauled men for Pompey. Now Cafar having affembled a great and dreadfull power together, went straight where he thought to find Pompey himselfe. But Pompey taried not his comming, but fled into the citie of BRYNDYSIVM, from whence he had fent the two Confuls before with that army he had, vnto Dyrrac enivm: and he himselfe also went thither afterwards, when he vnderstood that Casar was come, as you shall heare more amply hereafter in his life. Cafar lacked no goodwill to follow him, but wanting Inips to take the feas, he returned forthwith to Rome: forthat in leffe then threefcore dayes he was Lord of all ITALY, without any bloudfied. Who when he was come to Rome, and found it much quietter then he looked for & many Senators there also, he curtously intreated them. and prayed them to fend vnto Pompey, to pacifie all matters between them, vpon reasonable conditions. But no man did attempt it, either becausethey seared Pompey, for that they had forsaken him, or els for that they thought Cafar meant not as he spake, but that they were words of course to colour his purpose withal. And when Metellus also, one of the Tribunes, would not suffer him to take any of the common treasure out of the temple of Saturne, but told him that it was against the law: Tufh, faid he, time of war and law are two things. If this that I do, quoth he, do offend thee, then get thee hence for this time; for warrecannot abide this franke and bold speech. But when warres are done, and that we are all quiet againe, then thou shalt speake in the pulpit what thou wilt: and yet I do tell thee this of fauour, impairing so much my right, for thou art mine. both thou, and all them that have rifen against me, and whom I have in my hands. When he had fpoken thus vnto Metellus, he went to the temple doore where the treasure lay, and finding no keyes there, he caused Smiths to be sent for, and made them breake open the lockes. Metellas thereupon began againe to withstand him, and certain menthat stood by, praised him in his doing:but Cafar at length speaking bigly to him, threatned him, he would kill him presently, if he troubled him any more and told him furthermore. Yong man, quoth he, thou knowest it is harder for me to tel it thee, then to do it. That word made Metellus quake for feare, that he got him away roundly; and euer after that, Casar had all at his commandement for the warres. From thence he went into Spain E, to make warre with Petreius and Varro, Pompeys Licutenants: first to get their armies & Prouinces into his hands which they gouerned, that afterwards he might follow Pompey the better, leaving neuer an enemy behind him. In this journey he was oftentimes himselfe in danger through the ambushes that were layed for him in diucrs strange sorts and places, and likely alfo to have loft all his army for lacke of victuals. All this notwith francing he neuer left following of Pompeys Lieutenants, prouoking them to battell, and intrenching them in, untill he had gotten their campe and armies into his hands, albeit that the Lieutenants themselues fled vnto Pompey. When Casar returned againe to Rome, Piso his father in law gaue him counsell to send Ambassadours vnto Pompey, to treate for peace. But Isauricus, to statter Cafar was against it. Cafar being then created Dictator by the Senate, called home againe all the banished men, and restored their children to honour, whose fathers before had bene slaine in Syllaes time: and did fomewhat cut off the vsuries that did oppresse them; and besides, did make fome fuch other ordinances as those, but very few, For he was Dictator but eleuen dayes onely, and then did yeeld it vp of himfelfe, and made himfelfe Confull with Servilius Haurieus, and after that determined to follow the warres. Al the rest of his armie he left coming on the way behind him, and went himselfe before with fixe hundred horse, and flue legions only of footmen, confuts. in the winter quarter, about the moneth of Ianuarie, which after the ATHENIANS is called Pafidion. Then having past over the sea Ionium, and landed his men, he wanne the cities of ORI- Getirgo-CVM and APOLLONIA. Then he fent his ships backe again vnto BRVNDV SIVM to transport the chinisthe kindome of rest of his fouldiers that could not come with that speed he did. They as they came by the way, Epirus. (like men whose strength of body, and lustie youth was decayed) being wearied with so many fundry battels as they had fought with their enemies, complained of Cafar in this fort. To what Complaines end and purpose doth this man hale vs after him, vp and downe the world, vsing vs like slaues fouldiers and drudges? It is not our armour, but our bodies that beare the blowes away; and what, shall arging weneuer be without our harnesse on our backs, and our shields on our armes? should not Cefar Cefar thinke, at the leaft when he feeth our bloud and wounds, that we are all mortall men, and that wefeelethe mifery and paines that other men do feele; and now even in the dead of winter, he putteth vs vnto the mercie of the sea and tempest, yea which the gods themselves cannot withfland, as if he fled before his enemies, and purfued them not. Thus spending time with this talke, the fouldiers ftil marching on, by fmall journeys came at length vnto the city of Bryndysivm. But when they were come, and found that Calar had already passed ouer the sea, then they ftraight changed their complaints and minds. For they blamed themselues, and tooke on also with their captaines, because they had not made them make more hast in marching: and sitting vpon the rocks and cliffes of the fea, they looked ouer the maine fea, to wards the realme of Ep 12 Rvs, to fee if they could differne the ships returning backe, to transport them ouer. Cafar in the meane time being in the city of Apollonia, having but a finall armie to fight with pomper, it grieued him for that the rest of his army was so long of coming, not knowing what way to take. In the end he followed a dangerous determination, to imbarke vnknowne in a little pinnace of Arms! 12 oares only, to passe ouer the sea againe vnto BRVNDV SIVM, the which he could not do with- adventure outgreat danger, confidering that all that sea was full of Pompeys ships and armies. So he tooke of cefar. ship in the night, apparelled like a slaue, and went aboord vpon this litle pinnace, and said neuer aword, as if he had bene fome poore man of meane condition. The pinnace lay in the mouth of the river of Anius, the which commonly was wont to be very calme and quiet, by reason of a litlewind that came from the shore, which every morning drave back the waves far into the main fea. But that night (by ill fortune) there came a great wind from the fea, that oucreame the land wind, informuch as the force & ftrength of the river fighting against the violence of the rage and waues of the fea, the encounter was maruellous dangerous, the water of the river being driven back, & rebounding vpward, with great noise and danger in turning of the water. Thereupon the Master of the pinnace seeing he could not possibly get out of y mouth of this river, bad the mariners to cast about againe, & to return against the streame. Casar hearing that straight discouered himselfe vnto the Master of the pinnace, who at the first was amazed when he saw him; but Cafar the taking him by the hand, faid vnto him, good felow, be of good cheere, & forwards hardily, feare not, for thou hast Cejar & his fortune with thee. Then the mariners forgetting y danger of iftorme they were in laid on load with oares, & labored for life what they could againft the wind, to get out of the mouth of this river. But at length, perceiving they laboured in vaine, and that the pinnace took in abundance of water, and was ready to finke, cofar then to his great griefe was driven to returne backe againe: who when he was returned vnto his campe, his fouldiers came in great companies vnto him, and were very fory, that he mistrusted he was not able with them alone to ouercome his enemies, but would put his person in danger to go fetch them that were absent, putting no trust in them that were present. In the meane time Antonius arrived. and brought with him the rest of his army from BRVNDVSIVM. Then Cafar finding himselfe frombles in strong enough, went and offered Pompey battell, who was passingly well lodged, for victualling of his campe both by fea and land. Cafar on the other fide, who had no great plentie of victuals at the first, was in a very hard case insomuch as his mengathered rootes, and mingled them with milke, and eate them. Furthermore, they did make bread of it also, & sometime when they skirmissed with the enemies, and came along by them that watched and warded, they cast of their breadinto their trenches, and saidthat as long as the earth brought forth such fruits, they would neuer leane befieging of Pompey. But Pompey straightly comanded them, that they should neither IVLIVS CÆSAR. . 730 cary those words not bread into their campe, fearing least his mens hearts would faile them, and that they would be afraid when they should thinke of their enemies hardnes, with whom they had to fight, fith they were wearie with no paines, no more then bruite beafts. Cefars men did daily skirmish hard to the trenches of Pompeys campe, in the which Casar had cuer the better, sa. uing once onely, at which time his men fled with fuch fe are, that all his campe that day was in great hazard to have bin cast away. For Pompey came on with his battell vpon them, and they were not able to abide it, but were fought with, and driven into their campe, and their trenches were filled with dead bodies, which were flaine within the very gate & bulwarks of their camp. they were so valiantly pursued. Casar stood before them that fled, to make them to turne head againe, but he could not prevaile. For when he would have taken the enfignes to have flaved them, the enfigne-bearers threw them downe on the ground: so that the enemies tooke two and thirtie of them, and Cesars selfe also escaped hardly with life. For striking a great bigge souldier that fled by him, commanding him to fray, and turne his face to his enemie: the fouldier being affraid, lift vp his fword, to strike at Cafar. But one of Cafars pages preventing him, gave him such a blow with his fword, that he strake off his shoulder. Cafar that day was brought vnto so great extremity, that (if Pompey had not either for feare, or spiteful fortune, left off to follow his victorie, and retired into his campe, being contented to have driven his enemies into their campe) returning to his campe with his friends, he faid vnto them: The victory this day had bene our enemies, if they had had a Captaine that could have told how to have overcome. So when he was come to his lodging, he went to bed, and that night troubled him more then any night that ever he had. For still his mind ranne with great forrow of the foule fault he had committed inleading of his armie, of selfe-will to remaine there so long by the sea side, his enemies being the stronger by sea, considering that he had before him a goodly countrey, rich and plentifull of all things, and goodly cities of Macedon and Thessaly: and had not the wit to bring the warre frothence, but to lose his time in a place, where he was rather besieged of his enemies for lacke of victuals, then that he did befiege them by force of armes. Thus fretting and chaffing to fee himselfe so straighted with victuals, and to thinke of his ill lucke, he raised his campe, intending to go set vpon Scipio, making account, that either he should draw Pompey to battell against his will, when he had not the sea at his backe to furnish him with plentie of victuals; or elie that he should easily ouercome Scipio, finding him alone, vnlesse he were aided. This remoue of Casars campe, did much encourage Pompeys army and his Captaines, who would needs in any case haue followed after him, as though he had bene ouercome, and had fled. But for Pompey himselfe, he would in no respect hazard battell, which was a matter of so great importance. For finding himselse so well prouided of all things necessary to tary time, he thought it better to draw this warre out in length, by tract of time, the rather to confume this litle strength that remained in Cafars army: of the which, the best men were maruellous well trained, and good souldiers, and for valiantnesse at one dayes battell, were in comparable. But on the other side againe, to remoue here and there fo oft, and to fortifie their camp where they came, and to befrege any wal, or to keepe watchall night in their armour; the most part of them could not do it, by reason of their age, being then vnable to away with their paines, so that the weaknes of their bodies did also take away the life and courage of their hearts. Furthermore, there fell a pestilent disease among them that came by ill meates hunger draue them to eate. Yet was northis the worst: for befides, he had no store of money, neither could tell how to come by victuals; fo that it feemed in all likelihood, that in very short time he would come to nothing. For these respects, Pompey would in no case fight, and yet had he but Cato onely of his mind in that, who stucke in it the rather, because he would avoide shedding of his countrimens bloud. For when Cato had viewed the dead bodies flaine in the campe of his enemies, at the last skirmish that was betweene them, the which were no lesse then a thousand persons, he couered his face, and went away weeping. All other but he, contrarily fell out with him, and blamed him, because he so long refrained from battell: and some prickt him forward, and called him Agamemnon, and king of kings, say. ing that he delayed this war in this fort, because he would not leave his authority to command them all, and that he was glad alwaies to fee many Captaines round about him, which came to ailed sga- his lodging to honour him, & wair vpon him. And Faonius also a hare-braind fellow, frantickly counterfeiring the round and plaine speech of Cate, made as though he was maruellous angrie, and laid: Is it not great pitie, that we shall not eate this yeare of Tys Cy Ly M figs & all for Pompeys ambitious ambitious mind to reignealone; and Afranius, who not long before was but lately come out of Spain B (where because he had but ill fuccesse, he was accused of treason, that for money he had fold his armie vnto Cafar) he went bufily asking, why they fought not with that Merchant, vnto whom they faid he had fold the province of SPAINE : So that Pompey with these kinds of freeches against his will, was driven to follow Cafar to fight with him. Then was Cafar at the first, maruellously perplexed and troubled by the way, because he found none that would give him any victuals, being despiled of enery man, for the late losse and overthrow he had received. But after he had taken the citie of GOMPHES in THESSALY, he did not onely meet with plentic of victuals to relieue his army with bur he strangely also did rid them of their disease. For the Gomphesinfouldiers meeting with plenty of wine, drinking hard, and making merry, drauc away the infe- Thefaty. ction of the peftilece. For they disposed themselves vnto dancing, masking & playing the BAC. CHERIANS by the way, infomuch that drinking drunke they ouercame their diffeafe, and made their bodies new again. When they both came into the country of PHARSALIA, & both camps lay before each other, Pompey returned agains to his former determination, and the rather, because he had ill signes and tokens of misfortune in his sleepe. For he thought in his sleepe, that Fombers when he entred into the Theater, all the Romain's received him with great clapping of hands. dramein Whereuponthey that were about him grew to fuch boldnesse and securitie, assuring themselves The security of victorie, that Domitius, Spinther and Scipio in a brauerie contended betweene themselves of the postfor the chiefe Bishopricke which Cafar had. Furthermore, there were divers that sent vnto Perant. Rome to hire the nearest houses vnto the market place, as being the fittest places for Prætors, and Confuls; making their account alreadie, that those offices could not scape them, inconsinently after the warres. But befides those, the young Gentlemen, and ROMAINE knights were maruellous desirous to fight, that were brauely mounted, and armed with glistering gilt armors their horses fat and very finely kept, and themselues goodly yong men, to the number of seuen thousand, where the Gentlemen of Casars side were but one thousand onely. The number of his footemen also were much after the same reckening. For he had five and fortic thousand a- Fompeys gainst two and twentiethousand. Wherfore Casar called his souldiers together, and told them armide how Cornificius was at hand who brought two whole legions, and that he had fifteene enfignes led by Calenus, the which he made to stay about MEGARA & ATHENS. Then he asked them, if they would tary for that aid or not, or whether they wold rather themselues alone venture battell. The fouldiers cried out to him, & prayed him not to defer battel, but rather to denife some fetch to make y enemy fight as foon as he could. Then as he facrificed vnto the gods, for the purifying of his army, the first beast was no sooner facrificed, but his soothsayer assured him that he should fight within three daies. Cofar asked him again, if he faw in the facrifices, any luckie figne ortoke of good luck. The foothfayer answered: For that, thou shalt answer thy self, better then I can do: for the gods do promise vs a maruellous great change & alteratio of things that are now, vnto another cleane cotrary. For if thou beest well now, doest thou think to have worse fortune hereafter; and if thou be ill, affure thy selfthou shalt have better. The night before the battell, as he went about midnight to visite the watch, men saw a great firebrad in the element, al of a light feme in the fire, that came ouer Cafars campe, and fell down in Pompeys. In the morning also when they re-element, lieued the watch, they heard a false alarme in the enemies campe, without any apparent cause: which they comonly call a fod ain feare, that makes men befides themselves. This not with standing, Cafar thought not to fight that day, but was determined to have raised his campe from thence, and to have gone towards the city of Seoty shand his tents in his campe were already ouerthrowne when his scouts came in with great speed, to bring him newes that his enemies were preparing themselues to fight. Then was he very glad, and after he had made his prayers Vnto the gods to helpe him that day, he fet his men in battell ray, and deuided them into three squadrons, giving the middle battell vnto Domitius Calvinus, and the left wing vnto Antonius, order of and placed himselfe in the right wing, chusing his place to fight in the tenth legion. But seeing that against that, his enemies had set all their horsemen, he was halfe afraid when he saw the of that a great number of them, and fo braue besides. Wherfore he closely made fixe ensignes to come in. from the rereward of his battell, whom he had laid as an ambush behind his right wing, having first appointed his soldiers what they should do, when the horsmen of the enemies came to give Pempers them charge. On the other fide, Pompey placed himselfe in the right wing of his battell, gaue the army and left wing vnto Domitius, & the middle battel vnto Scipio his father in law. Now all the ROMANE buorder knights (as we have told you before) were placed in the left wing of purpose to enuiron Callare right wing behind & to give their hotest charge there, where the general of their enemies was making their account, that there was no squadron of footinen, how thicke soeuer they were that could receive the charge of fo great a troupe of horsemen, and that at the first onset they should ouerthrow them all, and march youn their bellies. When the trumpets on either fide did found the alarme to the battell, Pompey commanded his footemen that they should stand still withour flirring to receive y charge of their enemies, vntill they came to throwing of their darts. Wherfore Cafar afterwards faid, that Pompey had committed a foule fault, not to confider that the charge which is given running with fury, besides that it giveth the more strength also vnto their blowes doth fet mens hearts also on fire for the common hurling of all the souldiers that runne together, is vnto them as a boxe on the eare that fets men on fire. Then Cafar making his battell march forward to give the onset, saw one of his Captaines (a valiant man, and very skilfull in warre, in whom he had also great confidence) speaking to his souldiers that he had under his charge, encouraging them to fight like men that day. So he called him aloud by his name, and faid vnto him: Well, Cains Crasinius, what hope shall we haueto day? how are we determined, to fight it out manfully? Then Crassinius casting up his hand, answered him aloud: This day, of Cafar, we shall have a noble victory, and I promise thee ere night thou shalt praise me alive or dead. When he had told him fo, he was himself the foremost man that gaue charge vpon his enemies, with his band following of him, being about fixe fcore men; and making a lane through the foremost rankes, with great slaughter he entred farre into the battell of his enemies, vntill that valiantly fighting in this fort, he was thrust in at length into the mouth with a fword, that the point of it came out agains at his necke. Now the footnen of both battels being come to the fword, the horfmen of the left wing of Pompey did march as fiercely also, spreading out their troupes, to compasse in the right wing of Casars battell. But before they began to give charge, the fixe enfignes of footmen which Cafar had laid in ambush behind him, they began to run full vpon them, not throwing away their darts far off, as they were wont to do, neither firiking their enemies on the thighes nor on the legges, but to feeke to hit them ful in the eyes, and to hurt them in the face, as Cafar had taught them. For he hoped that these lusty yong gentlemen that had not bene often in the warres, nor were vied to fee themselues hurt, and the which, being in the prime of their youth and beautie, would be afraid of those hurts, as well for the feare of the present danger to be flaine, as also for that their faces should not for euer be deformed. As indeed it came to passe, for they could never abide that they should come so neere their faces with the points of their darts, but hung downe their heads for feare to be hit with them in their eyes, and turned their backes, couering their face, because they should not be hurt. Then, breaking of themselues, they began at length cowardly to flie, and were occasion also of the losse of all the rest of Pompeys armie. For they that had broken them, ranne immediatly to fet voon the squadron of the footmen behind, and slue them. Then Pompey seeing his horsemen from the other wing of his battell, fo scattered and dispersed, flying away, forgat that he was any more Pompey the Great, which he had bene before, but was rather like a man whose wits the gods had taken from him being afraid and amazed with the flaughter fent from aboue, and fo retired into his tent, speaking neuer a word, & fate there to see the end of this battell, vntill at the length all his armie being ouerthrowne and put to flight, the enemies came, and got vp vpon the rampiers and defence of his campe, and fought hand to hand with them that flood to defend the same. Then as a man come to himselfe againe, he spake but this only word: What, even into our campe. So in haft, casting off his coate-armour and apparell of a Generall, he shifted him, and put on such as became his miserable fortune, and so stole out of his campe. Furthermore, what he did after this ouerthrow, and how he had put himselfe into the hands of the ÆGYPTIANS, by whom he was miserably flain, we have set it forth at large in his life. Then C.efar entring into Pompeys campe, and seeing the bodies layed on the ground that were slaine, and others also that were a killing, said, fetching a great figh. It was their own doing, and against my will. For Caius Cafar, after he had wonne so many famous conquests, and ouercome so many great battels, had bene vtterly condemned notwithstanding, if he had departed from his armie. A sinius Pollio writeth, that he spake these words then in Latin, which he afterwards wrote in Greeke; and faith furthermore, that the most part of them which were put to the sword in the campe, were flaues and bondmen, and that there were not flaine in all this battell aboue fixe thousand souldiers. As for them that were taken prisoners, cefar did put many of them amongst his legions, and did pardon also many men of estimation, among whom Brutus was one, that afterwards flue Cafar himfelfe; and it is reported, that Cafar was very fory for him, when he could fine cafar not immediatly be found after the battel, & that he reioyced againe when he knew he was aliue, taken prife. and that he came to yeeld himselfe vnto him. Casar had many signes and tokens of victory beforethis battel, but the notablest of al other that happened to him, was in the city of TRALLES. Pharfalia. For in the temple of victory, within the same city, there was an image of Cafar, and the earth all signes and about it very hard of it selfe, and was paued besides with hard stone; and yet some say that there colorise fprang vpa palme hard by the base of the same image. In the citie of PADVA, Caius Cornelius an story. excellent Southfayer, (a countriman and friend of Titus Liuius the Historiographer) was by chance at that time fer to behold the flying of birds. He (as Linie reporteth) knew the very time nellus an when the battell began, and told them that were present, Euen now they give the onset on both fides, and both armies do meete at this inftant. Then fitting downe againe to confider of the birds, after he had bethought him of the fignes, he fodainly rose vp on his feete, and cried out as a man possessed with some spirit: O Casar the victory is thine. Euery man wondering to see him, he tooke the crowne he had on his head, and made an oath that he would neuer put it on againe, till the event of his prediction had proved his art true. Livie testifieth, that it came so to passe. Ca-Grafterwards giving freedome vnto the THESSALIANS, in respect of the victory which he wan in their country, he followed after Pompey. When he came into Asia, he gaue freedome also vnto the GVIDIANS for Theopompus fake, who had gathered the fables together. He did release Asia also, the third part of ftribute which the inhabitants paid vnto the Romains. The he came into ALEXANDRIA after Pompey was flaine: and detelted Theodotus that presented him Pompeys head, and turned his head afide because he would not see it. Notwithstanding, he tooke his seale, & beholding it, wept. Furthermore, he courteously vsed all Pompeys friends and familiars, casars dewho wandring vp and downe the country, were taken of the king of ÆGYPT, and wan them all mene: in to be at his commandement. Continuing these courtesies, he wrote vnto his friends at Rome, that the greatest pleasure he took of his victory, was, that he daily saued the lines of some of his countrimenthat bare armes against him. And for the war he made in ALEXANDRIA, some say, he needed not to have done it, but that he willingly did it for the love of Cleopatra; wherein he wan of Cefars litle honor, and besides did put his person in great danger. Others do lay the fault vpon the king warrein of Ægypis ministers, but specially on Pothinus & Eunuch, who bearing the greatest sway of all the kings feruants, after he had caused Pompey to be flaine, and driven Cleopatra from the court, Postinus secretly laid wait all the waies he could, how he might likewise kill Cafar. Wherefore Cafar hea- the Eunuch ring an inckling of it, began thenceforth to spendall the night long in feasting & banqueting, that his person might be in the better safetie. But besides all this, Pothinus the Eunuch spake many besides. things openly not to be borne, only to shame Casar, & to stir vp the people to enuic him. For he made his soldiers have the worst & oldest wheat that could be gotten: then if they did coplaine of it, he told them they must be contented, seeing they eate at another mans cost. And he would serue them also at the table in treene & earthen dishes, saying, that casar had away all their gold and silver, for a debt that the kings father (that then raigned) did owe vnto him; which was, a thousand seuen hundred & fifry Myriades, wherof Casar had before forgiue seuen hundred and fiftie thousand vnto his children. Howbeit then he asked a million to pay his fouldiers withall. Thereto Pothinus answered him, that ar that time he should do better to follow his other causes ofgreaterimportace, & afterwards that he should at more leisure recouer his debt with the kings good will and fauor. Cafar replied vnto him, & faid, that he would not aske counsell of the Æ-GYPTIANS for his affaires, but wold be paid: and therupon secretly sent for Cleopatra, which was in the country, to come vnto him. She only taking Apollodorus Sicilian of all her friends, took cane to a litle bote, & went away with him in it in the night; and came & landed hard by the foot of the Cafar. castell. Then having no other meane to come into the court without being knowne, she laid her trusted >p felfe downe vpon a mattreffe or flockbed, which Apollodorus her friend tied & bound vptogether in a matlike a bundle with a great leather thong, & fo took her vpon his backe & brought her thus hampered in this fardle vnto Casar in at the castle gate. This was y first occasion (as it is reported) that to Casar, made Casar to loue her but afterwards, when he saw her sweet couer sation & pleasant entertain. ppin apelment, he fell then in further liking with her, & did reconcile her again vnto her brother the king, backe. with condition, that they two loyntly should reigne together. Vpon this new reconciliation, 734 a great feast being prepared, a slaue of Cafars that was his barber, the fearfullest wretch that lived fill bufily prying and liftening abroad in every corner, being miftruftfull by nature, found that Pothinus and Achillus did lie in waite to kill his mafter Cafar. This being proued vnto Cafar, he did fet fuch fure watch about the hall, where the feast was made, that in fine, he flue the eunuch Pothinus himselfe. Achillas on the other side, saued himself, and sled vnto the kings campe, where he raifed a maruellous dangerous and difficult warre for Cafar: because he having then but a few men about him, was to fight against a great and strong citie. The first danger he fell into, was the want of water: for that his enemies had stopped the mouth of the pipes, the which conueyed the water into the castell. The second danger he had, was, that seeing his enemies came to take his ships from him, he was driven to repulse that danger with fire, the which burnt the arfenal where the ships lay, & that notable library of ALEXANDRIA withal. The third danger was in the battel by feathat was fought by the tower of Phas; where meaning to helpe his men that fought by fea, he leapt from the peere into a boate. Then the ÆGYPTIAN'S made towards him with their oares on cuery fide: but he leaping into the fea, with great hazard faued himselfe by swimming. It is said, that then holding divers books in his hand, he did never let the go, but kept them alwayes vpon his head aboue water, and fwam with the other hand, not withstanding that they shot maruellously at him, and was driven sometime to ducke into the water: howbeit y boate was drowned presently. In fine the king coming to his methat made war with Cafar, he went against him, and gaue him battell, and wan it with great slaughter, and effusion of Cafar made bloud. But for the King, no man could ever tel what became of him after. The rupon Cafar made Cleopatra his fifter, Queen of AGYPT, who being great with child by him, was fhortly brought to bed of a fon, who the ALEXANDRIAN'S named Cafarion. From thence he went into Syria, and fo going into As IA, there it was told him that Domitius was overthrown in battell, by Pharmaces the fon of king Mithridates, and was fled out of the Realme of Pont with a few men with him. and that this king Pharnaces greedily following his victory, was not contented with the winning of BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA, but further would needs attempt to win ARMENIA the leffe. procuring all those Kings, Princes, & Gouernors of the prouinces thereabouts to rebel against the Romains. Therupon calar went thither straight with three legions, & fought a great battell with king Pharnaces by the city of Z = 1.4, where he flue his army, and draue him out of althe Realme of Pont. And because he would aduertise one of his friends of the sodainnesse of this victory, he onely wrote three words vnto Anitius at Rome: Veni, Vidi, Vici: to wit, I came, I faw. I our came. These three words ending all with like found and letter in the Latine, have a certain short grace more pleasant to the earc, then can be well expressed in any other tongue. After this he returned againe into ITALY, & came to Rome, ending his yeare for the which he was made Dictator the fecond time, which office before was neuer granted for one whole yeare, but vnto him. Then was he chosen Conful for the yeare following. Afterwards he was very il spokon of, for that his fouldiers in a mutiny having flaine two Prætors, cofconius and Galba, he gave them no other punishment for it, but in stead of calling them soldiers, he named them citizens, & gaue Vnto euery one of them a thousand Drachmaes a man, and great possession ITALY. He was much missiked also for the desperate parts and madnesse of Dolabella, for the couetousnesse of Anitius, for the drunkennesse of Antonius and Cornisicius; which made Pompeys house be pulled downe and builded up againe, as a thing not big inough for him, wherwith the Romains were maruelloufly offended. Cafar knew all this well inough, and would have bene contented to have redressed them: but to bring his matters to passe, he precented he was driue to serue his turneby fuch inftruments. After the battell of Pharfalia, Cato and Scipio being fled into Africke, king Iuba ioyned with them, and leauied a great puitfant army. Wherefore Cafar determined to make war with them: and in the middest of winter, he tooke his journy into Sieil B. There, because he would take all hope from his captaines & fouldiers to make any long abode there, he went and lodged ypon the very fands by the feafide, & with the next gale of wind that came, he tooke the fca with three thousand footmen, & a few horsmen. Then having put the a land, vnwares to them he hoifed faile againe to fetch the reft of his army, being afraid left they shold meete with some danger in passing ouer, and meeting them mid way, he brought them all into his campe. Where, when it was told him, that his enemies trusted in an anciet Oracle, which said, that it was predestined vnto the family of the Scipices to be conquerous in Africa: either of purpose to mocke Scipio the Generall of his enemies, or otherwife in good earnest to take the benefit of this name (giuen

(given by the Oracle) vnto himself, in all the skirmishes and battels fought, he gave the charge of his army vnto a man of meane quality and account, called Scipio Salutius, who came of the race of Scipio African, and made him alwaies General when he fought. For he was effoones compelled to wearie and harry his enemies: for that neither his men in his campe had corne inough. nor the beafts forrage, but the fouldiers were driven to take sea weeds, called Alga: and (washing coffer away the brakishnessethereof with fresh water, putting to it a litle herb called dogstooth) to cast troubles in away the blaking chethere to cate. For the Nemidians (which are light horsmen, & very ready of fer- Alga and uice) being a great number together, would be on a sodaine in euery place, & spread all v fields. dogs tooth ouer therabout, so that no man durst peepe out of the campto go for forrage. And one day as the men of armes were staying to behold an African doing notable things in dancing & playing with the flute(they being let down quietly to take their pleasure of the view thereof, hauing in the meane time given their flaves their horses to hold) the enemies stealing sodainly vpon them, finke. compassed them in round about, & slue a number of them in the field, and chasing the other also that fled, followed them pel melinto their camp, Furthermore, had not Cefar himself in person, and Asiniw Pollio with him, gone out of the campe to the rescue, and staid them that sled, the war that day had bin ended. There was also another skirmish where his enemies had the vpper hand, in the which it is reported, that Cafar taking the enfigne bearer by the collar that caried the Eagle in his hand, staid him by force, and turning his face, told him see, there be thy enemies. These aduantages did lift vp Scipioes heart aloft, and gaue him courage to hazard battel; and leaving Afranius on the one hand of him, and king Iuba on the other hand, both their campes lying neare together, he did fortifie himself by y city of THAP SACVS, aboue the lake, to be a saferefuge for the all in this battel. But whilft he was busie intrenching of himselfe, Cafar having maruellous speedily passed through a great country ful of wood, by by-paths which men would neuer haue mistrusted: he stole vpon some behind, and sodainly assailed the other before, so that he ouerthrew them all, and made them flie. Then following the first good hap he had, he went forthwith to set vpon the campe of Afranius, the which he tooke at the first onset, & the campe of the NNMIDI- Capital Ans also, king Iuba being fled. Thus in a litle peece of the day only, he tooke three camps, & flue great vififty thouland of his enemies, and lost but fifty of his souldiers. In this fort is set down the effect final loss. of this battel by some writers. Yet others do write also, that Casar self was not there in person at the execution of this battel. For as he did fet his men in battel ray, the falling fickneffe took him, bled with wherunto he was given; and therfore feeling it coming, before he was ouercome withall, he was the falling caried into a castell not far from thence where the battel was fought, & there took his rest til the extremity of his disease had left him. Now for the Prætor & Consulsthat scaped from this battel, many of them being taken prisoners, did kil themselues, & others also Casar did put to death: but he being specially desirous of all men els to haue Cato aliue in his hands, he went with al posfible speed vnto the city of Vrica, whereof Cato was gouernour, by means wherof he was not at the battell. Notwithstanding being certified by the way, that Cato had slaine himself with his owne hands, he then made open shew that he was very for it, but why or wherfore, no man casar was could tell. But this is true, that Cafar faid at that present time: O Cato, I enuy thy death, because, for the thou didft enuy my glory to faue thy life. This notwithstanding, the booke that he wrote afterwards against Cato being dead, did shew no very great affection nor pitifull heart towards him. Celar wrote For how could he have pardoned him, if living he had had him in his hands, that being dead did against cafor how could he haue pardoned him, it itting he had had him in his hands, that being dead the spans fpeake fovehemently against him? Notwithstading, men suppose he would have pardoned him, dead. if he had taken him aliue, by the clemency he shewed vnto Gicero, Brutus, and diverse others that had borne armes against him. Some report, that he wrote that booke, not so much for any privat malice he had to his death, as for civil ambition, vpon this occasion. Cicero had written a book in praise of Cato, which he intituled, Cato. This book in likelihood was very well liked of, by reason wrote a of the eloquence of the Orator that made it, & of the excellent subject thereof. Cefar therewith books in was maruelloufly offended, thinking thatto praife him, of whose death he was author, was euen praife of Cate being so much as to accuse himselse; and therfore he wrote a letter against him, & heaped vp a number dead, of accusations against Cato, & intituled the booke Anticaton. Both these books have favorers vnto this day, some defending the one for the loue they beare to Casar, & others allowing y other for Carous fake. Cafar being now returned out of AFRICK, first of almade an oratio to the people wherinhe greatly praised & comeded this his last victory, declaring vnto the, that he had coquered so many courries vnto the Empire of Rome, that he could furnish the comonwealth yearly

knights (as we hauntold you before) were placed in the left wing of purposeto enuiron casari right wing behind, & to gine their hotelt charge there, where the general of their enemies was: making their account, that there was no fquadron of footnien, how thicke foeuer they were that could receive the charge of fo great a troupe of horsemen, and that at the first onset they should ouerthrow them all, and march vpon their bellies. When the trumpets on either fide did found the alarme to the battell, Pompey commanded his footemen that they should stand still without stirring to receive y charge of their enemies, vntill they came to throwing of their darts. Wherfore Cafar afterwards faid, that Pompey had committed a foule fault, not to confider that the charge which is given running with fury, befides that it giveth the more strength also vnto their blowes, doth fet mens hearts also on fire for the common hurling of all the souldiers that runne together, is vnto them as a boxe on the eare that fets men on fire. Then Cafar making his battell march forward to give the onset, saw one of his Captaines (a valiant man, and very skilfull in warre, in whom he had also great confidence) speaking to his fouldiers that he had under his charge, encouraging them to fight like men that day. So he called him aloud by his name, and faid vnto him: Well, Cains Crassinius, what hope shall we haueto day? how are we determined. to fight it out manfully? Then Crassinius casting vp his hand, answered him aloud: This day, ô Cafar, we shall have a noble victory, and I promise thee ere night thou shalt praise me alive or dead. When he had told him fo, he was himself the foremost man that gaue charge vpon his enemics, with his band following of him, being about fixe fcore men, and making a lane through the foremost rankes, with great slaughter he entred farre into the battell of his enemies. vntill that valiantly fighting in this fort, he was thrust in at length into the mouth with a fword, that the point of it came out againe at his necke. Now the footmen of both battels being come to the fword, the horimen of the left wing of Pompey did march as fiercely also, spreading out their troupes, to compasse in the right wing of Casar's battell. But before they began to give charge, the fixe enfignes of footmen which Cafar had laid in ambush behind him, they began to run full vpon them, not throwing away their darts far off, as they were wont to do, neither striking their enemies on the thighes nor on the legges, but to seeke to hit them ful in the eyes, and to hurt them in the face, as Cafar had taught them. For he hoped that these lusty yong gentlemen that had not bene often in the warres, nor were vsed to see themselues hurt, and the which, being in the prime of their youth and beautie, would be afraid of those hurts, as well for the feare of the present danger to be slaine, as also for that their faces should not for euer be deformed. As indeed it came to passe, for they could neuer abide that they should come so neere their faces with the points of their darts, but hung downe their heads for feare to be hit with them in their eyes, and turned their backes, couering their face, because they should not be hurt. Then, breaking of themselues, they began at length cowardly to flie, and were occasion also of the losse of all the rest of Pompeys armie. For they that had broken them, ranne immediatly to set vpon the squadron of the footmen behind, and slue them. Then Pompey seeing his horsemen from the other wing of his battell, so scattered and dispersed, flying away, forgat that he was any more Pompey the Great, which he had bene before, but was rather like a man whose wits the gods had taken from him, being afraid and amazed with the flaughter fent from aboue, and so retired into his tent, speaking neuera word, & sate there to see the end of this battell; vntillat the length all his armie being ouerthrowne and put to flight, the enemies came, and got vp vpon the rampiers and defence of his campe, and fought hand to hand with them that stood to defend the same. Then as a man come to himselfe againe, he spake but this only word: What, even into our campe? So in hast, casting off his coate-armour and apparell of a Generall, he shifted him, and put on such as became his miserable fortune, and so stole out of his campe. Furthermore, what he did after this ouerthrow, and how he had put himselfe into the hands of the ÆGYPTIANS, by whom he was miserably slain, we have set it forth at large in his life. Then C.esar entring into Pompeys campe, and seeing the bodies layed on the ground that were slaine, and others also that were a killing, said, fetching a great figh. It was their own doing, and against my will. For Caius Cafar, after he had wonne fo many famous conquests, and ouercome fo many great battels, had bene vtterly condemned notwithstanding, if he had departed from his armie. Asimius Pollio writeth, that he spake these words then in Latin, which he afterwards wrote in Greeke, and faith furthermore, that the most part of them which were put to the sword in the campe, were flaues and bondmen, and that there were not flaine in all this battell aboue fixe thousand thousand fouldiers. As for them that were taken prisoners, C. sar did put many of them amongst his legions, and did pardon also many men of estimation, among whom Brutus was one, that afterwards flue Cofar himfelfe; and it is reported, that Cofar was very fory for him, when he could fre coffer not immediatly be found after the battel, & that he rejoyced againe when he knew he was aline, taken prife and that he came to yeeld himfelfe vnto him. Cafar had many fignes and tokens of victory before this battel, but the notablest of all other that happened to him, was in the city of TRALLES. Pharfalia. For in the temple of victory, within the fame city, there was an image of Cafar, and the earth all signer and about it very hard of it felfe, and was paned befides with hard stone; and yet some say that there construints fprang vp a palme hard by the base of the same image. In the citie of PADVA, Caius Cornelius an floreexcellent Southfayer, (a countriman and friend of Titus Liuius the Historiographer) was by chance at that time fet to behold the flying of birds. He (as Linie reporteth) knew the very time nelius an when the battell began, and told them that were present, Euen now they give the onset on both fides, and both armies do meete at this inftant. Then fitting downe againe to confider of the eater. birds, after he had bethought him of the fignes, he fodainly rose vp on his feete, and cried out as a man possessed with some spirit: O Casar the victory is thine. Every man wondering to see him, he tooke the crowne he had on his head, and made an oath that he would never put it on againe, rill the eyent of his prediction had proved his art true. Linie testifieth, that it came so to passe. Ca-Grafterwards giving freedome vnto the Thessalians, in respect of the victory which he wan in their country, he followed after Pompey. When he came into As 1 A, he gave freedome also vnto the GVIDIANS for Theopompus fake, who had gathered the fables together. He did release As 14 alfo, the third part of ftribute which the inhabitants paid vnto the Romains. The he came into ALEXANDRIA after Pompey was flaine; and detelted Theodotus that presented him Pompeys head, and turned his head afide because he would not see it. Notwithstanding, he tooke his feale, & beholding it, wept. Furthermore, he courteoufly vsed all Pompeys friends and familiars. catardiwho wandring vpand downe the country, were taken of the king of AGYPT, and wan them all mene in to be at his commandement. Continuing these courtesses, he wrote vnto his friends at Rome, that the greatest pleasure he took of his victory, was, that he daily faued the lines of some of his countrimenthat bare armes against him. And for the war he made in ALEXANDRIA, some say, he needed not to have done it, but that he willingly did it for the love of Gleopatra; wherein he wan of Gafars litle honor, and befides did put his person in great danger. Others do lay the fault vpon the king marie in of Ægypr's ministers, but specially on Pothinus y Eunuch, who bearing the greatest sway of all the kings scruants, after he had caused Pompey to be slaine, and driven Gleopatra. from the court, Postinus fecretly laid wait all the waies he could, how he might likewife kill Cofar. Wherefore Cofar heathermothe ring an inckling of it, began thenceforth to spend all the night long in feasting & banqueting, that earled his person might be in the better safetie. But besides all this, Polhinus the Eunuch spake many bestaine, things openly not to be borne, only to shame Colar, & to stir vp the people to enuic him. For he made his foldiers have the worst & oldest wheat that could be gotten: then if they did coplaine of it, he told them they must be contented, seeing they eate at another mans cost. And he would ferue them also at the table in treene & earthen dishes, saying, that Casar had away all their gold and siluer, for a debt that the kings father (that then raigned) did owe vnto him: which was, a thousand seuen hundred & fifty Myriades, wheref Casar had before forgive seuen hundred and fiftie thousand vnto his children. Howbeit then he asked a million to pay his fouldiers withall. Thereto Pothinus answered him, that at that time he should do better to follow his other causes of greater importace, & afterwards that he should at more leisure recouer his debt with the kings good will and fauor. Cefar replied vnto him, & faid, that he would not aske counfell of the A-GYPTIANS for his affaires, but wold be paid and therupon fecretly fent for Cleopatra, which was in the country, to come vnto him. She only taking Apollodorus Sicilian of all her friends, took cane to a litle bote, & went away with him in it in the night, and came & landed hard by the foot of the castell. Then having no other meane to come into the court without being knowne, she laid her cleopatra felfe downe vpon a mattreffe or flockbed, which Apollodorus her friend tied & bound vptogether manute like a bundle with a great leather thong & fo took her ypon his backe & brought her thus ham. * treff-, and pered in this fardle vnto Cafar in at the castle gate. This was y first occasion (as it is reported) that to Cafar, made Cafar to loue her: but afterwards, when he faw her sweet couer sation & pleasant entertain- ppin appl ment, he fell then in further liking with her, & did reconcile her again vnto her brother the king, lotorus backe, with condition, that they two loyntly should reigne together. 734 a great feast being prepared, a slaue of Casars that was his barber, the fearfullest wretch that lived fill bufily prying and liftening abroad in enery corner, being miftruffull by nature, found that Pothinus and Achillas did lie in waite to kill his mafter Cafar. This being proued vnto Cafar, he did fet fuch fure watch about the hall, where the feast was made, that in fine, he flue the eunuch Pothinus himselfe. Achillas on the other side, saued himself, and sled vnto the kings campe, where he raifed a maruellous dangerous and difficult warre for Cafar: because he having then but a few men about him, was to fight against a great and strong citie. The first danger he fell into, was the want of water: for that his enemies had stopped the mouth of the pipes, the which conueyed the water into the castell. The second danger he had, was, that seeing his energiance mies came to take his ships from him, he was driven to repulse that danger with fire, the which burnt the arfenal where the ships lay, & that notable library of ALEXANDRIA withal. The third danger was in the battel by fea, that was fought by the tower of Phan; where meaning to helpe his men that fought by fea, he leapt from the peere into a boate. Then the ÆGYPTIANS made towards him with their oares on enery fide: but he leaping into the fea, with great hazard faued himselfe by swimming. It is said, that then holding divers books in his hand, he did never let the go, but kept them alwayes ypon his head aboue water, and fwam with the other hand, not withstanding that they shot maruellously at him, and was driven sometime to ducke into the water. howbeit y boate was drowned prefently. In fine, the king coming to his methat made war with Cafar, he went against him, and gaue him battell, and wan it with great slaughter, and effusion of bloud. But for the King, no man could ever tel what became of him after. Therupon Calar made Cleopatra his fifter, Queen of ÆGYPT, who being great with child by him, was shortly brought to bed of a fon, who the ALEXANDRIAN'S named Cefarion. From thence he went into Syria, and fo going into Asia, there it was told him that Domitius was overthrown in battell, by Pharmaces the fon of king Mithridates, and was fled out of the Realme of Pont with a few men with hims and that this king Pharnaces greedily following his victory, was not contented with the winning of BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA, but further would needs attempt to win Armenia the leffe, procuring all those Kings, Princes, & Gouernors of the provinces thereabouts to rebel against the Romains. Therupon Cafar went thither straight with three legions, & fought a great battell with king Pharnaces by the city of ZELA, where he flue his army, and draue him out of althe Realme of Pont. And because he would advertise one of his friends of the sodainnesse of this victory, he onely wrote three words vnto Anitius at Rome; Veni, Vidi, Vici: to wit, I came, I faw, I ouercame. These three words ending all with like sound and letter in the Latine, have a certain short grace more pleasant to the eare, then can be well expressed in any other tongue, After this he returned againe into ITALY, & came to RomE, ending his yeare for the which he was made Dictator the fecond time, which office before was neuer granted for one whole yeare, but vnto him. Then was he chosen Consul for the yeare following. Afterwards he was very il spokon of for that his fouldiers in a mutiny having flaine two Prætors, cosconius and Galba, he gave them `no other punishment for it, but in stead of calling them soldiers, he named them citizens, & gaue vnto euery one of them a thousand Drachmaes a man, and great possessions in ITALY. He was much misliked aifo for the desperate parts and madnesse of Dolabella, for the couetousnesse of Anitius, for the drunkennesse of Antonius and Cornisicius; which made Pompeys house be pulled downe and builded vp againe, as a thing not big inough for him, wher with the Romain's were maruellously offended. Casar knew all this well inough, and would have bene contented to have redressed them: but to bring his matters to passe, he precented he was dring to serve his turne by fuch instruments. After the battell of Pharsalia, Cato and Scipio being fled into Africke, king Iuba ioyned with them, and leavied a great puissant army. Wherefore Casar determined to make war with them: and in the middest of winter, he tooke his journy into Sicils. There, because he would take all hope from his captaines & fouldiers to make any long abode there, he went and lodged vpon the very fands by the fea fide, & with the next gale of wind that came, he tooke the fea with three thousand footmen, & a few horsmen. Then having put the a land, vnwares to them he hoifed faile againe to fetch the rest of his army, being afraid lest they shold meete with some danger in passing ouer, and meeting them mid way, he brought them all into his campe. Where, when it was told him, that his enemies trusted in an anciet Oracle, which faid, that it was predestined vnto the family of the Scipices to be conquerous in Africa: either of purpose to mocke Scipio the Generall of his enemies, or otherwise ingood earnest to take the benefit of this name

And one day as the men of armes were flaying to behold an African doing notable things in dancing & playing with the flute(they being let down quietly to take their pleasure of the view thereof, having in Casars danthe meane time given their flaves their horses to hold) the enemies stealing sodainly vpon them, finke. compassed them in round about, & slue a number of them in the field, and chasing the other also that fled, followed them pel mel into their camp, Furthermore, had not C.efar himself in person, and Afinius Pollio with him, gone out of the campe to the refeue, and staid them that fled, the war that day had bin ended. There was also another skirmish where his enemies had the vpper hand, in the which it is reported, that Cafar taking the enfigne bearer by the collar that caried the Eagle in his hand, staid him by force, and turning his face, told him; see, there be thy enemies. These aduantages did lift vp Scipioes heart aloft, and gaue him courage to hazard battel; and leaning Afranius on the one hand of him, and king Iuba on the other hand, both their campes lying neare together, he did fortifie himself by veity of Thapsacvs, aboue the lake, to be a suffere fuge for the all in this battel. But whilft he was busie intrenching of himselfe, Casar having maruellous speedily passed through a great country ful of wood, by by-paths which men would never have miftrusted he stole you some behind, and sodainly assailed the other before, so that he ouerthrew them all, and made them flie. Then following the first good hap he had, he went forthwith to set vpon the campe of Afranius, the which he tooke at the first onler, & the campe of the Namidi- Capital ANS also, king Iuba being fled. Thus in a little peece of the day only, he tooke three camps, & flue great vififty thousand of his enemies, and lost but fifty of his souldiers. In this fort is set down the effect final loss. of this battel by some writers. Yet others do write also, that C.esar self was not there in person at the execution of this battel. But this is true, that Gafarfaid at that prefent time: O Cato, I enuy thy death, because, for for the thou didst enuy my glory to faue thy life. This notwithstanding, the booke that he wrote after- death of wards against Cato being dead, did shew no very great affection nor pitifull heart towards him. Cafer wrote For how could be have pardoned him, if living he had had him in his hands, that being dead did against caso thow could he hade partioled him; Notwithstading, men suppose he would have pardoned him, to bring speake so vehemently against him? Notwithstading, men suppose he would have pardoned him, to bring speake so vehemently against him? if he had taken him aliue, by the elemency he shewed vnto Givero, Brutus, and diverse others that had borne armes against him. with two hundred thousand bushels of wheate, and twenty hundred thousand pound weight of oile. Then he made three triumphs, vone for ÆGYPT, the other for the kingdome of PONT, and the third for AFRICKE not because he had ouercome Scipio there, but king Iuba. Whose son heing likewife called Inba, being then a yong boy, was led captine in the Thew of this triumph. But this his imprisonmet fel out happily for him: for where he was but a barbarous NVMIDIAN. by the study he fell vnto when he was priloner, he came afterwards to be reckoned one of the wifest historiographers of the GRECIANS. After these three triumphs ended, he very liberally rewarded his foldiers: & to curry fauour with the people, he made great feafts & comon sports. . For he feasted all the Romaines at one time, at two and twenty thousand tables, & gaue them the pleasure to see divers sword-players to fight at the sharpe, and battels also by sea, for the remébrance of his daughter Iulia, which was dead long before. The after all these sports, he made the people (as the maner was) to be mustered; and where there were at the last musters before three hundred & twenty thousand citizens, at this muster there were only but a hundred & fifty thousand. Such milery and destruction had this civill war wrought vnto the commonwealth of Rome, and had confumed fuch a number of Romains, not speaking at all of the mischiefs and calamities it had brought vnto all the rest of ITALY, and to the other prouinces pertaining to Rome. After all these things were ended, he was chosen Conful the fourth time, and went into Spaine to make war with the fons of Pompey; who were yet but very yong, but had not with 1152 ding raifed a maruellous great army together, and shewed they had manhood and courage worthy to command such an army, infomuch as they put Celar himselfe in great danger of his life. The greatest battel that was fought between the in all this war, was by the city of Mynda. For then Cafar feeing his mea forely diffressed, and having their hands ful of their enemies, he ranne into the prease among his men that fought, & cried out vnto them: What, are ye not ashamed to be beate & taken priforers, yeelding your felues with your own hands to these your boies? And fo, with all force he could make, having with much ado put his enemies to flight, he flue about thirtic thousand of them in the field, & lost of his owne men a thousand of the best he had. After this battell he went into his tent and told his friends, that he had often before fought for vieto. ry, but this last time now, that he had fought for the safety of his own life. He wanne this battell on the very feaft day of the BACCHANALIANS, in the which men fay, that Pompey the great went out of Rom B, about four yeares before, to begin this civil war. For his fonnes, the yonger fcaped from the battell, but within few daies after, Diddius brought the head of the clder. This was the last war that Cofar made. But the triumph he made into Kom E for the same, did as much offend the Romaines, and more, then any thing that ever he had done before; because he had not ouercome Captaines that were strangers nor barbarous kings, but had destroyed the sonnes of the noblest man of Rome, whom fortune had overthrowne. And because he had plucked yp his race by the roots, mendid not thinke it meete for him to triumph so for the calamities of his country, rejoycing at a thing for the which he had but one excuse to alledge in his defence, vnto the gods and men, that he was compelled to do that he did. And the rather they thought it not meet, because he had never before sent letters nor messengers vnto the commonwealth at Rome, for any victory that he had ever won in all the civill wars: but did alwaies for shame refuse the glory of it. This notwithstanding the ROMAINS inclining to Cosars prosperity, & taking the bit in the mouth, supposing that to be ruled by one man alone, it would be a good meane for the totake breath a litle, after so many troubles & miseries as they had abidde in these civil wars they chose him perpetual Dictator. This was a plaine tyranny for to this absolute power of Dictator, they added this, neuer to be affraid to be deposed: cieero pronounced before the Senate, that they should give him such honors as were meet for a man; howbeit others afterwards added roo, honors beyond all reason. For men striuing who should most honour him, they made him hatefull and trouble some to themselues that most fauoured him, by reason of the vnmeasurable greatnesse and honours which they gaue him. Thereupon it is reported, that euen they that most hated him, were no leffe fauourers & furtherers of his honors, then they that most flattered him, because they might have greater occasions to rife, and that it might appeare they had inst cause and colour to attempt that they did against him. And now for himself, after he had ended his ciuill warres, he did so honorably behaue himfelfe, that there was no fault to be found in him: and therefore methinks amongst other honors they gaue him, he rightly descrued this, that they should build him a temple of clemency to thanke him for his courtesse he had vsed vnto them in his victory. For he pardoned many of them that had borne armes against him, and furthermore. did preferre some of them to honor and office in the common wealth: as amongst others, Cassins Cassins and and Brutus, both the which were made Prætors. And where Pompeys images had bene throwne Brutus down he caused them to be set up againe: whereupon Gicero said then, that Gasar setting up Pompeys images againe, he made his owne to stand the furer. And when some of his friends did coufell him to have a guard for the fafety of his person, and some also did offer themselves to serve him, he would never confent to it, but faid: It was better to die once, then alwayes to be afraid of cofars for death. Butto win himselfe the love and goodwil of the people, as the honorablest guard & best ing. of fafetie he could have, he made common feasts againe, and generall distributions of corne. Furthermore, to gratifie the fouldiers also he replenished many cities again with inhabitants, which [ubietts,the before had bin destroyed, and placed them there that had no place to repaire vnto: of the which and fafetie the noblest and chiefest cities were these two, CARTHAGE and CORINTH: and it chanced also, for Princes. that like as aforetime they had bin both taken & destroyed together cuen so were they both set on foore again, and replenished with people, at one felf time. And as for great personages, he wan them also, promising some of them, to make them Practors and Consuls in time to come; and vnto others, honors & preferments; but to all men generally good hope, feeking all the waies he could to make every man contented with his reigne. Infomuch as one of his Confuls called Maximus chancing to die a day before his Conful ship ended, he declared Caninius Rebilius Conful only for the day that remained. So, divers going to his house (as the maner was) to falute him, Rebuins and to congratulate with him of his calling and preferment, being newly chosen officer, Cicero Confillor pleafantly faid: Come, let vs make hafte, and be gone thither before his Conful ship come out. Furthermore, Cefar being borne to attempt all great enterprifes, and having an ambitious defire befides to court great honors, y prosperous good successe he had of his former conquests, bred no defire in him quietly to enjoy the fruites of his labors; but rather gaue him the hope of things to come, still kindling more and more in him, thoughts of greater enterprises, and defire of new glory, as if that which he had prefent were stale and nothing worth. This humor of his was no other but an emulation with himfelfe as with another man, and a certaine contention to ouercome the things he prepared to attempt. For he was determined, and made preparation also, to make warre with the Persians. Then when he had ouercome them, to passe through Hyaca-NIA (compassing in the sea Calpium, and mount Caucasus) into the Realme of Pontys, and so to inuade Scythia: and our running all the countries, and people adjoyning vnto high GER-MANIE, and GERMANIE it self, at length to returne by GAVLE into ITALY, & so to enlarge the ROMAINE Empire round, that it might be every way copassed in with the great sea Oceanum. But whilest he was preparing for this voyage, he attempted to cut the barre of the straight of, PELOPONNESVS, in the market place where the city of Corinth stadeth. The he was minded to bring the rivers of Anienes and Tiber, straight from Rome, vnto the city of Circe es with a deepe channelland high banks cast vp on either side, and so to fall into the sea at TERRACINA, for the better safety and commodity of the merchants that came to Rome to trafficke there. Furthermore, he determined to draine and feaw all the water of the marishes betwixt the cities of Nomenty M and Setty M, to make firmeland, for the benifite of many thousands of people: and on the sea coast next vnto Rome, to cast great high bankes, & to cleanseall the hauen about Os TIA, of rocks and stones hidden under the water, and to take away all other impediments that made the harborough dangerous for ships, and to make new hauens and arfenals meete to harbour fuch ships as did continually trafficke thither. All these things were purposed to be done. but tooke no effect. But the ordinance of the Kalender, and reformation of the yeare, to take Anienes. away all confusion of time, being exactly calculated by the Mathematicians, and brought to Tiber flu. perfection, was a great commoditie vnto all men. For the Romaines vfing then the ancient formed the computation of the yeare, had not onely such incertaintie and alteration of the moneth and incertainties are also also also also alteration of the moneth and incertainties are also also alteration of the moneth and incertainties are also also alteration of the moneth and incertainties are also also alteration of the moneth and incertainties are also also alteration of the moneth and incertainties are also also alteration of the moneth and incertainties are also altered alteration of the moneth and alteration of the times, that the facrifices and yearely feafts came, by litle & litle, to feafons contrary for the pur- of the yeare. pose they were ordained but also in the revolution of the Sunne (which is called Annus Solaris) no other nationagreed with them in account; and of the Romain Es themselves, only the priests vinderstood it. And therefore when they listed, they sudainly (no man being able to controlle them) did thrust in a moneth about their ordinary number, which they called in old time, * Mercedonius. Some say, that Numa Pompilius was the first that denised this way, to put a mo- nius mensus neth betweene but it was a weake remedy, and did litle helpe the correction of the errours that interestaris were made in the account of the yeare, to frame them to perfection. But Cafar committing this matter vnto the Philosophers, & best expert Mathematicians at that time, did set forthan excellent and perfect kalender, more exactly calculated, then any other that was before the which the ROMAIN'S do vie vntill this prefent day, and do nothing erre as others, in the difference of time. But his enemies not with standing that enuied his greatnesse, did not sticke to find fault withall. As Cicero the Orator, when one faid, to morrow the starre Lyra wil rife; Yea, faid he, at the commandement of cafar, as if men were compelled fo to fay & thinke, by cafers edict. But the chiefest cause that made him mortally hated, was the couctous desire he had to be called king: which If first gaue the people inst cause, and next his secret enemies, honest colour to beare him ill will. This notwithstanding, they that procured him this honour and dignitie, gaue it out among the people, that it was written in the Sybilline prophecies, how the Romain's might ouercome the PARTHIANS, if they made war with them, & were led by a king, but otherwise that they were vnconquerable. And furthermore they were fo bold befides, that Cafar returning to Rome fro the city of ALBA, when they came to falute him, they called him king. But the people being offended, & Cefar allo angry, he faid, he was not called king, but Cefar. Then every man keeping filence, he went his way heavie and forowfull. When they had decreed divers honors for him in the Senate, the Confuls and Prætors accompanied with the whole affembly of the Senate, went vnto him in the market place, where he was fet by the pulpit for Orations, to tell him what honors they had decreed for him in his absence. But he sitting still in his maiestie, disdaining to rise vp vnto them when they came in, as if they had bene private men, answered them: that his honors had more need to be cut off then enlarged. This did not onely offend the Senate, but the common people also, to see that he should so lightly esteeme of the Magistrates of the commonwealth:infomuch as every man that might lawfully go his way, departed thece very forowfully. Thereupon also Cafar rising, departed home to his house, and tearing open his dublet coller, making his necke bare, he cried out aloud to his friends, that his throate was readie to offer to any man that would come and cut it. Notwithstanding, it is reported, that afterwards to excuse his · folly, he imputed it to his disease, saying, that their wits are not perfit which haue this disease of the falling cuill, when standing on their feete they speake to the common people, but are soone troubled with a trembling of their bodie, and a fodaine dimnesse & giddinesse. But that was not true, for he wold haue risen vp to the Senat, but Cornelius Balbus one of his frieds (or rather a flatterer) would not let him, faying: what, do you not remember that you are Cafar, and wil you not let them reuerence you, & do their duties? Besides these occasions and offences, there followed also his shame and reproch, abusing the Tribunes of the people in this fort. At that time the feast Lupercalia was celebrated, the which in old time, men fay was the feaft of shepheards or heardmen, & is much like vnto the feast of the Lyc ÆIANS in ARCADIA. But how soener it is, that day there are diuers noble mens fons, yong men, (and fome of them Magistrates themselues that gouern then) which run naked through the city, striking in sport them they meet in their way, with leather thongs, haire and all on, to make them give place. And many noble women and gentlewomen also, go of purpose to stand in their way, and do put forth their hands to be stricken, as scholers hold them out to their schoolemaster, to be stricken with the ferula; perswading themfelues that being with child, they shall have good delivery; and so being barren, that it wil make them to conceiue with child. Cafar fate to behold that sport vpon the pulpit for Orations, in a chaine of gold, apparelled in triumphant manner. Antonius who was Confull at that time, was one of them that ranne this holy course. So when he came into the market place, the people made a lane for him to runne at liberty, and he came to Cafar, and prefented him a Diademe wreathed about with laurell, Whereupon there rose acertaine crie of rejoycing, not very great, done onely by a few, appointed for the purpose. But when Cesar refused the Diademe, then all the people together made an outerie of ioy. Then Antonius offering it him againe, there was a second shout of ioy, but yet of a few. But when cafar refused it against he second time, then all the whole people shouted. Casar having made this proofe, found that the people did not like of it and the reupon rose out of his chaire, and commanded the crowne to be caried vnto Iupiter in the Capitoll. After that, there were fet vp images of Cafar in the city, with Diademes vpon their heads, like kings. Those, the two Tribunes, Flauius and Marullus, went and pulled downe, and furthermore, meeting with them that first faluted Cafar as king, they committed them to prison. The people followed them reioycing at it, and called them Brutes, because of Brutus, who had in old time driven the kings out of Rome, and that brought the kingdome of one person, vnto the government of the Senate and people. Cafar was fo offended withall, that he deprined Marulius and Flautes of their Tribunethips, and accusing them, he spake also against the people, and called them Bratiand Cumani, to wit, beafts and fooles. Hereupon the people went fraight vnto Marcus Brutus, who from his father came of the first Brutus, and by his mother of the house of the Seruilians, a noble house as any was in Rome, and was also nephew and sonne in law of Marcus Cato. Notwithstanding, the great honors and fauour Cafar shewed vnto him, kept him backe that of himselfe alone he did not conspire nor consent to depose him of his kingdome. For Cafar did Cafar faned not only faue his life, after the battel of Phansalia when Pompey fled, & did at his request also Britis life; faue many moe of his friends besides : but furthermore, he put a maruellous confidence in him. after the For he had already preferred him to the Prætorship for that yeare, & furthermore was appointed to be Confull the fourth yeare after that, having through Cafars friendship obtained it before Cakins, who likewise made suite for the same and Casar also, as it is reported, said in this contention, indeed Cassius hath alledged best reason, but yet shal he not be chosen before Brutus. Some one day accusing Brutus while he practifed this conspiracie, Cafar would not heare of it, but clapping his hand on his body, told them, Brutus wil looke for this skin meaning thereby, that Brutus fireth afor his vertue deserted to rule after him, but yet, that for ambitions sake, he wold not shew him- gainst cafelfe ynthankfull or dishonourable. Now they that defired change, and wished Brutus onely their far. Prince and Gouernour aboue all other, they durst not come to him themselues to tell him what they would have him to do, but in the night did cast fundry papers into the Prætors seate, where he gaue audience, and the most of them to this effect: Thou sleepest Brutus, and art not Brutus indeed. Cassius finding Brutus ambition stirred up the more by these sedicious bils, did prick him cassius nive forward, and edge him on the more, for a private quarrel he had conceived against Cefirsthe cir- reship cumftance wheref, we have fet downe more at large in Brutus life. Cefar also had Cassus in great gainst Ceiclousie, and suspected him much: wherupon he said on a time to his friends, what wil Cassins do, Siar. thinke ye? Hike not his pale lookes. Another time when Cafars friends complained vnto him of Antonius & Dolabella, that they pretended fome mischiefe towards him he answered them again; As for those far men & imooth combed heads, quoth he, I neuer reckon of them, but these pale visaged and carion leane people, I feare them most, meaning Brutus and Cossius. Certainly, destinie may easier be foreseene then avoided, considering the strange and wonderfull signes that were faid to be scene before Cosars death. For touching the fires in the element, and spirits running vp and downe in the night, and also the solitary birds to be seene at noon daies sitting in the and soregreat market place, are not all these signes perhaps worth the noting, in such a wonderful chance Cesars as happened? But Strabo the Philosopher writeth, that divers men were seene going vp & down death. in fire and furthermore, that there was a flaue of the foldiers, that did caft a maruellous burning flame out of his hand, infomuch as they that faw it, thought he had beneburnt; but when the fire was out, it was found he had no hurt. Cafar felf also doing facrifice vnto the gods, found that one of the beafts which was facrificed had no hart; and that was a strangething in nature, how a beast could line without a heart. Furthermore there was a certaine Soothfayer, that had given Cafar Cafariday warning long time afore, to take heed of the day of the Ides of March, (which is the fifteenth of of his death the moneth) for on that day he shold be in great danger. That day being come, Casargoing vnto the Senate house, and speaking merily vnto the soothsayer, told him the Ides of March be come: southsayer. So they be, foftly answered the Soothsayer, but yet are they not past. And the very day before, Cafar supping with Marcus Lepidus, sealed certaine letters as he was wont to do at the boord: so talk falling out amongst the, reasoning what death was best, he prenenting their opinions, cried out aloud, Death vnlooked for. Then going to bed the same night, as his manner was, and lying with his wife Calpurnia, all the windows and doores of his chamber flying open, the noise awoke him, and made him afraid when he saw such light: but more, when he heard his wife Calpurnia, Thedreame being fast ascepe, weepe and sigh, and put forth many fumbling lamentable speeches: for she of casperdreamed that Cafar was flaine, and that she had him in her armes. Others also do denie that she wife. had any fuch dreame, as amongst other, Titus Livius writeth, that it was in this fort: The Senate having set vpon the top of Casars house for an ornament and setting forth of the same, a certaine pinnacle, Calpurnia dreamed that the faw it broken downe, and that the thought the lamented and wept for it. Infomuch that Cafar rifing in the morning, she prayed him if it were possible, not to go out of the doores that day, but to adiorne the fession of the Senate vntill another day.

And if that he made no reckoning of her dreame, yet that he would fearch further of the Soothfaiers by their facrifices, to know what should happen him that day. Therby it seemed that Cefar likewise did feare or suspect somewhat, because his wise Calpurnia vntil that time was neuer giuen to any feare and superstition; and that then he saw her so troubled in mind with this dreame the had. But much more afterwards, when the Soothfaiers having facrificed many beafts one after another, told him that none did like them: then he determined to fend Antonius to adiorne the seffion of the Senate. But in the meane time came Decius Brutus, sirnamed Albinus, in whom Cafar put such confidence, that in his last will and testament he had appointed him to be his next heire, and yet was of the conspiracie with Casius and Brutus: he fearing that if Casar did adiorne the feffion that day, the conspiracie would be betrayed, laughed at the Soothsayers, & reproued Cafar, faying, that he gaue the Senate occasion to mislike with him, and that they might think he mocked them, confidering that by his commandement they were affembled, and that they were ready willingly to grant him all things, & to proclaime him king of all his prouinces of the Empire of Rome out of ITALY, and that he should weare his diademe in al other places both by sea & land, And furthermore, that if any man should tel them from him, they should depart for that present time, and return againe when Calpurnia should have better dreames, what would his enemics and ill willers fay, and how could they like of his friends words? And who could perfuade them otherwise, but that they would think his dominion a slauery vnto them, and tyrannicall in himselfer. And yet if it be so, said he, that you veterly mislike of this day, it is better that you go your felf in perfon, & faluting the Senate to difiniffe the til another time. Therewithall he took Cefar by the hand, and brought him out of his house, Cafar was not gone far from his house, but a bond man, a ftranger, did what he could to speake with him: and when he saw he was put back by the great preffe & multitude of people that followed him, he went flraight into his house. put himself into Calpurniaes hands, to be kept til Casar came backe againe, telling her that he had greater matters to impart vnto him. And one Artemidorus alfoborn in the Ile of GNIDOS, a doctor of Rhetorick in the Greeke tongue, who by means of his profession was very familiar with certaine of Brutus confederates; and therfore knew the most part of al their practises against Cafar, came and brought him a little bill written with his owne hand, of all that he meant to tel him, He marking how Calar received all the supplications that were offered him, & that he gave them straight to his men that were about him, pressed nearer to him, and said: Cosar, reade this memoriall to your felfe, and that quickly for they be matters of great weight, and touch you nearely. Cofar took it of him, but could never reade it, though he many times attempted it, for the number of people that did falute him: but holding it still in his hand, keeping it to himselfe, went on withall into the Senate house. Howbeit other are of opinion, that it was some man else that gaue him that memorial, & not Artemidorus, who did whathe could all the way as he went to give it C. far, but he was alwayes repulled by the people. For these things, they may seeme to come by chance but the place where the murther was prepared, & where the Senate were affembled, and where also there stood up an image of Pompey dedicated by himselfe amongst other ornaments which he gaue vnto the Theater, all these were manifest proofes, that it was the ordinance of fome god, that made this treason to be executed, specially in that very place. It is also reported, that Cassius (though otherwise he did fauour the doctrine of Epicurus) beholding the image of Pompey, before they entred into the action of their traiterous enterprise, he did softly call vpon it, to aide him: but the instant danger of the present time, taking away his former reason, did sodainly put him into a furious passion, and made him like a man halfe besides himselfe. Now Antonius that was a faithfull friend to Cafar, and a valiant man befides of his hands, him Decius Brutus Albinus entertained out of the Senate house, having begunne a long tale of set purpose. So Cusar comming into the house, all the Senate stood up on their feete to do him honour. Then part of Brutus companie and confederates flood round about Cafars chaire, and part of them also came towards him, as though they made suite with Metellus Cimber, to call home his brother again from banishment; and thus prosecuting still their suite, they followed Cefar till he was fet in his chaire. Who denying their petitions, and being offended with them one after another, because the more they were denied, the more they pressed upon him, and were the carnester with him, Metellus at length, taking his gowne with both his hands, pulled it ouer his necke, which was the figne given the confederates to fer vpon him. Then Cafea behind him, ftrake him in the necke with his fword; howbeit the word was not great nor mortall, because it seemed, the searc of such a divellish attempt did amaze him, & take his strength from him, that he killed him not at the first blow. But Casar turning straight vnto him, caught hold of his fword, and held it hard, & they both cried out, Cefar in latin: O vile traitor Cafea, what doeft thous And Calca in Greek to his brother. Brother, help me, At y beginning of this ftir, they that were present, not knowing of the cospiracie, were so amazed with the horrible sight they saw, they had no power to flie, neither to help him, nor so much as once to make an outcrie. They on ý other fide that had colpited his death, copassed him in on every side with their swords drawn in their hands, that Cafar turned him no where, but he was stricken at by some, and still had naked fwords in his face, & was hackled & mangled among them, as a wild beaft taken of hunters. For it was agreed among the, that every man should give him a wound, because al their parts shold be in this murther; and then Brutus himself gaue him one wound about his privities. Men report alfo; that Cafar did ftil defend himfelf against virest, running euery way with his body; but when he faw Brutus with his fword drawne in his hand, then he pulled his gowne over his head, and made no more refistance, & was driven either casually or purposedly, by the counsel of the confpirators, against the base, whereupon Pompeys image stood which ran all of a goare bloud till he was flaine. Thus it feemed that the image tooke inft reuenge of Pompeys enemie, being throwne down on the ground at his feet, & yeelding vp the ghost there, for the number of wounds he had voon him. For it is reported, that he had three & twentic wounds voon his bedie: and diners of cofarfiain, the conspirators did hurt themselues, striking one body with so many blowes. When Cafar was and had flaine, the Senate (though Brutus stood in the middest amongst them, as though he would have roughlin. faid something couching this fact) presently ranne out of the house, and slying, filled all the citie with maruellous feare and tumult. Infomuch as fome did flut too the doores, others for looke their shops and ware-houses, and others ranne to the place to see what the matter was and others also that had seene it, ran home to their houses againe. But Antonius and Lepidus, which were two of Calars chiefest friends, secretly conveying themselves away, fled into other mens houses, and for fooke their owne. Brutus and his confederates on the other fide, being yet hot with this murther they had committed, having their swords drawne in their hands, came all in atroupe together out of the Senate, and went into the market place, not as men that made countenance to flie, The mur. but otherwise, boldly holding vp their heads like men of courage, & called to the people to de- thereis of fend their liberty, and stayd to speake with enery great personage, whom they met in their way. Of them, some followed this troupe, and went amongst them, as if they had bin of the conspiracie, and falfly chalenged part of the honor with them: among them was Cains Offaurus and Len- Place. tulus Spiniher. Butboth of them were afterwards put to death for their vaine couetouines of honor, by Antonius, and Octavius Cafar the yonger; and yet had no part of that honor for the which they were both put to death neither did any man believe that they were any of the confederates or of counsel with the. For they that did put them to death, took reuenge rather of the wil they had to offend, then of any fact they had comitted. The next morning, Brutus & his confederates came into the market place to fpeak vnto the people, who gaue the fuch audience, that it feemed they neither greatly reproued nor allowed the fact; for by their great filence they shewed that they were fory for Cafars death, & also than they did renerence Brutus. Now the Senate granted general pardon for all that was past, & to pacific enery man, ordained besides, that Cefars funcrals should be honored as a god, & established all things that he had done, and gaue certain proninces also, and convenient honors vnto Brutus & his confederates, wherby every man thought al things were brought to good peace and quietnes again. But when they had opened Cefars testament, & found a liberall legacie of mony bequeathed vnto energy citizen of Rome, & that they faw his body (which was brought into the market place) all bemangled with gashes of swords, the there was no order to keep the multitude & comon people quiet, but they plucked up forms, tables & stooles, and laid them all about the body, and setting them aftire, burnt the corie. Then when the fire was well kindled, they tooke the fire-brands, and went vnto their houses that had flaine Cafar, to fetthem afire. Other also ran vp and down the city to fee if they could meet with any of them, to cut them in pecces; howbeit they could meet with neuer a man of them, because they had locked the felues vp fafely in their houses. There was one of Cafars friends called Cinna Cinnas that had a maruellous strange & terrible dreame & night before. He dreamed that Cafar bad him to supper, and that he refused & would not go: then that C. efar took him by the hand, & led him C. far. against his wil. Now Cinna hearing at that time, that they burnt Cafars body in the market place, notwithstanding that he feared his dreame, and had an ague on him besides, he went into the market place to honour his funerals. When he came thither, one of the meane fort asked him what his name was? He was straight called by his name. The first man told it to another, and that other vnto another, so that it ranne straight through them all, that he was one of them that murthered Cafar: (for indeed one of the traitors to Cafar, was also called Cinna as himselfe) wherefore taking him for Ginna the murherer, they fell vpon him with fuch fury, that they prefeliely dispatched him in the market place. This stirre and furie made Brutus and Cassius more affraid then of all that was past, and therfore within few daies after they departed out of Rome: and touching their doings afterwards, and what calamity they suffered till their deaths, we have written it at large in the life of Brutus. Cafar died at fixe and fiftie yeares of age, and Pompevalio lived not passing foure yeares more then he. So he reaped no other fruite of all his reigne and dominion, which he had so vehemently desired all his life, and pursued with such extreme danger, but a vaine name onely, and a superficiall glorie, that procured him the enuie and hatred of his countrey. But his great prosperitie and good fortune that fauoured him all his life time.did continue afterwards in the reuenge of his death, pursuing the murtherers both by sea and land. till they had not left a man more to be executed, of all the that were actors or counsellers in the conspiracie of his death. Furthermore, of all the chances that happen vnto men vpon the earth, that which came to Casius about all other, is most to be wondered at: for he being ouercome in battel at the journey of PHILIPPES, flue himself with the same sword with the which he strake C.efar. Againe, of fignes in the element, the great comet which feuen nights together was feene very bright after C. efars death, the eight night after was neuer seene more. Also the brightnesse of the Sunne was darkened, the which all that yeare through rose very pale, and shined not our. whereby it gaue but small heate; therefore the aire being very cloudie and darke, by the weakenes of the heate that could not come forth, did cause the earth to bring forth but raw and vnripe fruite, which rotted before it could ripe. But aboue all, the shoft that appeared vnte Brutus, shewed plainly, that the gods were offended with the murther of Cefar. The vision was thus: Brutus being ready to passe ouer his armie from the city of ARYDOS to the other coast lying directly against it, slept enery night (as his maner was) in his tent; and being yet awake, thinking of his affaires, for by report he was as carefull a Captaine, and lived with as litle fleepe as ever man did)he thought he heard a noise at his tent doore, & looking towards the light of the lamp that waxed very dim, he saw a horrible vision of a mansof a wonderfull greatnesse, and dreadful looke, which at the first made him maruellously afraid. But when he saw that it did him no hurt, but flood by his bed fide, & faid nothing; at length he asked him what he was. The image answepeared onto red him: I am thy ill Angell, Brutus, and thou shalt see me by the city of Philippes. Then Brutus replied againe, and faid, Well, I shall see thee then. Therewithall, the spirit presently vanished from him, After that time, Brutus being in battel neare vnto the city of Philippes, against Antonius and Ottauius Cafar, at the first battell he wannethe victorie, and ouerthrowing all them that withstood him, he draue them into yong Casars campe, which he took. The second battell being at hand, this fpirit appeared againe vnto him, but spake neuer a word. Thereupon Brutus knowing that he should die, did put himselse to all hazard in battel, but yet fighting could not be flaine. So feeing his men put to flight and ouerthrowne, he ranne vnto a litle rockenot farre off, and there setting his swords point to his breast, fell vpon it, and flue himselfe, but yet, as it is reported, with the helpe of his friend that dispatched him.

THE COMPARISON OF Alexander the Great with Iulius Casar.

NTRING into confideration of Alexander and Cafar, it is an easie matterto speake, and much easier to proue, that they are two of the brauest Chieftaines of warre, that are to be noted in histories: that their vertues Chieftaines of warre, that are to be noted in histories: that their vertues out of warre are excellent, and have great refemblance together: that both of them were nobly borne, learned, eloquent, liberall, moderate, very louing to their friends and scruants, and wonderfull much made of, & obeyed of Captaines and souldiers of their armies, and mercifull even to their enemies: that even from their youth they made good proofe of the future greatnesse of their courages: that their exploits are altogether admirable: that they be two miracles for militarie discipline, whether a man doth looke into the shortnesse of the time of their warres, and the countries which they have passed through, as it were with the turning of a hand: orthatthey behold the enemies they have overcome, the townes and provinces they have conguered their wisdome, valour, and happinesse, having neuer received repulse, but alwayes carying victory in their hands, and making valour their aduantage with an affured good direction. Both of them were in maruellous danger of their persons, the one in the citie of the Malli-ANS, the other in Spaine, against the sonne of Pompeius. Both of them were by Soothsayers exprefly told of their death, whom they loued and respected. Both of them in the meane space (as it were blindfold) did throw themselves into danger, from the which men would have withdrawne them. But he that will meerely confider the life of either of them, shall find himself in a field, whereof the eye cannot fee the end, nor the divers wayes object vnto it, but remaineth dazled, not knowing whither to point it, he feeth fo many things at once before him. If he come to preferre the life of one before the other, he entreth into an Ocean of discourse, & cannot tell, which of the two he should chuse, nor to what port to go to discharge himselfe of this man here, before the other there; yet to encourage some bodie to saile in this sea, let vs row to the shore: and (to speake plainly without figure) let vs see wherein the one doth passe the other, to leaue the Reader his free judgement of that we will say. At this present I will in few words shew what may be observed most memorable, in the adolescencie of the one and of the other, of their exploits of warre, of their vices and vertues, of their death, and what followed after. I pleade first for Alexander, not mentioning his race, his beautic, nor the sweetnesse of his body, which they speake of so much; all that being nothing worth in respect of vertue: his continencie vnto women, and for that he did moderatly yee the exercises of his bodie, doth so much the more condemne Cafars excesse and frailtie of his youth, doing and suffering filthy things, not to be ripped vp any further. The ambition of Alexander came of a noble minde, as witnefferth that he spake of the running at the games Olympicall, his discourse with the Ambassadors of Persia, and the complaint he made to his companions, that his father would leave him nothing to conquer. Whereas Celar after he had remained sometime in NICOMBDIA & in GRECE, he cast himself into the armes of the common people at Rome, being bountifull, and making orations to gaine their hearts, suing for pettie offices finely to attaine to the greater. To conclude, he tooke a quite contrary course vnto Alexander, who traced the great royall broade way to vertue, to become one day the honor of the world: and had also to his schoole-master the learnedst man of all men, and shewed himselfe indeed a most worthy disciple of Aristotle. But Casar pricked forward by his naturall wit, and tyrannicall manners of his time, was possessed (in an valuckie houre for him and his countrey) with the intollerable vice of self-will and ambition, which was cause of his death. The loue that Alexander bare from his infancie vnto learning and learned men, makes him farre excell other Princes. The honour that he did vnto Homer the Poet, returned againeto himselfe: No the contrary, Casar neuer seemed to care for any man, but for himselfe; or if he have regarded some, or given gold and silver by handsuls, it was but to gaine men, and by degrees to ferue his turne, to raise him to that greatnesse he aimed at, rather then for any other consideration. Now as may be said of the one and the other, he was.

In counfell wife: and valorous in fight.

And to speake truly, it is their true and right title of honour, and the advantage they have of all those that have gone before them: let vs see if we can a litle in particular qualific Alexander.

Asturdie warrier, neuer fearing harmes, And dreadfull to his enemies in armes:

As faith Afchilus: for what was all his warre in As 1A after the death of Philippue, but tempests. extreame heates, wonderfull deepe rivers, maruellous high mountaines, monstrous beasts for greatnesse to behold, wild sauage fashions of life, change and alteration of Gouernors vpon euerie occasion, yea treasons and rebellions of some? At the beginning of his voyage, GRECE did yet lay their heads together, for remembrance of the warres that Philippus made vponthem, the townesgathered together, MACEDONIA inclined to some change and alteration, divers people farre and neare lay in waite to see what their neighbours would do, the gold and filter of PERSIA flowing in the Orators purses, and Gouernors of the people in every town did raise vp Peloponnese: Philippus treasure and coffers were emptie, and the debts were great. In despite of all these troubles, and in the middest of his pouertie, a young man, but newly come to mans estate, durst in his mind thinke of the conquest of Asia, yea of the Empire of the whole world, with thirtie thousand footemen, and fine thousand horse, or (as some other thinke) with fine and fortie thousand footmen, and fine thousand and fine hundred horse; having to entertaine this warre in readic money but two and fortie thousand crownes, or (as Dura writeth) prouision of victuals and money but for thirtie dayes: howbeit he was furnished with magnanimitie, with temperance, with wifdome and valour; being more holpen in this marshall enterprise, with that he had learned of his tutor Aristotle, then with that which his father Philippus had left him: he was armed with a just quarrell against the PERSIANS, sworne enemies vinto GRECE, vnto whom they had done infinite wrongs and iniuries: his magnanimitie and valiantnesse appeared in all his fights, were it in a pitched field, or in assaults, and taking of townes; neuer sparing his person, having bene gricuously wounded in fundrie fights. What valour shewed he in the city of the MALLIANS, he himselfe alone against so many barbarous people: With what constancie did he encourage his surgeons to plucke out a dart that stucke fast in his breaft ? Let no man, faith he, be so faint-hearted nor cowardly; no, not if my life were in question, I could not thinke that a man would believe I feared death, if he had any feeling or feare in my behalfe. Now for a man in twelue yeares space and leffe, to have done these things, and to have travelled a conquerour the most part of the world, is a commendation passing mens vnderstanding. Casar on the contrary part, having made his preparations long before, happily found Crassus to pay his debts he ought, to the end to corrupt the city of Rome: and afterwards, having practifed adangerous league with Pompeius, he taketh armes, and entreth into FRANCE, where his fubtilties did him as good service as his armes:in the meane space, he had his meanes, through whose aide, in the end he ouerthrew the whole state of the commonwealth of Rome. Now Alexander is not so admirable, for that by his prowesse he ouercame his enemics, as he was by the wonderfull wife and verteous behauiour in the middest of his armes, where indeed he shewed himself a perfect Philosopher; whereof it is good to alledge some examples, that shall bring vs to the goodly discourse of the vertues of this Prince, surpassing Cafar in that respect.

Therefore we may see his prowesse accompanied with great instice, a sweet temperance, an excellent bountie, a good order and exquisite wisedome: directing all things by good discretion and ripe judgement. In all his doings you shall hardly discerne, that is a deed of valour, that of humanitie, that of patience: but all his exploits feemed to be mingled and compounded of all the vertues together. Yet it is true, that alwaies in euery action, there is a vertue eminent about the others: but that pointeth them all to one end. In Alexanders actions they fee, that his valiantnes is gentle, and his gentlenesse valiant; his liberalitie husbandrie, his choler soone down, his loues temperate, his passimes not idle, and his trauels gracious. What is he that hath mingled feasting with wars, and militaric expeditions with sports? Who hath intermingled in the middest of his belieging of townes, and in the middest of skirmithes and fights, sports, banquets, and wedding fongs? Who was euer more enemie to those that did wrong, or more gracious to the afflicted? Who was ever more cruell to those that fought, or more just vnto suppliants? Let vs bring forth parses wittie fayings, who being brought prisoner before Alexander, and by him asked how he would be yied: he answered: Like a king. So Alexander following on flill, asked him if he would fav anic thing more: No, faid he, for all is contained in that word onely. And so may they in all Alexanders deeds, to his friends and enemies, at the beginning and end of his life adde too this Like a wise man.

AND IVLIVS CÆSAR.

How lined he? Like a mile man. How caried he himselfe in all his exploits of warre? Like a wile man. How hath he conversed amongst men openly and privatly? Like a wife man. He hath some faults in his behaulour, and we will not forget to speake of them. But as all rules have their exceptions, and yet therefore not to be taken away; and a pimple or wart shall not staine the perfections of the face otherwise verie faire: so Alexanders follies and imperfections cannot take away this honour from him, which wife men giue him. If we would here helpe our selues with examples, we should write that which Plutareb hath so learnedly and briefly gathered out of so manic good authors, who tooke pleafure to do that in the life of Alexander, which they judge Xenophon did in Crrus: to wit, to fet before all men the pattern of a prince complete in all vertues. And whereas Cafar distained his life with a continuall violent desire to subdue his countrie, committing a greater fault in the last warres, and towards the end of his life, then if he had lien with his owne mother: as also this damnable illusion did torment him the night before he entred into ITALIE to violate the libertie of Rome; Alexander was not pricked forward but by vertue it self. to begin a just warre worthy of a great king, not of purpose to set his feet vpon the throats of the GREEKES, but to bring all the world to a peaceable and happie gouernment. His wars made the GREEKES shed no teares. C.e/ar filled all his country with fire and teares. Alexander keeping his fouldiers under obedience, fuffering none of them that followed him to commit any diforders, he brought the barbarous people through the helpe of his friends to be civill, Celar vindid forme of his friends, others for sooke him, he filled Rom with the insolencie of his souldiers, and fowed there the graines of infinite confusions that came out of his bloud. But what hath bene the continencie of Alexander, to whom all things succeeded as he wished: He would not see the Ladies that were prisoners, and through his temperance was as much conqueror of their beauties, (not with standing, he was in the slower of his age, and of a lusty complexion) as of the prowesse of men by his valiantnesse: yea he made lesse account of those women they shewed him, then of those that he neuer saw. And where he was gracious to all forts of people, he shewed himselfe as yntoward to them that were faire. How did he threaten Philoxenus, that would have bought him two boyes of a Merchant of TARENTYM? And if he did love Roxane and Statira, it was because he would lawfully marie them, and for the good of his affaires; and not as Cesar, that forgat himselfe too much in those matters. But furthermore, what praise deserueth Alexander, that will not steale a victorie? O how noble is his courage that would not accept Darius offers: but would needs have GRECE command As IA, as it was requifite! VVhat diligence vied he in following of his enemie? and otherwise what compassion tooke he of the vnworthy death of him?how did he punish Beffue? All his former behauiour sheweth that he had a good and a true kingly mind in him: that he loued not traitors, nor treason, and would not ouercome but with honour, C. e far indeed did purfue Pomper, but he did not punish the murderers, till he had disconered that they conspired against him. Now to make an end of that we have to say for Alexander: we may gather out of the discourse of his life, that the divine providence made a present vnto this Prince of the vertues most apparent in all the other noble GREEKES and ROMANES:

prosperitie, enuironed with flatterers, he was not drunke with his greatnes, he did acknowledge he was mortall, and humbled himselfe many wayes: he is wonderfull patient, beareth the hard words of his familiars: he neither taketh pen nor fword in hand to be reuenged of those that offended him, thinking it a worthie thing in a king to suffer himselfe to be blamed, and to heare ill to do good: Thewing a hartie affection and great honour to his friends, even for their fakes to forbeare his own necessary commodities, to write vnto them familiarly, & to have a speciall care of their persons, and of their affaires. He provided his servants pay of creditors fixe millions of gold due for his fouldiers. He sent out of Asia into Greece the like summe to build temples againe to their gods, in place of those which the Persians had ouerthrowne. To conclude, in the midst of his affaires he shewed an aspiring and inuincible valor, not being faint harted for any danger whatfoeuer. It is true that Cafar in this cafe had many things common with him, as we will tell you hereafter. This notwithstanding Alexander alwayes kept himselfe constant, and after such a manner, that he followed not vice, neither feemed he fo much to blemish his goodly versues as Alexanders vi- the other. Among other vices, they blame Alexander for drunkennesse and choler. I will neither ces, namely cho- excuse the one nor the other in him: but as for this last, there was never Prince that would sooner confesse his faults after he had done them through this vehemencie of his, whereunto he was formwhat giuen by nature: it may be faid also that Clitus, Calisthenes, and some others that felt the force of his anger, were the chiefe cause & motive of it, and had brought the mischiefe you the felues. And to speake the troth, there is no reason that a seruat much made of by his master, shold stands highly upon himself, that he will beare nothing, but wilfully run his head against a stone which he might eafily have avoided, if he could but have kept his tong, and given place to his furie that could prefently vindo him. Euery man will condemne Alexander for his ill viage of the INDIAN fouldiers, coming out of a towne vpon his word given them. And as for the Philosophers, it is a matter whereof formwhat may be faid, wherin they should have bene more spare in their practifes, to have done longer feruice to their countrey, and not to have prouoked fo much a puissant and victorious enemy. And as for the nation of the Cosses Ans, in that he ytterly de. stroyed them for facrifice of the funerals of Hephaltion, it is an vnexcusable fault, what excuse soeuer may be made for it. But the gracious entertainments he gaue Taxiles, and Porus, to fo many nations fubduced to formany townes taken the divers & great honors he gave vnto the captaines of his army, & the ordinarie course of his life wonderfull mercifull, do form what falue the wounds of his vnpremeditated choler, and his exceeding griefe and forow for his fauorites and familiars. The which we must distinguish from the strange hatred that Cofar hid in his heart, against all those that hindred his doings, without regard to any man. And where he pardoned some before & after victory, it was but for his advancemet, not for any good will he bare them: for in Africk he put many of them to death whom he suspected nay he spared not Cato himself after his death. As for the teares he shed taking Pompeyes seale, refusing to see the head of him, nor Theodotus that brought it him: & contrariwife, fauouring the feruants & friends of the dead, & writing goodly letters to Rome, which they call, Killing of his dead enemy; his acts that went before, and followed after, may plainely shew, that all that was but a tragicomedy ceremoniously ended; although otherwise they had had so many matters to deale in together, that it was not possible but that some remainder of the ancient knowledge meeting then in the heart, should stir vp some inward contrariety within: as also it hapneth to men of great courage, that contrary passions meeting together, do flew more without, then remaineth within. The wicked Theodotts descrued no lesse then Besser but Casar was not Alexander, neither went he into AGYPT but for the advancement of his affaires, which could not well be compatied but by the destruction of Pompey: the which when he had obtained, made him forget his dutie openly. For Alexanders drunkennesse, some defirous to excuse it, alledge that he dranke not much, but was long at the table, and spent the time talking with his friends. As they tell of Cato VTIC AN, that he fate at the table with his friends all night long vntil the morning: whereof fome faid that his busines in the commonwealth was cause, which he followed all the day: this hindering him that he had no leisure to go to his booke when night came, he tooke great delight to conferre with learned men at his table. If Alexander after he had trauelled about fo many affaires of the commonwealth, the which he would never leaue vndone to follow his owne pleasures, dranke somewhat liberally among his captaines, yea suppose that he exceeded measure more then once: yet will I not conclude that he made vie of it, and that he deserved the name of a drunkard. I will not excuse the fault he committed at the instance of Lauthe curtifan, not the promise that he made of a prise of six hundred crowns to his Captaines, vnto him that could drinke most: for it is not in glasses and goblets that men should shew their strength. But there died at this quasfing and carrousing, one and forty of his Captaines. And as for himselfe, truly he was too lightly led by Medius, to go drink with him all night, and the next morning: whereupon he fell ficke, and would not forbeare to drinke wine for all that, which cast him into a feauer that left him not. For where they say he was poisoned, it hath no likelihood of reason in it. Be it that this Prince did exceed in drinking, yet that not withftanding, wine must not drown nor bury so many excellent vertues that do shine in him in time of peace and war. Cafars intemperancy in his pleafures, and his vnfatiable ambition, is an extremirie without all comparison more vehement and dangerous then Alexanders choler or cuppe. And as for his death, as the continuance and greatnesse of his glory was pure and vnspotted, free from enuie, during the strength of his age, whilest he lived in this world: so after his death this Alexanders glory held out fill in the wonted maner, he being lumented of all his armie, of all GREECE and death and EVROPE; many royall branches having forung from his fouldiers, leaving the world in division to foure fimple Captaines, whose iffue after them have continued many yeares in possession of their parts. Whereas Cafar to the contrary, having with fo great labour and travell by many obfoure and o'blique waies, attained to the height of a shamefall glory, and which wan him the hatred of the chiefest members of the commonwealth, was immediatly cast downe, little lamented of those that loved good lawes and the good of the state, the which he lest turmoiled with ciuill warres; and which began to make fome flew againe under his nephew, whom the divine providence (having regard to things much more excellent then either heaven or earth) had in his counfell determined to make him Monarch of the world. As to the contrary, Alexander was happily flaved in Baby Lon, where he was told by the divines, the wicked fpirit having (according to the knowledge it pleafed the inst Judge to give him)coniectured and foretold something of that which God had long time before reuealed vnto his by his faithfull Prophet. But yet after Augustus, the Empire of Rom E fell againe into new misfortunes, and was neuer but vnconftant from that time forward, till in the end it funke vnder her owne weight. The like chanced to Alexanders successfors, but not through his fault: and that makes the memory of him more famous. Thus have you all I can fay of him. Let vs speake forthing of Iulius Cafar also, not that I pretend to attaine to that which may be faid of him: for it would require a more fufficient man then my selfe to performe that. But to make some comparison with Alexander, whose deeds he wherein chancing one day to reade of in a booke, he fell a weeping, enuying the brane exploits of the med to exother. Let vs therfore confider if he have done things that came neare, or did excell the other. First of all, vnto all the noble acts that may be written of Alexander in his youth, I do obiect the ander. worthy act of Cafar against the pirats, which were more his prisoners then he theirs, vntowhom cosars he paid ransome in such fort, that he made them repent their folly that they euer medled with youth. him. So that vpon land they found he was very round with them, as also their judge at sea, though he were but a young man in their hands. That is but an example of the rest of his life, who could abide no companion, and much leffe a maifter, as being borne to all great things, and delighting in nothing but to be excellent in all the rarest and highest things of the world : as his deeds did witnesse, after he came to beare office in the commonwealth, euen to the end of his dayes. Now albeit his eloquence is no fmall thing to be spoken of, which did him notable feruice in many troublefome encounters; though it was a wonder to fee the excellency of his file and grace, lively to expresse all things in so fine and goodly terms, that the smoothest Mufes neither would, nor could speake more sweetly then he: yet since we had rather stand vpon good deeds then faire words, let vs passe ouer this matter, so much to support Alexander, and let vs fee whether it may be received for truth of all men of vnderstanding: that Cufar is the most cafars great excellent Captaine that euer was in the world. Albeit that Alexander had but a finall meanes, skilling armes. yet he was Lord of a great kingdome, he had men and credit. But Cefar without patrimonie of much worth, without money and with few men, performed the greatest things that may be thought of. Alexander hadto do with women and children, if one compare the people he fought with, with those whom Casar overthrew: not in five or fixe battels, but in more then fifty, very well ordered, where he was ever the weaker in number of men, but the greater in valour: nener vanquished, but ever victor; and was never hurt that I cantell of, though he would of his enemies, and destroyed the one by the other. Casars ambition was very extreme, but he couered it in another maner of fort then Alexander did:who passing ouer a river, let fall certaine words, plaine enough, that he fought the praise of the ATHENIANS. And the false inventions venture euento his last, and let his steffing as freely as themeanest fouldier of his legions. And yet in the meane time they shall find he was better stayed in his enterprises then Alexander, that like a fwift running streame, would run into any danger, which indifferently joineth with all that comethagainst it. So he was in the heat of his age, and Cafar entred into doings being a man of ripe judgement, and well onwards in yeares. To fay it is a great commendation for a Generall in the field, headlong to put himself into all dangers, making no difference betwixt himself and a common souldier, that is somwhat too forward: and therefore therin I find Cesar to be preferred before Alexander, onely for that he was not fo forward without great necessitie. So that his happinesse defended him in all parts, as also for that Alexander seemed to have sought to be beaten. Shall I tell you that Casar killed a million of enemies, hath triumphed for a million of others and hath made an innumerable number to flie? That in leffe then ten yeares while the warre in GAV LE endured, he wan eight hundred rownes, and subdued three hundred nations? If I should mention the warshe made in fifteen yeares space, it would make a whole booke to speak onely but of the praifes he deserved. The SVVIZZERS, GERMAINES, GAVLES, ROMAINES, ÆGYP-TIANS, AFRICANS, the ASIANS, and his five triumphs of so many enemies, so mighty, and in fliew fo inuincible, do approue his valor and sufficiency in all the parts requisite in a cheftaine of warre. His vertues and happines being his tutors, he got about him a world of good wils of certaine valiant Captaines and fouldiers together, whom he ordered so wel, that he made them ready to performe what he commanded, and having such an vnmatchable cariage towards them. he made them inuincible with him: and in the middest of his continual troubles, he did reade, meditate, spake, wrote, and left behind him the goodliest booke that a martiall man, and one that entertaineth the Muses, can deuise to take in his hands. His Orations were a long time held in great reputation among the ROMANES. And for his respectivnto men learned, valiant, & vertuous, Cafar had renouced himself, if he had shut his gate against such men. The dangers Alexander passed through were great, but what were they in respect of Casars dangers, enuironed with so braue enemies, and in fo great a number, as were the GAV LES, and Pompeys followers? What foule parts have bene played him by some of his owne people, and yet he weighed them not? But to the contrary he suffered some of them to runne what course they liked best: he sent the cariage and goods to other: he alwayes respected and honoured his enemies, when they made no head against him. And by his friends he sent reasonable conditions vnto Pompey, before he would fight with him. Furthermore, when he entred into wars, being greatly in debt, and raifed VP with hope, having the chiefest in Rome his adversaries, he took vpon him to fight with all the enemies abroad, and to make his way in despite of the world to the sourcingnty of Rome, the which he faw had need of a good master, not of so many pettie Lords. His wonderfull foresight ferued him altogether in all occurrences, being neuer prevented in any thing he went about, but alwaies obtained more then he defired. His magnanimity weighed more then any other vertue they could note in him: which is as much as one would fay, that cafar outweighted all the other Captaines of the GREEKES and ROMAINES. He was almost at all the battels: in the warres where he commanded, he was neuer beaten but in his Lieutenants. For the skirmish in the which Pompey on a time had the better, it is not worth the speaking of it: because he could not tell how to follow his victory. And it is a fingular direction, fauoured with a most rare happinesse, that amongst so many blowes given, Cafar never had one given him. If he found favour of Grassus before he went to the warres, that cannot be imputed any blame to him, since he alwayes payed his friends well, and brought his enemies to reason, though they set against him. The vertues If inflice accompanied the prowesse of Alexander, if he have vied moderation, gentlenesse, and perfer and humilitie in his victories, if he shewed himselfe wise and circumspect in his purposes: what the stand of cafar then? Whose gentlenesse is so much spoken of, that men judge that that in war and was one of the occasions of his deat b. His passimes were very serious: and after he began to deale in affaires, he neuer played but in good earnest, and yet would he neuer lose his times of recreation, and his pleafant talke and communication with his friends and familiars. But in the middest of his victories, how did he vse his enemies, and shose that set themselves against him: He was a lightening of warre, that ouerthrew all that durft withftand him: and he neuer medled with any that yeelded without refistance. He was faithfull, wife, valiant, and couragious, and did not allow all kind of meanes to obtaine victorie: although more then once he might have fewed (as they fay) the case of the Foxe, with the skinne of the Lyon.

to make the glory of his name to continue for ever amongst the Indians, do not they discover a most grosse vanitie, which did but labour after that which it could not attainer But Casar desired earnestly, and touched the end of his intentions. His prowesse is wonderfull gracious, and his gentlenesse graue and valiant: his liberalitie so great, that to thinke what he should give, was more then the gift it selfe, how great soeuer. Also he gathered no riches together in the warres, to liue afterwards in deliciousnesse at his pleasure: it was a reward of vertue that he locked vp, to recompence men of valour, and to leave good fouldiers a meane to live by honestly at home, when age and their wounds did constraine them to leaue warres. He was neuer weary of any trauell more then Alexander: and gaue not himselfe to so much ease, though he was clder, slenderer, and thinner of bodie, and subject to the falling sicknesse: but he hardened himself against it by continual exercise of his bodie and mind, accompanied with an incredible quicknesse and diligence. He having left France, and running after Pompeius to Bryndysiym, he fubdued all ITALIE in leffe then three weekes, returned againe from BRVNDVSIVM to ROME: from whence he went to the heart of Spaine, where he ouercame extreame hardnesse in the war against Afranius and Petreius, and at the long siege of MARSEILLES. From thence he returned into MACEDONIA, wan the battell of PHARSALIA, and followed Pompeius into AGYPT. which he subdued also. After that he came into Syria, and into the kingdome of Pont, where he fought with Pharnaces: from thence into Africk E, where he ouercame Scipio and Iuba, Afterwards he returned against hrough ITALIE and SPAINE, and there overcame the fonne of Pompeius. Now weightherewithall the trauels, fights, conquests and expeditions of Alexander: then fay plainely, what you think of it: Cafar caried it by much. The onely wars of the GAVLES haue bene more sharp and dangerous then all the conquests of Asia and the Indians. For it is not in passing oner mountaines and rivers ill guarded, that she wes the deeds of men: it is to ouercome a subtill and puissant enemie. But I pray you, these words of Casar to the Maister of the Brigantine (who vnleffe they had known him, would have paffed him from Apollonia to BRYN DYSIVM) were they not more swelling then the sea it selfs courage my friend, said he, saile hardily: for thou carieft Cafar & his fortune. And that which he faid paffing ouer the river of Rubiconto enter into ITALIE: Aman can be but once undone : what a courage did he shew in that? Truly a mind, that from thence did behold death, and cared for no more, but for the execution of his counsels. If a man observe the directions of Alexander in his exploits, what is that in respect of the wisdome of Casar? being wont to say, he loued victorie gotten by counsell more then by force. I know that Alexander was adorned with most excellent vertues, and hurt with very few knowne vices. For therin it feemeth he hath lattifed vp Cafar, and many others of the chiefest in the Greek e and Romaine historicalthough I cannot dissemble also, that he was led by flatterers and women too: witneffe that which he did at the instigation of Lais and of his minions. As also that his deeds were but wind: dangerous vices in all men, but especially in Princes: from which Cafar kept himself with better understanding. But if we bring in shew the good vnderstanding, the spirit, the judgement, the conduct, the profound knowledge, the eloquence, the hardinesse, the greatnesse of courage, the more then humane boldnesse in the middest of the greatest dangers: the trauels, the paines, the bounty, the gentlenesse, the curtesie, the liberality, and the good fortune of C. far: we shall have enough to speake of. They object this against him, that among the Senators and others which tooke Pompeius part, he spared them that could not much hurt him; and others whom he thought he could not gaine, he ouercame the in Africk. But Brutus, Cassius, and his adherents shew, that Casar sought nothing else but to carie himselfe gracioufly, if his ill-willers would have let him alone. And fure it is very likely, that if they had borne with him but a while longer, matters had not gone on with fuch a violent course as they did after his death:but the estate of Rome had bene governed with better policie, and the ambition of this great person having attained his defire, had bene satisfied, & would have fallen of himselfe. For whereas he did leane to the flatteries of Balbus and Antonius, to disdaine the Senar, and to couet the markes and fignes of royall dignitie, these were but the blasts of this wicked vices. wind, which fuch dangerous bellowes entertained & kept in his heart. Now in this he cannot be

THE LIFE OF Phocion.

He Orator Demades on a time flourished in ATHENS, because in all his doings and fayings in the administration and government of the common-wealth, he alwayes fauoured the MACEDONIANS and Antipater in respect whereof he was eftsoones compelled, both in his counsell and lawes, to preferre many things to the difhonour of his ciry, faying, that they must pardon him, because he governed the shipwracks of his coun- pem des try. This was an arrogain speech but yet referring it to the government arms me of Phocion, he faid truly. For indeed Domades felie was the shipwracke. Toping. of the commonwealth, because he lived so insolently, and governed so lewdly. Infomuch as Antipater faid of him, after he was very old: that there was nothing left of him, no more then of a beaft facrificed, but the tongue and belly. But the vertues of Photos which had to fight against the cruell and bitter enemie of the time, were so obscured by the calamities of GREECE, that his fame was nothing fo great as he deferred. For we mult not credit Sophocles words, making vertue of it felfe but weake, in these verses:

> When stormes of fore adversities (o king) do men affaile, It dannts their courage, outs their combes, and makes their bearts to quarle.

But we must onely give place to fortune, who when she frownerh upon any good and vertuous man, her force is fo great, that where they deferne honor and fauour, the violently heapeth falle The new r and malicious accufations against them, which maketh their vertue lame, and not of that credite of vertue which indeed it deferueth. And yet it feemeth to many, that free cities are most crueil vneo their time. good citizens in time of prosperitie: because thay flow in wealth and line are ase, which maketh them of haughry minds. Bur it is clean contrary. For aductifity commonly maketh mens maners. Astrofity fowre, cholericke, and very halfi the fides, flow to heare, churlifh, and offended with enery livle mod to ibarpe word. For he that correcteth them that offend, feemeth to cast their adaersity in their tectionand he thattelleth them plainly of their faults, feemeth alfo to despise them. For like as homy fweete by nature, applied vn.o wounds, doth bring both finart and paine: each fo, fharpe words, though profitable, do bite the infortunate man, if they be not tempered with differetion and courtefic. And therefore Homer the Poet calleth fweete and pleafan: things paround; as yeeldiag, and not firiting with contrariety, against that part of the mind, whereby we be angry excused. On the contrary side, they cannot too much condemne this passion of his, which sustin ciently appeared in the first voyage he made into Spaine: when passing by a pelting village, he preferred the first place in that to the second in Rom E. This passion increased in him ever after. fo mightily ouerruling all the rest, & so absolutely possessing his mind, that it carried him whither vntil that his fierce horse cast him on the ground, and brake his neck. Yea, so many victories and triumphs drew him not for all that to feek restibut (as Alexander failed vp & downethe Ocean. during his last sicknes, and some hours before his death)he embraced greater wars & conquests then before. For that he did in reforming the Kalender, and the enterprise of so many buildings and works for the commonwealth, sheweth, that that mind was a bow euer bent. For his voluptuousnes, peraduenture it will not become vs to speak of it; and we were better with filence and it would, and made him that without respect of his country or of himself he neuer left running.

fhame lament mans imperfection, then in descrying of noble persons, content those that are neuer merry, but when one feedeth their malice. The ambition wher with he was infinitly wounded.coming to fight with this wickednesse after women, made him quickly leaue the haunt, vtterly to fubdue it afterwards: to the end that his pleasures should neuer make him steale a minute of an houre, nor to remoue one foot from the occasions offered him to raise him to greatnes. As for his death, it was violent indeed, but practifed by the most part of them to whom he hadgiuen life, and who continued not long after him. It is true, his high cariage of himfelf was cause of his death: for nothing wanted to his happinesse, but to loue his city, and to continue to be more carefull then he was to please the Senate and people, as he had begun after his fine triguitin, and ofterwards umphs, pardoning all, raising one and other to offices in the commonwealth, and setting up againe the statues of Pompey. Now being fallen againe into this desperate desire to be yet greater. he made fo many offended with him, that diverse put that in execution, which one man alone could not easily hauc brought to passe. But yet he haththat more then Alexander, that his death was reuenged. To the contrary, Alexanders mother, wines, and children made a poore end; his armic remained as a body without a head, and he had a good grace that compared it to Cyclope Polypheme, when Vlisses had put out his eye. His Captaines and successours denoured one another by long warres. As for c_{α} far, he lived still in the person of his succession Augustus, who having ouercome a world of hard aduentures, established a Monarchy: the which in despite of a million of tempests, hath continued many hundreds of yeares. And specially the name of Casar, by excellent priviledge hath remained vnto those that after him reigned in the Empire of Rome: and his valiantnesse was, and yet is to this day defired of all men, that by valorous exploits seeke precedencie to win to their name immortall praise and glory. You looke here, Reader, to sec to which of the two I should give the precedencie: but since the world hath bene too litle for the one and the other, I should go too farre if I plainely spake what I thought. Now that I have spoken for the other, I ceasse, and leave you to your judgement.

and froward. For even as fore eyes do like to look on black and dark colours, and cannot abide the bright and glaring: foin a city, where for want of forefight and government, things go not well, men be so divers and vnwilling to heare of their own faults and estate, that they had rather continue in their folly and danger, then by sharpnes of words be rebuked and restored. So that it being ynpossible to amend one fault with a greater, that commonwealth must be in great danger, that when it hath most need of helpe, is lothest to receive any: and he also hazardeth himfelfe, that plainly telleth them their faults. Like as ther fore the Mathematician faith, that the Sun dothnot altogether follow the motio of the highest heaven nor yet is moved directly contrary. but fetching a copasse a litle ouerthwart, maketh an oblique circle, & by variety of approching and departing preserueth all things, and keepeth the world in good temperature: euen so, too se. tiere gouernment, contrarying the peoples minds in all things, is not good as also it is martiellous dangerous not to correct offenders when they offend, for feare of the peoples displeasure. But the meane, sometime to yeeld vnto the people to make them the more willing to obey, and to grant them things of pleasure, to demand of them againe things profitable, that is a good way to gouerne men the better by. For by gentle meanes they are brought to do many profitable things, when they feeke it not of them by rigor and authority. Indeed this meane is very hard to be observed, because authoritie is hardly tempered with lenity. But when they meet together. there is no harmony more mufical, nor concordance more perfect then that: & therfore it is faid that thereby God doth gouerne the world, working rather a voluntary then a forced obedience in men. But this fault of seuerenes was in Cato the yonger, for he could not fashion himselfe to the peoples maners, nor did they like his:neither did he win his estimation in the comonwealth by flattering of them and therfore Cicero faid, that he was put by the Confulfhip, for that he behaued himself as though he lived in the comonwealth devised by Plato, and not amongst the disordered and corrupt posterity of Romulus. Me thinketh I can liken him properly vnto vntimely fruit; the which though men do take pleasure to see and wonder at yet they eat them not. Euen for the ancient of fimplicity of Catoes maner (having folong time bin out of vie, and coming then plaine man to shew it self in that corrupt time & ill maners of the city) was indeed much praise worthy but ner vecame yet not the convenientest, nor the fittest for him, because it answered nor respected not the vse and maners of the time. For he found not his country (as Phocion did) vtterly destroyed, buttoffed in a dangerous tempest: & being not of authority like the pilot to take the sterne in hand, and gouern the ship, he took himself to tricking the sailes, & preparing the tackle, so to assist men of greater power. And yet being in no greater place, he so thwarted fortune (which seemed to have Iworn the ouerthrow of the state of Rome) that with much ado, with great difficulty, & a long time after, the executed her malice. And yet the commonwealth had almost gotten the victory of her, by meanes of Cato and his vertue; with whom I do compare the vertue of Phocion, who yet in my opinion were not in all things alike neither in their honesty, nor policy of gouernment. For there is difference betwixt manhood and manhood, as there was betwixt that of Alcibiades and that of Epaminondas; betwixt wisdome and wisdome, as betwixt that of Aristides, and that of Themifocles: and betwixt inflice and inflice, as betwixt that of Numa, and that of Agefilans. But the vertues of these men(to him that shall superficially regard, and lightly consider them) seeme all one in quality, in maner, and vie, both alike in temperance of curtefie with feuerity, and manhood with wildome: a valiant care for other, with prefence of courage and fecurity of mind for themselues, abhorring all filthines and corruption, and imbracing constancy and loue of instice: that for any man to different the difference between them, it requireth an excellent good wit & iudgement. Now touching Cato, euery man knoweth that he was of a noble house, as we will The paren. flew you hereafter in his life but for Phocion, I geffe he came of no base parentage. For if he had bin the fon of a spoonmaker, as Idomeneus testifieth, Glaucippus the son of Hyperides, having in an inuective he wrote against him, rehearsed all the mischieses he could of him, he would not have forgotten to have vpbraided him with his base parentage; neither he himselfalso (if that had bin true) had bene so well brought vp as he was. For when he was but a yong man, he was Platoes scholer, and afterwards Xenocrates scholer, in the schoole of Academia and so, even from his first beginning, he gaue himselfe to follow them that were learned. For as Duris writeth, neuer A-THENIAN faw him weepe nor laugh, nor wash himselfe in any common bath, nor his hands out of his fleeues when he wore a long gowne. For when he went to the warres, he would alneuer wept wayes go on foot, and neuer wore gowne, vnleffe it were extreme cold; and then the souldiers to mocke him withall, would fay it was a figne of a fharpe winter, when they faw Phocion in his gowne. Now though indeed he was very courteous and gentle of nature, yethe had such a photions grimme looke withall, that no man had any defire to talke with him, but fuch as were of his familiar acquaintance. And therefore when Chares the Orator, one day mocking him for the bending of his browes, and that the ATHENIANS fell in a laughter withall: My maisters, quoth Phocion, the bending of my browes hath done you no hurt, but the foolery and laughing of rhese flatterers haue made ye oftentimes weepe. Furthermore, his manner of speech was very profitable, for the good sentences and counsels he vttered; but it was mixed with an imperious, austere, and bitter shortnesse. For as Zeno the Philosopher saith, that the wise man should temper his words with wit and reason, before he vtter them: euen so was Phocions speech, the which in few words comprehended much matter. And thereupon it seemeth that Polyenetus SPHETTIAN faid, that Demosthenes was an excellent Orator, but in speech Phocion was very wittie. For like as coines of gold or filuer, the lighter they weigh, the finer they be of goodnes: euen fo the excellencie of speech consisteth in signifying much by few words. And touching wierein this matter, it is reported that the Theater being full of people, Phocion walked all alone vpon excellencis this matter, it is reported that the Theater being this of people with himselfe: whereupon, one of people the scaffold where the players played, and was in a great muse with himselfe: whereupon, one of people the scaffold where the players played, and was in a great muse with himselfe: whereupon, one of his friends feeing him fo in his muses, said vnto him, Surely Phocion, thy mind is occupied about somewhat. Indeed it is so, said he: for I am thinking with my selfe, if I could a bridge any thing of that I haue to fay to the people. For Demostheres selfe little esteeming all other Orators, when Phocion rosevp to speake, he would round his friends in the cares, and told them: See, the cutter of my words rifeth. Peraduenture he meant it by his manners alfo. For when a good man speaketh, not a word onely, but a wink of the eye, or a nod of his head, doth counteruaile many artificiall words and speeches of Rhetoritians. Furthermore, when he was a yong man, he went to the warres under Captaine Chabrias, and followed him: of whom he learned to be a perfect for foundifouldier, and in recompence therof, he reformed many of his Captaines imperfections, & made erface. him wifer then he was. For Chabrias otherwise being very dull and slothfull of himselfe, when he came to fight, he was so hore and couragious, that he would thrust himselfe into danger with the desperatest persons: and therefore for his rashnesse it afterwards cost him his life in the citie of Chio, where launching out with his galley before the rest, he pressed to land in despite of his enemies. But Phocion being wife to looke to himfelfe, and very quick to execute; on the one fide quickned Chabrias flownesses and on the other fide also, by wisedome cooled his heate and fury. Chabrias therfore, being a good man and courteous, loued Phocion very well, and did prefer him in matters of service, making him famous amongst the GRECIANS, and employed him in his hardest enterprises. For by his meanes he atchieued great fame and honor in a battell by sea, which he wanne by the Ile of Naxos, giving him the left wing of his armie, on which fide the fight was sharpest of all the battell, and there he soonest put the enemies to slight. This battell The visitors being the first which the citie of ATHENS wanne with their owne men onely, after it had bene of Chabrias taken, gaue the people cause to loue Chabrias, and made them also make account of Phocion as on in the of a noble fouldier, and worthy to have charge. This victory was gotten on the feast day of the "le of Naxgreat mysteries, in memory whereof Chabrias did yearely in the sixteenth day of the moneth Bodromion (now called August) make all the people of ATHENS drinke. After that time Chabrias fending Phocion to receive the tribute of the Handers their confederates, and the ships which they should send him, he gaue him twenty gallies to bring him thither. But Phocion then (as it is reported) fayd vnto him: If he fent him to fight with his enemies, he had need to have more ships; but if he fent him as an Ambassador vnto his friends, then that one ship would ferue his turne. So he went with one galley onely; and after he had spoken with the cities, and courteoufly dealt with the governors of every one of them, he returned backe, furnished of their eonfederates, with agreat fleete of ships and money, to carry vnto Athens. So Phocion did not only reuerence Chabrias while he liued, but after his death also he tooke great care of his friends and kinsmen, and sought to make his sonne Ctesippus an honest man, whom though he saw very wild and vntoward, yet he neuer left to reforme him, and hide his fault. It is faid also, that when this young man did trouble him much with vaine friuolous questions, seruing then vnder him, he being Captaine, and taking vpon him to giue him counfell, to reproue him, and to teach him the duty of a Captaine, he could not but fay: O Chabrias, Chabrias, now do I pay for the loue thou diddeft beare me when thou wert aliue, in bearing with the folly of thy fonne. But when he faw that the heads of the citie of ATHENS had (as it were) by lot divided among themselves the offices of warre and peace; and that some of them, as Ebulus, Aristophon, Demosthenes, Lycurgus and Hyperides were common speakers and preferrers of matters in councels and Senate: and that others, as Diophites, Menestheus, Leofthenes and Chares became great men by the warres, and had charge of armies; he determined rather to follow the manner of goucrnment of Pericles, Arifides and Solon, as being mingled of both. For either of them feemed (as the Poet Archilocus faith,)

PHOCION.

To be both champions stout, of Marses warlike band, Und of the Muses eke, the arts to understand.

He knew also that Pallas the goddeffe and protector of ATHENS, was called Polemica, and Poli. tica, to wit, skilfull to rule both in warre and peace. So, having thus disposed of himselfe in gouernment, he alwayes perswaded peace and quietnesse, and yet was often chosen Captaine, and had charge of armies, being the onely man that of all the Captaines afore him, and in his time. did neuer fue for charge, neither yet refused it at any time, when he was called to serue the commonwealth. It is certaine that he was chosen fine and forty times Prætor, and was alwaies absent at the elections, but yet fent for. Whereupon all the wifemen wondered to fee the maner of the people towards him, confidering that Phocion had never done nor faid any thing to flatter them withall, but commonly had been against their defires: and how they yied other gouernours notwithstanding, that were more pleasant and delightfull in their orations, like men to sport at . as it is faid of kings, who after they have washed their hands to go to their meate, do vieto have iesters and flatterers to make them merry: but on the other side, when they had occasion of wars indeed, how then like wife men they would bethinke themfelues, and chuse the wifest and stontest man of the citie, and that most would withstand their mindes and desires. For on a timean Oracle of Apollo Delphias, being openly read before them, which faid, that all the other ATHE-NIANS being agreed, yet there was one among them that was contrary to all the rest of the cirv-Phocion stepping foorth before them all, bad them neuer seeke further for the man, for it was he notable fay that liked none of all their doings. Another time he chanced to fay his opinion before all the people, the which they all praifed and approued: but when he faw they were so suddenly become of his mind, he turned back to his friends, and asked them: alas, hath not some euill thing slipped my mouth vnwares? Another time a generall collection being gathered of the people at A-THENS, towards the folemnizing of a facrifice; other men of his state having payed their part, he was often also called vpon to pay his: but he answered them againe, Aske them that be rich. for it were a shame for me to give you any thing; being yet in this mans debt, pointing to callicles the viurer, who had lent him money. But when they left him not for all this, to crie out ypon him for the contribution, he began to tell them this tale: That on a time there was a coward preparing to go to the warres, and as he was ready to depart, he heard the rauens what a crying they made, and taking it for an ill figne, he put off his harneffe, and kept him at home. After that he put on his harnesse againe, and went on his way toward the campe, the rauens began againe to make a goodlier crie behind him: but thereupon he stayed straight, and at length said: Ye shall crooke as loud as ye list, before ye feed on my carcasse. Another time the ATHENIANS being in warre vnder his charge, would needs have him to leade them to give charge vpontheir enemies, bur he would not. Thereupon they called him coward, and faid, he durft not. Well faid he againe, It is not you can make me valiant, no more then my felfe can make you cowards and yet one of vs know another. Another time in a maruelous dangerous time, the people handled him very churlifhly, and would needs have him prefently deliver account of his charge: but he answered them, O my friends, first faue your schees. Furthermore, the people being very lowly and humble, for feare, in time of warres; and prefently in peace againe waxing braue in words against Phocion, charging him that he had taken the victory out of their hands, he onely faid this to them: You are happie that have a Captaine that knowes you, elfe you would fing a new fong. Another time there was a quarrell betwixt the Boectians and them, about their bounds and frontiers, the which they would not trie by law, but by battell: But Phocion told them, they did they wist not what, and counselled them rather to fight it out in words, in which they were the ftronger, and not with weapons, where they were the weaker. Another time they fo much misliked his opinion in the assembly, that they would not abide to heare him, nor fuffer him to speake. Well, my Maisters, quoth he then, you may make me do that which is not to be done: but you shall neuer compell me against my mind, to say that which is not to be spoken. He would as gallantly also gird the Orators his aduersaries, when they were busie with him. As on a time he answered Demosthenes, that sayd vnto him: The people, Phocion will kill thee one day, and if it take them in the heads: Yea thee, quoth he, if they be wife. Againe, when Polyentitus Sphettian, in a hot day perswaded the people of Athens to make warre with king philip, sweating, and with much ado fetching his breath, being a fat man, that he was driven oftentimes to drinke water, to end his oration: Surely faid Photion, ye shall do maruellous wifely. to make warre at fuch a mans motion. Why, what thinke ye will he do, when he hath his curates and his target vpon him, and that the enemies be ready to fight: that now in making an oration onely before you, which he hath studied long before, is almost stifled? Another time also when Lycurgus in his oration had openly reproued him for many things before the people, and among the rest, for that Alexander demanding ten citizens of ATHENS to do with them what he thought good, that he had counfelled them to deliuer them: Phocion answered him, I haue oftentimes counfelled them for the best, but they would neuer follow my counsell. There was one Archibiades at that time in ATHENS, that counterfeited the LACED EMONIAN, with a maruellous long beard, a beggarly cloake, and a fower looke. Phocion being checkt one day before the people, appealed vnto Archibiades for a witnesse, to confirme that he spake. But he rifing vp, counfelled the people contrarily, to flatter them withall. Phocion perceiuing it, tooke him by the beard, and faid vnto him: Alas Archibiades, why diddeft thou not then clip thy heard, seeing thou wouldest needs flatter? There was another great pleader, one Aristogiton, Aristogiton, 4 that in all the affemblies of the Citie, did nothing but buzze warres continually in their eares, Syrophans, and Afterwards when men were to be leauied and mustered, and their names entred that should go to the warres, Aristogiton came halting into the market place with a staffe in his hand, and both his legs bound vp, to make the people beleeue that he was ficke and diseased. Phocion spying Aristogiton farre off, cried out to the clearke that wrote the bils: Put in Aristogiton, lame, and impudent. So that oftentimes it makes me muse, how, or wherefore so sharpe and seuere a man (as by these examples it appeareth he was) could come to the surname of good. Notwithstan- Phocion called ding, in the end I find it a hard thing, but not impossible, that a man should be like wine, both by furname good. fweete and sharpe together: as there are others to the contrary, that at the first fight, seeme very courteous and gentle of conversation, and woon better acquaintance, prove churlish & dogged. It is reported also, that Hyperides the Orator one day should say to the ATHENIANS: I pray you (my Lords) note me not for my sharpnesse, but consider if my sharpnesse be without profit. As who should fay, men are not troublesome, but for couctousnesse onely, and as if the people did not rather feare and hate them, that of infolencie and malice, did abuse and contemne their authority, Phocion on the other fide, neuer did citizen hurt, for any private malice he bare him: but was euer sharpe and cruell to them which were against any matter he preferred for the benefit of the commonwealth. For in all other things, he shewed himselfe maruellous lowly and courteous to euery body, and would be familiar with his aduerfaries, and helpe them if they wanted, or were otherwife in danger of displeasure with the state. Insomuch as his friends therefore reproued him on a time, when he spake in the behalfe of a naughty man, an offender: O said he, honest men need no helpe. Another time, Aristogiton the Sycophant, being clapped up in prifon, fent vnto Phocion to pray him to come and speake with him, after he was condemned. Phocion went into the prison to him, and when his friends perswaded him to the contrary, he answered them: O let me alone, fayd he, for where could I fee Arifogiton more gladly then in prison? Furthermore, when there went any army to sea out of ATHENS, if there were any other chosen Generall but Phocion, the townes and Hands all alongst the sea coast (which were friends and confederates of the ATHENIANS) fortified their wals, filled up their hauens, and brought their wines, flaues, and cattell, and all their goods into their townes and cities, as if they had bene enemics, and open war proclaimed. Contrarily also, if Phocion had bin Captaine and Generall, they would fend out their ships to the sea to meete him afarre off, crowned with garlands in token of common ioy, and so would bring him to their cities. King Philip secretly seeking to win the Ile of Evbon, fent an army thither out of Macedon, and entifed the townes by tyrants to rebell: whereupon Plutarke ERETRIAN prayed aide of the ATHENIANS, to take this Iland from the MACEDONIANS, which they daily wanne more and more, if they came not presently to aide them. So Phocion was fent Generall thither, but with a few men onely, because they made him (though he defired it) to campe without the wals of their city, but opening their gates, received him in, and mingled the ATHENTANS amongst them. Who, perceiving how much the citizens trusted them, did so honestly behaue themselues in their conversation amongst into Eubera.

Phocian perfina-

Photomiourney account the men of that countrey would fraight joyne with him, for the good will they bare him. But when he came thither he found them all traytors, and rebels, and bribed with king phi lips money, which he lauished out amongst them: so that he was brought into great danger . Thereupon he retired to a litle hillseucred from the plaine of TAMINES with a great large valley, and there fortified himselfe with that litle army he had. Then he perswaded his Captaines not to care for all those rebels, pratlers, and cowards which fled out of their tents, and for soke their enfignes and Captaines, but that they should let them go out of the campe where they the musino infole would, For, faid he, such disobedient fouldiers here will do vs no feruice, and increouer will hinder them that have good will to ferue well: and at home also, knowing themselves in fault, for that they for fooke the campe without licence, they dare not complaine vpon vs. Afterwards when the enemies came to fet vpon him, he commanded his men to arme, and put themselues either because he could have no lucky fignes of the facrifices, or else for that he would draw his enemies nearer. Thereupon Plutarke ERETRIAN supposing he deferred to march for feare, went himselfe first into the field, with certaine light horsemen he had in pay. Then the men of armes feeing them give charge, could hold no longer, but followed him also, ftragling out of the campe one after another diforderly, and fo did fet vpon their enemies. The first being ouerthrowne, all the other dispersed themselues, and Plutarke himselse sled. Then certaine bands of the enemies thinking all had bene theirs, followed them even into their campe, and came to throw downe their rampiers. In the meane time, Phocion having ended his facrifice, the ATHE-Photions villo- NIANS came out of their campe, and fet vpon them, and made part of them flie immediatly, and part of them also they slue hard by the trenches of their campe. Then Phogion commaunded that the battell should stand stil, to receive their men that were scattered up & downe the fields: in the meane space he himselfe, with the choisest men of his army, gaue charge upon the enemies. The fight was cruell betweene them. For the ATHENIANS fought very valiantly, venturing their persons: but of them all, two young men fighting by their Generall (Glaucus the sonne of Polymedes, and Thallus the sonne of Cineas) carried the praise away. And so did Cleaphanes that day also shew himselfe very valiant. For he crying out still upon the horsemen that fled, and perswading them to come and helpe their Generall that was in danger, brought them backe againe, and thereby got the footmen the victorie. After this battell, he draue Plutarke out of ERETRIA, and tooke the castell of ZARETRA, standing in a very commodious place for this warre, where the He draweth to a ftraightnesse, enuironed on either side with the sea and would not fuffer his men to take any GRECIANS prisoners, fearing left the Orators at ATHENS might moue the people, suddenly in a rage, to put them to death. After all these things were done, Phocion returned backe to Athens. But then did the confederates of the Athenians straight wish for his instice and courtesie: and the Athenians themselves also knew his skilfulnesse and manhood. For his fucceifor Moloffus, that was Generall for the rest of the warre, dealt so vndiscreetly, that he himselfe was taken prisoner there. Then king Philip being put in maruellous great hope, went with all his army into Hellespont, perswading himselfe, that he should straight take all Cherronesvs, the Cities of Perinth and Bizantivm. The Athenians thereupon determining to fend aide, to preuent king Philips comming, the Orators made great fute, that Chares might be chosen Captaine: but he being sent thither with a good number of thips, did no service worthic commendation, neither would the Cities receive his nauie into their hauens: but being suspected of enery man, and despised of his enemies, he was driven to faile vp and downe, and to get money of the allies. The people being incenfed by the Orators, were maruelloufly offended, andrepented themselves that they had sent aide vnto the Bizan-TIMES. Then Phocion rifing vp, spake vnto the people, and told them, that it was no reason that mistrusting their confederates, they should be offended with them: but to be angry with their Captaines that deserved to be missrusted. For they said he, do make your confederates asraid of you, who without you notwithstanding cannot saue themselves. The people changing their minds by his oration, made Phocion against heir Captaine, and fent him with an army into vertue and authority in BIZANTIVM, having before bene Phocions companion and familiar in the Academy, made fute for him vnto the City. Then the BIZANTINES would not fuffer in readinesse, and not to stirre vitill he had done facrifice but he stayed long before he came. HELLESPONT to helpe their confederates there, which was of great importance to faue the City of BIZANTIVM. Furthermore, Phocions fame was fo great, that Cleon, the greatest man of them, that they gaue them no manner of cause to complaine of them; and shewed themselues fo valiant befides in all battels and conflicts, that Philip (which before was thought dreadfull and inuincible, every man being afraid to fight any battell with him) returned out of HeL-LESPON'T without any thing done, and to his great discredite: where Phecion wanne someof lipeat of his ships, and recourred againe the strong holds, in the which he had placed his garrisons. Hellespont. Furthermore, making diverse invasions into his countries, he destroyed his borders: till that at length he was fore hurt there, and so driven to return home againe, by meanes of a great army photion that came against him to defend the countrey. Shortly after, the MEGARIANS secretly sent vin- isyned Meto him, to deliuer their city into his hands. Phocion fearing if the Bo for ians understood it. gara pato that they would preuent him, he called a common affembly early in the morning, and told the people what message the MEGARIANS had sent vnto him. The people vpon this motion being determined to aide them, Phocion ftraight founding the trumpet at the breaking vp of the affembly, gaue them no further leifure, but to take their weapons, and so led them incontinently to MEGARA. The MEGARIANS receiving him, Phocion that up the hauch of NISEA, and brought two long wals from the city vnto it, and so ioyned it vnto the sea: whereby he stood not greatly in fearcofhis encinies by land; and for the lea, the Athenians were Lords of it. Now when the Athenians had proclaimed open warre against king Philip, and had chosen other Captaines in his absence, and that he was returned from the Iles, about all things, he perswaded the people (king Philip requiring peace, and greatly fearing the danger) to accept the conditions of peace. Then one of these busic Orators that was still accusing one or other, faid vnto him: Why Phocion, how dareft thou attempt to turne the Athenians from warre. having now their fwords in their hands? Yestruly, faid Phocion: though in warre I know I shall command thee, and in peace thou wilt command me. But when the people would not hearkento him, and that Demosthenes caried them away with his perswasions, who counselled them to fight with king Philip, as farre from ATTICA as they could: I pray thee friend, quoth Phocion vnto him, let vs not dispute where we shall fight, but consider how we shall ouercome; the which if we can fo bring to paffe, be fure we shall put the warre farre inough from vs. for menthat are our come, be cuer in fear cand danger, where focuer they be. When the ATHENI-ANS had loft a battell against Philip, the seditious Orators, that hunted after innouation, preferred Charidemus to be chosen Generall of the ATHENIANS: whereupon the Magistrates and Senators being afraid, and taking with them all the Court and Senate of the Areopagits. they made such earnest suite to the people, with the teares in their eyes, that at last (but with much ado) they obtained, that the affaires of the city might be put into Phocions hands and gouernment. He thought good to accept the articles and gentle conditions of peace which Philip offered them. Butafter that the Orator Demades moued, that the city of ATHENS Would enter into the common treatie of peace, and common affembly of the states of GRECE, procured at king Philips request, Phocion would not agree to it, vntill they might understand what demands Philip would make at the affembly of the GRECIANS. When his opinion through the peruerinesse of time could not be liked of them, and that he saw the Athenians soone after repented them that they did not follow his counsell, when they heard they should furnish king

Philip with ships and horsemen: then he told them; the feare whereof ye now complaine, made me to withftand that, which now ye have consented vnto. But fithence it is fo that you have now past your consents, you umst be contented, and not be discouraged at it: remembring that your ancestors in times past have fometime commanded, and otherwhile obeyed others; and yet haue so wisely and discreetly gouerned themselues in both fortunes, that they have not onely faued their city, but all GRECE befides. When newes came of king Philips death, the people for ioy would straight haue made bonfires and facrifices to the gods for the good newes:

fes of Homer:

but Phocion would not fuffer them, and faid, that it was a token of a base mind, to reioyce at the strain mane any mans death, and befides that, the army which ouerthrew you at CH ERONEA, hath not yet hart flowlost but one man. And when Demosthenes also would commonly speake ill of Alexander, and ethabase specially when he was neare There's with his army, Phoeion rehearsed voto him these ver-

How great a folly is it for to stand Against a cruell king, Which being arm'd, and having foordin hand, Seckes fame of enery thing?

What, when there is fuch a great fire kindled, wilt thou cast the city into it? For my part therefore, though they were willing, yet will I not fuffer them to cast themselues away: for to that end haue I taken vpon me this charge and gouernement. And afterwards also, when Alexander had razed the citie of Thebes, and had required the Athenians to deliver him Demosthenes. Lyourgus, Hyperides, and Charidemus; and that the whole affembly and councell not knowing what answer to make, did all cast their eyes vpon Phocion, and cried vnto him to say his o. pinion: he then rose vp, and taking one of his friends vnto him called Nicocles, whom he loued and trusted aboue all men else, he said thus openly vnto them: These men whom lexander requireth, haue brought this citie to this extremitie, that if he required Nicocles here. I would give my consent to deliver him: for I would thinke my selfe happy to lose my life. for all your fafety. Furthermore, though I am right heartily forry (faid he) for the poore affi-Sted THEBANS, that are come vnto the citie for succour: yet I assure you, it is better one citie mourne, then two. And therefore I thinke it is best to intreate the conquerour for both, rather then to our certaine destruction to fight with him that is the stronger. It is said also that Alexander refused the sirst decree which the people offered him vpon Phocions request, and fent away the Ambassadours, and would not speake with them. But the second which Phecion himselfe brought, he tooke, being told by his fathers old feruants, that king Philip made great accompt of him: whereupon Alexander did not onely give him audience, and grant his request. but further followed his counsell. For Phocion perswaded him, if he loued quietnesse, to leave warre: if he defired fame, then that he should make warre with the barbarous people, but not with the Grecians. So Phocion feeding Alexanders humour with fuch talke and discourse Athenians, as he thought would like him best, he so altered and softned Alexanders disposition, that when he went from him, he willed him that the ATHENIANS should looke to their affaires, for if he should die, he knew no people fitter to command then they. Furthermore, because he would be better acquainted with Phocion, and make him his friend, he made so much of him, that he more honoured him then all the rest of his friends. To this effect, Duris the historiographer writeth, that when Alexander was growne very great, and had ouercome king Darius, he left out of his letters this word Chærin (to wit, ioy and health) which he vsed commonly in all the letters he wrote; & would no more honor any other with that maner of falutation, but Phocion and Antipater. Chares also writeth the same. And they all do confesse, that Alexander sent Phocion a great gift out of Asia, of a hundred filter talents. This mony being brought to Athens, Phocion asked them that brought it, why Alexander gaue him fuch a great reward, aboue all the other citizens of ATHENS. Because said they, he onely esteemed thee to be a good and honest man. Phocion replied againe, then let him give me leave to be that I feeme, and am whilest I live. The messengers wold not so leave him, but followed him home to his house, where they saw his great husbandry and thriftinesse. For they found his wife her self baking, and he himself drew water before them, out of the well to wash his feete. But then they were more earnestly in hand with him than before, and prayed him to take the kings present, and were offended with him, saying, it was a shame for Alexanders friend to line so miserably and beggarly, as he did. Then Phocion feeing a poore old man go by, in a thread bare gowne, asked them whether they thought him worse then her No, God forbid, answered they againe. Then replied he again, he lives with lesse then I do, and yet is contented, and hath inough. To be short, said he, if I should take this summe integrity in of money and occupy it not, it is as much as I had it not: on the other fide, if I occupy it, I shall make all the city speake ill of the king and me both. So this great present was sent back from A-THENS: whereby he showed the GRECIANS, that he was richer that needed not such gold and filuer, then be that gaue it him. But when Alexander wrote agains to Phocion, that he did not reckon them for his friends, that would take nothing of him, Phocion not with standing would not takethemony, but only requested him for his sake, that he would set these men at liberty which were kept prisoners in the city of SARDIS for certaine accusations layed against them: Echecratides the Rhetoritian', Athenodorus borne in the city of Imbros, and two Corinthians, Demaratus and Spartus. Alexander presently set them at liberty, & fent Craterus into MACEDON, commanding him to give Phecien the choise of one of these four cities of Asia which he liked best: Cios, Gergitha, Mylassis, Elea: fending him word, that he would be much more angrie with him now, if he did refuse his offer, than he was at the first. But Phoeion would neuer accept any one of them; and Alexander shortly after died. Phocions house is seene yet at this Phocions day in the village of MILITA, fet forth with plates of copper, but otherwise very meane, and hope and without curiofitie. For the wines he maried, there is no mention made of the first, saving that Cephifodotus the image grauer was her brother. But for his second wife she was no lesse famous at ATHENS, for her honesty and good huswifery, then Phoeion for his instice and equity. And for proofe therof, it is reported that the ATHENIAN's being one day affembled in the Theater, to fee new tragedies played, one of the players when he should have come vpon the scaffold to have played his part, asked the setter forth of the playes the apparell of a Queene, and certaine Ladies to waite vpon her, because he was to play the part of a Queene. The setter forth of the playes denying him, the player went away in a rage, and left the people staring one at another, and would not come out vpon the stage. But Melanthius the setter forth of the playes, compelling him, brought him by force on the stage, and cried out vnro him: Doest not thou see Phocions wife that goeth vp and downe the citie with one maide onely waiting vpon her? and wilt thou play the foole & marrethe modestie of the women of ATHENS? The people hearing his words, filled all the Theater with joy and clapping of hands. The fame Lady, when a certaine Gentlewoman of Ionia came at Athens to fee her, and shewed her all the rich iewels and precious stones she had, she answered her againe: All my riches and iewels, is my husband Phoeton. who these twentieyearestogether hath continually bin chosen Generall for the ATHENIANS. Phocions fonne telling his father on a time, that he was defirous to contend with other young photon Phomenforthe victory, who should cunningliest leape out, and get vp againe into the chariots companie or coaches, running full course at the feasts Panathenwa at Athens: his father was contented what he he should; not that he was defirous his sonne should have the honour of the victory, but because by this honest exercise he should grow to better maners, for that he was a dissolute young man, and much given to wine. Yet he wanthe victory at that time, and there were diverse of his fathers friends, that prayed him to do them that honour, that they might keepe the feast of this victory in their houses. Phocion denied them all but one man, and him he suffered to shew his good will vnto his house, and went thither himselfe to supper to him. Where amongst many fine and superfluous things prepared, he found passing bathes of wine and sweete smelling spices to wash the feete of the bidden guests as they came to the feast. Whereupon he called his sonne to him, and asked him, how canst thou abide Phocus, that our friend should thus disgrace the victory with excesse? But because he would withdraw his sonne from that licentious life, he brought him to Sparta, and placed him there among youg boyes brought vp after the Laco-NIAN discipline. The ATHENIANS were much offended at it, to see that Phocion did so much despise his owne countrey manners and fashions. Also when Demades the Orator one day said vnto Phocion: Why do we not persuade the Athenians to live after the Laconian maner: As for me, said he, if thou wilt make one to set it forward, I am ready to be if first man to move the matter: Indeed quoth Phocion, thou atta meete man to perswade the ATHENIAN'S to line LA-CONIAN like in common together at their meales, and to praise Lycurgus straight law, that are thy felfe commonly fo perfumed, and fine in thy apparell. Another time when Alexander wrote letters vito ATHENS to fend him fome thips, and the Orators perfeaded them not to grant him, the people called vpo Phocion chiefly to fay his opinion: then Phocion told them plainly, me thinks ye must either make your selues the strongest in wars, or being the weaker, procure to be friends vnto the stronger. Pithias a new come Orator, being full of tongue, & impudent, would still make one to speake in enery matter: wherefore Phocion said to him, Good gods, will this nouice neuer leave babling? And when Harpalus king Alexanders Lieutenant of the province of BABYLON, fled out of Asia, and came to Artica with a great summe of gold and filuer, straight these menthat sold their tongues to the people for money, slocked about him like a fight of swallowes. And he stuck not to give every one of them a peece of mony to baste them with: for it was a trifle to him, confidering the great fummes of money he brought. But to Phocion himselfe, he sent seuen hundred talents, and offered himselfe and all that he had into his hands of trust. But Phocion gaue him a sharpe answer, and told him that he would make Phocion dehim repent it, if he corrupted the city of ATHENS in that manner. So Harpalus being amazed /pifath Har-therewith, left him at that time, and went vnto them that had taken money of him. But shortly after, when the ATHENIAN'S fate in councell about him, he perceived that those which had taken his money were shrunke from him, and that they did accuse him, where they should have excused him, to bleare the world, that men should not suspect them they had bin corrupted; and that Phocion on the other fide which had refused his mony, having respect to the comonwealth. had also some regard to sauchis life the once more attempted all the waies he could to win him. Howbeit he found him so constant, that no money could cary the man. Then Harpalus falling in friendship with Chariles (Phocions sonne in law) he made him to be ill spoken of, and greatly fuspected, because men saw that he trusted him in all things, and imployed him in all his affaires: as in committing to his trust the making of a sumptuous tombe for Pythonice, the famous courtilan that was dead, whom he loued, and by whom he had a daughter: the taking vpon him wheref was no leffe fhame vnto Chariles, then the finishing theref was differed vnto him. This tombe is seene vnto this day in a place called Hermium, in the high way from ATHENS to E-LEVSIN the workmanship thereof being nothing like neare the charge of thirtie talents, which was reported to be given by Harpalus vnto Chariles, for the finishing of the same. Furthermore, after Harpalus death, Chariles and Phocion tooke his daughter, and carefully brought her vp. Afterwards also, Chariles being accused for the mony he had taken of Harpalus, he befought his father in law Phocion, to helpe to ease him in his judgement. But Phocion flutly denied him, and said: Chariles I took thee for my fonne in law, in all honest and just causes onely. Furthermore, when Asclepiades the son of Hipparchus, brought the first newes of the death of king Alexander, Demades the Orator would not beleeue him: for faid he, if it were true, all the earth would smell of militaring, the fauor of his corfe. Photion then perceiving the people began to be high minded, and fought innovation, he went about to bridle and pacifie them. But when many of the Orators got vp to the pulpit for Orations, and cried out, that Asclepiades newes was true of Alexanders death: well then quoth Phocion, if it be true to day, it shall be true also to morow, and the next day after. And therefore my mafters, be not too haftie, but thinke of it at better leifure, and fer your affaires at a fure stay. When Leostbenes also by his practise had brought the city of Athens into the warre called the Greekes war, and in forme asked Phocion that was offended at it, what good he had done vnto the commonwealth so many yeares together, as he had bin General over the Athe. NIANS: Phocion answered him, No small good said he, for all my country men have bene buried at home in their owne graues. Another time also, Leosthenes speaking proudly & insolently vnto the people, Photion one day had faid vnto him: Yong man my friend, thy words are like vnto the Cypreffe tree, which is high and great, but beareth no fruite. Then Hyperides rifing vp, afked Phocion: When wilt thou then counsell the Athenians to make warre? When Ishall fee yong men, faid he, notto forfake their rankes, rich men liberall, and Orators leauero rob the common-wealth. When the ATHENIAN's wondred to fee such a goodly great armie as Leosthenes had leavied, and that they asked Phocion how he liked it: It is a goodly armie, quoth he for a furlong, but I feare their returne, and the continuance of this warre: for I do not fee the citie able to make any more money, nor more ships, neither yet any more souldiers than these. The which proued true: as it fell out afterwards; for at the first, Leosthenes did many notable exploits. He ouercame the Bobotians in battell, and draue Antipater into the citic of Lamia: the which did put the Athenians in fuch a hope and iolicie, that they made continual feasts and facrifices through the citie, to thanke the gods for these good newes. And there were some among them, that totake Phecion in a trippe, asked him if he did not wish that he had done all those things? Yes indeede, answered he, I would I had done them, but yet I would not have given the counfell to have done them. Another time also when letters came daily, one after another, bringing good newes, Good gods, faid he, when shall we leave of to overcome? But when Leosthenes was dead in this voyage, they that feared Phocion should be appointed Captaine in his place, and that he would pacific the warre, did thrust in a man of meane behauiour, and vnknowne, that said in full asfembly of counfell, that he was Phocions friend, and schoole fellow, and therefore befought the people that they would spare Phocion, because they had not such another man as he, and that they would make Antiphilus Generall of the armie. The people were well contented withall. But then Phocion stood vp, and said, that this man was neuer scholer with him, neither did he ener know him before that time: but now faid he, from henceforth I will take thee for my friend, for thou hast given the people the best counsell for me. The people not. withstanding determining to make warre with the Bosotians, Photon spake against it all he could. Thereupon his friends bidding him beware of fuch speeches, how he did offend the people, lest they killed him, he answered them: They shall wrongfully put me to death, quoth he, speaking for the benefit of my countrey, but otherwise they shall have reason for to do it, if I speake to the contrary. But when he faw nothing would pacifie them, and that they went on fill with their intent, then he commanded the Herauld to proclaime by found of trumpet, that all citizens from foureteene yeares unto threefcore, able to carie weapon, should prefently upon the breaking vp of the assembly, arme themselves, and follow him with five dayes provision for victuals; then was there great stirre amongst them in the citie, and the old men came and complained vnto him, for his ouer ftraight commandement. He told them againe, I do you no wrong: for I am fourescore my selfe, and yet will go with you. By this meanes he pacified them at that time, and quenched their fond defire of warre. But when all the fea coast was full of fouldiers, both of the Macedonians, and other strangers which were led by Micion their captaine, that landed in the territorie of the village RHAMNYS, and spoiled the country thereabours, then Phocion led the ATHENIANS thither. But when he was there, divers taking vpon them the office of a Lieutenant, and going about to counsell him, some to lodge his campe upon such a hill, and others to fend his horsemen to such a place, and others to camp here: O Hercules quoth he, how many Captaines do I see, and how few fouldiers! Afterwards when he had set his footmen in battell ray, there was one among them that left his ranke, and stepped out before the all. Thereupon one of his enemies also made towards him to fight with him: but the ATHENI-Ans heart failed, and he went backe againe to his place. Then faid Phecian vnto him: Art thou not ashamed yong loutto have for saken thy ranke twife: the one, where thy Captaine had placed thee, and the other in the which thou haddeft placed thy felf: So Phocion gining charge upon the enemies, he ouerthrew them, and flue Micion their Captaine, and divers others. Furthermore, the army of the GRECIANS being at that time in THESSALY, wan the battel of Assigner, & Leo. matus that iouned with him, with VMACEDONIANS, which he had brought out of Asia: where Photios Leonatus was flaine in the field, Antiphilus being Generall of the footmen, and Menon THESSA- relonger FIAN Colonell of the horsemen. Shortly after Craterus coming out of Asia into Evrope with seedonians. a great armie, they fought a battell by the city of CRANON, where the GRECIANS were outer- The Greatthrowne: yet was not the ouerthrow nor flaughter great, although it came through the diffobe- answerdience of the fouldiers to their Captaines, which were but yong men, & vsed them ouer gently. Moreouer, when Antipater practifed to make the cities revolt, they betrayed them, and shamefully forfooke to defend their common liberty: whereupon Antipater marched forthwith with his armic, to the city of ATHENS. Demostheres and Hyperides vnderstanding that, for sooke the citie. Then Demades, that was in difgrace and defamed for lacke of payment of fuch fines as were fet vpon his head (being feuer all times condemned, because he had so many times moued matters contrary to the law,) and could not therefore be suffered any more to speake in § affembly, was then dispenced withall, and licensed to speake: whereupon he moued the people to send Ambassadors vnto Antipater, with full commission and authoritie to treate with him of peace. The people fearing to put to any mans trust this absolute authority to treate of peace, they called for Phocion, faying, that he onely was to be trusted with the Ambassade. Then Phocion answered them: if you had beleeued my former counsels I alwaies gaue you, such weightie matters should not now have troubled you at all. So the decree being coffrmed by the people, Phocion was fent Photion Ambassador vnto Antipater, that lay at the castell of Cadmea, being readie at that time to in- Ambassador wade the country of ATTICA. Phocion first requested him, that before he removed from thence, pages he would make peace with the ATHENIANS. Craterus presently answered him: Phocion thy request is vnreasonable, that lying here we should eate our our friends, and destroy their country, when we may liue of our enemies, and inrich our felues with their spoile. But Antipater taking Craterus by the hand, told him: we must needs do Phocion this pleasure. And for the rest, touching the capitulations of peace, he willed that the Athenians shold send them a blanke & refer the conditions of peace to them:like as himfelf being befreged in the city Lamia, had referred al capitulations & articles of peace, vnto the discretion of Leosthenes their Generall. So when Phocion was come back to Athens, the Athenians feeing there was no remedy, were copelled to be cotented with fuch offer of peace, as the enemy made them. Then Photion was fent back again to

Xenocrates Antipater.

Profaces of

Antipater at THEBES, with other Ambassadors iouned in commission with him: amongst whom also was that famous Philosopher, Xenocrates. The estimation of his vertue was so great with all men, that it was thought there was no liuing man so proud, crucl, disdainful, nor hasty of nature but that the only looke of Xenocrates would foften and qualifie him, and make him to reuerence him: but yet with Antipater it fell out contrarie, by his peruerse nature, which hated all vertue. for he embraced all the rest, and would not once salute Xenocrates. Whereupon some say, that Xenocrates said then, Antipater doth well to be ashamed, to see me a witnesse of the discourtefie and cuill he meaneth vnto the ATHENIANS. So when Xenocrates began to speake, Antipater would not abide to heare him, but interrupted him, and checked him, and in the end comman. ded him to hold his peace. When Phocion had spoken, Antipater answered them, that he would make peace with the ATHENIANS, fo they delivered him Demosthenes and Hyperides: that they should keepe their ancient lawes and gouernment, that they should receive a garrison into the hauen of Munychia, that they should defray the charges of this warre, and also pay a ransome besides. All the other Ambassadours but Xenocrates, willingly accepted these conditions of peace, as very reasonable and fauorable: but he faid, that for flaues Antipater did handle them fauourably, but for free men, he dealt too hardly with them. Then Phocion befought him that he would yet release them of their garrison. But Antipater (as it is said) anfwered him: Phocion, we would gladly grant thee any thing, fauing that which should vado thee, and vs both. Some other write notwithstanding, that Antipater said not so, but asked him if he would become furctic for the ATHENIANS, that they should attempt no alteration. but faithfully keepe the articles and conditions of this peace, if he did release them of this garrifon. Phocion then holding his peace, and delaying answer, there was one Callimedon firnamed Carobos (a bold man, and hated the liberty of the people) that brake forth in these words: If Phocion were fo fond to give his word for the ATHENIANS, wouldest thou Antipater beleeve him therefore, and leave to do that thou hast determined: Thus were the ATHENIANS driuento receiue the garrifon of the Macedonians, of the which Menyllus was Captaine, an honest man, and Phocions friend. This commandement to receive the garrison within the hauen of Munychia, was found verie stately, and done by Antipater rather of a vaine glory to boast of his power, then for any profit could otherwise come of it. For not long after, on that day when he tooke possession of the castell, he further increased their griefe; because the garrison entred the twentieth day of Boedromion (to wit, the moneth of August) on the which the feast day of their mysteries was celebrated, at what time they make their procession called Jacchus, from the citie of ATHENS, vnto ELEVSIN. Therefore the folemnitie of this holy feast being thus confused, many beganto consider, that in old time when their Realme did flourish, there were heard and feene voices and images of the gods on that day, which made the enemies both afraid and amazed; and now in contrary manner in the very selfe same solemnity of the gods, they saw the greatest calamitie that could have happened vnto GRECE. And the holiest feast which was kept all the yeare through before, became then to be prophaned with the title of the greatest misfortune and euent that euer happened vnto the GRECIANS, which was, the losse of their liberty. For, not many yeares before, there was brought an Oracle from Dodone vnto ATHENS: that they should looke well to the rockes of Diana, that strangers should not possesse them. And about that time also the couerings with the which they do adorne the holy beds of the mysteries, being wet with water, became from a purple colour which they had before, to looke yellow and pale, as if it had bene the couering of a dead body. Yea, and that which was most to be wondered at of all other, was this: that taking other coverings which were not holy, and putting them in the same water, they did without changing keepe their colour they had before. When one of the ministers of the temple also did wash a white pigge in the sea in a cleare place by the wharfe, there suddenly came a great fish that bit at it, and caried the hinder parts of the pigge cleane away with it. Whereby men coniectured that the gods did fignifie vnto them, that they should lose the lowest part of their citie, nearest vnto the sea, and should keepe the highest parts thereof. This not with standing, the garrison did not offend nor trouble the Athenians, because of the honestic of their Captaine Menyllus. Now there were abouetwelue thousand citizens, that for their pouerty lost the benefite of their freedome, of the which, part of them remained at ATHENS, vnto whom it seemed that they offered great wrong and iniurie: and part of them also went into THRACIA, where Antipater assigned them townes and lands to inhabite. They seemed to be men like vnto them, that had bene taken by affault, or by fiege within a citic, which had bene compelled to forfake their countrey. Furthermore, the shamefull death of Demosthenes in the He of CALAURIA, and of Hyperides by the citie of CLEONES, (whereof we have written heretofore) were almost occasion given them to lament the times of the reigne of king Philip and Alexander. As it is reported, that when Antigonus was flaine, they that had ouercome him, were fo cruell vnto their fubiects, that a labourer in the countrey of Phrygia digging the earth, being asked what he fought for, answered fighing: Isceke for Antigonus. Then many men began to say as much, when they remembred the noble mindes of those two Princes, how mercifull they were to pardon in their anger, forgetting their displeasure: not like vnto Antipater, who crastily cloaked his tyrannicall power, which he vsurped, by being familiar, going simply apparelled, and faring meanly, and yet shewed himfelfe notwithstanding a more cruell Lord and tyrant vnto them whom he had ouercome. Neuertheleffe, Phocion obtained of him the restoring againe of divers men, whom he had banished: and those whom he could not get to be restored, yet he procured that they should not be banished into so far countries, as others which had bene sent beyond the mountaincs Acrocerannians, and the head of Tanarus out of GRECE, but that they had libertie to remaine within the countrey of PELOPONNESUS: among the which was one Agnonides a Sycophant, and false accuser. Furthermore, he gouerned them that remained in ATHENS with great inflice and lenitie, and such as he knew to be good men and quiet, them he alwayes preferred to some office: but such as he saw were phantasticall people, and desirous of change, he kept them from office, and tooke all occasion from them, so that they vanished away of themselves, and learned in time to loue the countrey, and to follow tillage. When he saw Xe= recrates also pay a certaine pension or tribute to the common-wealth, which all strangers dwelling in ATHENS did vseyearely to pay, he would have made him a freeman, and offered to put his name amongst the number of the free citizens. But Xenocrates refused it, saying, he would have no part of that freedome, for the hinderance whereof he had bene fent Ambassa- Fliction dour. And when Menyllus had fent Phocion money, he made him answer, that Menyllus was Menyllus was Menyllus no greater Lord then Alexander had bene, neither had he at that time any greater occasion to gills. receiue his present, then when he had refused king Alexanders gift. Menyllus replying againe, faid, that if he had no need of it for himselse, yet he might let his sonne Phocus haue it. But Phocion answered: If my sonne Phocus will leaue his naughticlife, and become an honest man, that which I will leaue him shall serue his turne very well; but if it be so that he will still hold on the course he hath taken, there is no riches then that can suffice him. Another time also he answered Antipater more roundly, when he would have had him done an vnhonest thing: Antipater (said he) cannot have me to be his friend, and flatterer both. Antipater felfe was wont to fay, that he had two friends at ATHENS, Phocion and Demades: of the which he could never make the one to take any thing of him, and the other, he could neuer fatisfie. And truly Photions pouertie Photionlo. was a great glory vnto his vertue, firhence he was growne old, continuing in the same, after ued powerty. he had bene fo many times Generall of the ATHENIANS, and had received fuch friendship and courtefic of so many Kings and Princes. Where Demades to the contrary delighted to shew Theinso. his riches, in things that were contrary to the lawes of the city. For a decree being made at A- lenvie of THENS, commanding that no stranger, vpon forseiture of a thousand Drachmaes to be payed to the defraver of the degrees of the civil. Should be consequently the orater. to the defrayer of the daunces of the citie, should be any of the dauncers that daunced at any common playes or sports: Demades one day making certaine games and sports at his owne charges, brought a hundred dancers of strangers at one time, & with all brought also a hundred thoufand Drachmaes to pay the forfeiture thereof. Another time when he maried his fon Demas, he faid vnto him: Son, when I maried thy mother, there was so small rost, that my next neighbour knew not of it; where now at thy mariage, Kings and Princes are at the charge of the feast. Furthermore when the ATHENIANS were importunate with Phocion to go vnto Antipater, to intreate him to take his garrison out of their citie, he still refused the ambassade, either because he had no hope to obtaine it, or for that he saw the people more obedient vnto reason, for feare of the garrison. Howbeit he obtained of Antipater, thathe should not be too hastie in the demanding of his money, but should deferre it vitill a further time. So the ATHENIANS perceiuing they could do no good with Phocion, they intreated Demades, who willingly tooke the matter vpon him, and went with his sonne into Macedon; whither doubtlesse his destinie caried him to his viter destruction, even at that very time when Antipater was fallen sick of a difease whereof he died; whereby the affaires of the Realme went through the hands of Cassander his fonne, who had intercepted a letter of this Demades, which he had fent vnto Antigonus in Asia, willing him to come in all possible speed to winne GRECE and MACEDON, which hung but of an old rotten threed, mocking Antipater in this maner. Wherefore Callander being advertifed of his arrivall, he made him prefently to be apprehended; and fetting his fonne hard by him, flue him before his father, so neare him, that the bloud of his sonne sprang ypon him, so that the father was all bloudied with the murder of his fonne. Then Cassander casting in Demades teeth his ingratitude, and treacherous treason against his father, giving him all the reprochfull words he could deuife, at the length he flue him with his owne hands. Now Antipater before his death had established Polyperchon Generall of the armie of the MACEDONIANS, and Cassander his son only Colonell of a thousand footmen. He notwithstanding, after his fathers decease, taking vp. on him the gouernement of the realme, fent Nicanor with speed to succeed Menillus in the Captainship of the garrison of Athens, before his death should be renealed, commanding him first in any case to take the castell of MVNYCHIA, which he did. Shortly after, the ATHENIANS vnderstanding of the death of Antipater, they accused Photion, for that he had knowne of his death long before, and yet kept it fecret to please Nicanor. But Phocion regarded not his accusation, but fell in acquaintance notwithstanding with Nicanor; whom he handled so wisely, that he made him not only friendly vnto the ATHENTANS, but furthermore perswaded him to beat fome charge to give the people the pastime of common playes, which he made to be done at his cost. In the meane time, Polyperchon, who had the gouernment of the kings person, meaning to gine Caffander a flampant and blurt, he fent letters patents vnto the people at ATHENS, declaring how the young king did restore vnto them their popular state againe, and commanded that all the ATHENIANS should vie their former ancient lawes of their citie. This was a wile and crafty fetch against Phocion. For Polyperchon denising this practife to get the city of Athens into his hands (as it fell out afterwards by proofe) had no hope to obtaine his purpose, vnlesse he found meanes first to banish Phocion and thought that he should easily bring that to passe, when fuch as had before bin put offtheir freedom by his meanes, should come againe to have voices in the affembly, and that the feditious Orators and accusers might be turned at liberty again, to say what they would. The ATHENIAN'S having heard the contents of these letters patents, began to be somewhat quickened and moued withall: whereupon Nicanor desiring to speake with the ATHENIANS in their Senate, which was affembled in the hauen of PIR ÆA, he went and hazarded his person amongst them, vpon Phicions faith and word. Dercyllus Captaine for the king, being secretly aduertised therof, and in the field, not farre from the city, did what he could to take Nicanor: but Nicanor having warning of it in time, faued himfelfe. Then it appeared that Nicanor would prefently be reuenged of the citie, and they accused Phocion because he kept him not. but did let him go. Whereunto he answered, That he trusted Nicanors word, and that he did not think he would offer the city any hurt; but if it should fal out otherwise, he had rather the world should know, that he had no wrong offered him, then that he should offer any. This truly appeared to be nobly spoken, in respect of himselfe: but considering that he being then Generall, did thereby hazard the fafetie of his countrey, I cannot tell whether he did not breake a greater faith which he ought to haue had to the fafety of his countrimen. Neither could he also alleadge for his excuse, that he did not lay hands on Nicanor, for feare to bring the city into manifest war: but that for a colour hedid preferre the faith which he had fworne and promifed vnto him, and the iustice that he would observe in his behalfe, that for his sake, Nicanor should afterwards keep himselfe in peace, and do no hurt to the ATHENIANS. Howbeit in truth it seemed, that nothing deceived Phocion, but the over trust the had in this Nicanor. The which seemeth to be so, because when divers came to him to complaine of Nicanor, that he fought all the secret meanes he could to surprise the hauen of PIR AA, and that he daily passed ouer souldiers in the Ile of SALA. MINA, and practifed to bribe certain of the inhabitants within the precinct of the hauen, he wold neuer heare of it, and much leffe beleeue it. Furthermore, when Philomedes LAMERIAN made a motion, that the Athenians should prepare to be in readinesse to waite upon their Captaine Phocion, to do as he commanded them; he made no account of it, vntill he faw Nicanor come out with his fouldiers from the fort of MVNYCHIA, & that he began to cast trenches to compasse in the hauen of Pir MA. But then, when Photion thought to leade out the people to preuent him, he found they mutined against him, and no man would obey his commandement. In the meane time Alexander the fon of Polyperchen came with an army, pretending to aide them of the citie against Nicanor, where indeed he meant (if he could) to get the rest of the citie into his hands, the journe of then especially, when they were in greatest broile one against another; & the rather, because the Polyperthon banished men entred hand over head with him, and divers strangers also, & other desamed men: fo that there was a confused councell & affembly of Omnigatherum kept within the citie, without any order; in the which Phocion was deprined of his office of Generall, and others were also chosen Captaines in his place. And had they not seene this Alexander talking alone with Nicanor, and returning many times hard to the wals of the citie, which made the ATHENIANS afraid and mistrustfull, they had neuer faued it from taking. At that time Phocion was presently accused of treason by the Oratour Agnonides: the which Callimedon and Perioles fearing, got them out of the citic betimes. And Phocton also with his friends that were not fled, went vnto Polyperchon: reason. with whom also Solon Plat Elan and Dinarchus Corinthian went for companie, who thought to have found friendship and familiaritie with Polyperchon. Howbeit Dinarchus falling fick by the way in the city of ELATIA, they flayed there many daies, hoping of his recovery. But in the meane time, the people at the persuasion of the Orator Agnonides, & at the request of Archeftratus, stablished a decree, to fend Ambassadors vnto Polyperchon, to accuse Phocion: infomuch as both parties met at one felfe time, and found him in the field with the king about a village of the country of Phocide, called Pharyges, standing at the foote of the mountaine Acrorion, which they firname also Galaten. There Polyperchon commanded a cloth of gold to be set up, and caused the king to be set under the same, and all his chiefest friends about him. But to begin withall, he made Dinarchus to be taken, and commanded them to put him to death after they had racked him; then he willed the Athenians totell what they had to fay. Then they began to phyperdon quarrell, and to be loud one with another, accusing one another in the presence of the king and aid pus Dihis councell, vntill Agnonides at length ftepped foorth, and faid: My Lords of Mac EDON, death put viall in prison, and then send vs bound hands and feete to ATHENS, to give account of our doings. The king laughed to heare him fay fo. But the Noblemen of MACEDON that were prefent then, and divers strangers besides to heare their complaints, made signe to the Ambassadours to veter their accusations before the king, rather then to referre them to the hearing of the people at ATHENS. Howbeit both parties had not alike indifferent hearing: for Polyperchon checked vp Phocion oftentimes, and did ftill cut off his tale as he thought to purge himfelf; infomuch as in anger he beate his staffe he had in his hand against the ground, and commanded him at length to hold his peace, and to get him thence, And when Hegemon also told Polyperchon, that he himselfe could best witnesse, how Phocion had alwaies faithfully served and loved the people, he angrily answered him: Come not hither to lie falfly vpon me in the presence of the king. There-With the king rose out of his seate, and took a speare in his hand, thinking to have killed Hegemon had not Polyper chan fodainly embraced him behind, and staid him. So the councell rose, & brake vp, but prefently Phocion was apprehended, and they that flood by him. Certaine of his friends feeing that, which stood further off, muffled their faces, and straight conveyed themselves away. The rest were sent prisoners to ATHENS by Clieus, not so much to have their causes heard there, Photosis as to have them executed for condemned men. Furthermore, the manner of the carrying of featprifethem to ATHENS was shamefull. For they were caried vpon carts through the great streete merio A. Ceramicum vnto the Theater, where Clitus kept them vntill the Senate had affembled the toodamed, people, excepting no bondman, no stranger, nor defamed person out of this assembly, but left the Theater wide open to all commers in what focuer they were, and the pulpit for Orations free for enery manthat would speake against him. So first of all, the kings letters were read openly, by the which he did aductife the people, that he had found these offenders connicted of treason notwithstanding, that he referred the sentence of their condemnation vnto them, for that they were freemen. Then Clitus brought his prisoners before the people, where the noblemen when they faw Phocion, were ashuned, and hiding their faces, wept to see him. Howbeir, there was one that rose vp, and said: My Lords, sith the king referreth the judgement of so great persons vnto the people, it were great reason all the bondmen and strangers which are no free citizens of ATHENS, should be taken out of this affembly. The people would not agree to it, The fury of but cried out, that fuch traitors should be stoned to death that fauour the authoritie of a few, the athenia and are enemies of the people; whereupon filence was made, and no man durft speake any more Photographe for Phocion. Neuertheleffe when Phocion with much ado had obtained audience, he asked them: My Lords, will ye iustly or wrongfully put vs to death? Some answered him, justly. How then can you do it, quoth he, that will not heare our inftification? Yet could they not be heard for all this. Then Phocion comming nearer, faid vnto them: For my felfe, my Lords, I confesse I have done you wrong, and have in gouernment committed faults deferuing death; but for thefe prifoners with me, what haue they done why you should put them to death? The common people answered him, Because they are thy friends. With this answer Phocion departed, and spake never a word more. Then the Orator Agnonides holding a decree in his hand ready written, read iropenly to the people, declaring how they should be judged by voices, whether the offendors had deserved death or not; and if it were found they had, then that they should all be put to death, And there were that when this decree was read, cried out, that they should adde further vnto the decree, that before Phocion should be put to death, they should first torment him: and therewithall commandement was given that the wheele should be set up to breake his joynts upon it, and also that the hangman should be sent for. But then Agnonides perceiving that Clitus was offended with it, and thinking befides it were too beaftly & barbarous a part to vie him in that fort. he faid openly: My Lords, when you shall have such a variet in your hands as Callimedon. then you may cast him on the wheele, but against Phocion, I would not wish such crueltie. Then rose vp a Nobleman among them, and added to his words: Thou hast reason to say so, Agrania des, for if Phocion should be laid on the wheele, what should we then do with thee? The decree being confirmed according to the contents thereof, judgement was given by voyces of the people, no man fitting, but all standing vp, and most of them with garlands on their heads, for the ioy they had to condemne these prisoners to death. With Photion there were condemned Ricocles, Thudippus, Hegemon, and Pithocles: but Demetrius PHALERIAN, Callimedon and Charicles were also in their absence condemned to die. Now when the affembly was broken vp, and that the persons condemned were caried backe to prison, from thence to be conneyed to execution othersembracing their friends, and taking their last leaue of them as they went, wept, & lamented their curfed fortune. But Phocion looking as chearfully of it as he was wont to do being Generall, when they honourably waited on him to his house from the affembly, he made many of them pity him in their hearts to confider his constancie and noble courage. On the other sidealfo, there were many of his enemies that came as neare vnto him as they could, to reuilehim, amongst whom there was one that stepped before him, & did spit in his face. Then Phocion turning him vnto the Magistrates, said: Will ye not cause this impudent fellow to leave his railing? When they were in prison, Thudippus seeing the hemlocke which they brayed in a mortar to giuethem drinke, he began desperatly to curse and ban, faying, that they wrongfully put him to death with Phocion. Why, faid Phocion againe, and doeft thou not rather rejoyce to die with me. When one that flood by, asked Phocion if he would any thing to his fon Phocios. Yes, quoth he, that I will: bid him neuer reuenge the wrong the ATHENIANS do me. Then Nicocles one of Phocions dearest friends, prayed him to let him drinke the poyson before him. Phocion answered him, Thy request is grieuous to me, Nicocles: but because I gener denied thee any thing in my life, I will also grant thee this at my death. When all the rest had drunke, there was no more poifon left, and the hangman faid he would make no more, vnleffe they gaue him twelue Drachmacs, for fo much the pound did cost him: Phocion perceiuing then that the hangman delayed time, he called one of his friends vnto him, and prayed him to give the hangman that litle money he demanded, fith a man cannot die at ATHEN's for nothing, without coft. It was the nineteenth day of the moneth of Munichion, (to wit, March) on which day the knights were wont to make a folemne procession in the honour of Iupiter: how beit some of them left off the garlands of flowers which they should have worne on their heads, and others also looking towards the prison doore as they went by, burst out a weeping. For they whose hearts were not altogether heardened with crueltie, and whose judgements were not wholly suppressed with entite, thought it a gricuous facriledge against the gods, that they did not let that day passe, but that they did defile fo folemne a feast with the violent death of a man. His enemies not with standing, continuing still their anger against him, made the people passe a decree, that his bodie should be banished, and caried out of the bounds of the country of Arrica, forbidding the Africaians that no fire should be made for the solemnizing of his funerals. For this respect no friend of his did once touch his bodie. Howbeit a poore man called Conepion, that was wont to get his living that way, being hired for money to burne mens bodies, he tooke his corfe, and caried it beyond the city of ELEVSIN; and getting fire out of a womans house of MEGARA, he solemnized his Photoni funerals. Furthermore, there was a gentlewoman of Magara, who coming by chance that funtrall. way, with her gentlewoman, where his body was but newly burnt, the caused the earth to be east vpa litle wherethe body was burnt, and made it like to a hollow tombe, whereupon she did vie fuch sprinklings and effusions, as are commonly done at the funerals of the dead: and then taking up his bones in her lappe in the night, she brought them home, and buried them in her harth, faying: O deare harth, to thee I bequeath the reliques of this noble and good man, and pray thee to keepe them faithfully, to bring him one day to the graue of his ancestors, when the ATHENIANS shall come to confesse the fault and wrong they have done vnto him. And truly it was not long after, that the ATHENIANS found by the vntowardnesse of their affaires, that they had put him to death, who only maintained iustice and honesty at ATHENS. Whereupon they made his image to be fet up in braffe, and gaue honourable buriall to his bones, at the charges of the citie. And for his accusers, they condemned Aenonides of treason, and put him to death themselues. The other two, Epicurus and Demophilus being fled out of the citie, were afterwards met with by his sonne Phocus, who was reuenged of them. This Phocus, as men report, was otherwise no great good man, who fancying a yong maide, which a bawd kept, comming by chance one day into the schoole of Lycaum, he heard Theodorus the Atheist (to wit, that beleeved not there were any gods) make this argument: If it be no shame, said he, to deliver a mans friend from bondage, no more shame is it to redeeme his lemman which he loueth; euen fo it is all one to redeeme a mans lemman, as his friend. This yong man taking this argument to ferue his turne, belieuing that he might lawfully do it, got the young maid he loued from the bawd. Furthermore, this death of Phocion did also reviue the lamentable death of Socrates vnto the GRECT ANS: for menthought that was a like hainous offence, and calamity vnto the citie of ATHENS.

Carnes

He family and house of Cato tooke his first glorie and name of his great grandfather, Cato the Cenfor who for his vertue (as we have declared in his life) was one of the famousest and worthiest men of Rome in his time. This Cate whom we now write of, was left an orphan by his father and mother, with his brother Capio, and Porcia his fifter. Servilia was also Catoes halfe sister by his mothers side. All these were brought vp with their Vncle Linius Drusus, at that time the greatest man of the citie: for hewas passing eloquent, and very honest, and of as great a courage besides, as any other ROMAINE. Men report, that Cato from his childhood shewed himselfe both in word and countenance, and also in all his pastimes and recreations, very conftant and stable. For he would gothrough with that he tooke vpon him to do, and would force himselfe aboue his strength; and as he could not away with slatterers, so was he rough with them that went about to threaten him. He would hardly laugh; and yet had euer a pleasant countenance. He was not cholericke, nor easie to be angered, but when the bloud was vp he was hardly pacified. When he was first put to schoole, he was very dull of vnderstanding and flow to learne; but when he had once learned it, he would neuer forget it, as all men elfe comonly do. For fuch as are quicke of conceipt, have commonly the worst memories: and contrarily, they that are hard to learne, do keep that better which they have learned. For every kind of learning is a motion and quickening of the mind. He seemed besides not to be light of credit,& that may be some cause of his slownesse in conceipt. For truly he suffereth somewhat that learneth, and thereof it commeth that they that have least reason to resist, a rethose which do give lightest credit. For yong men are easilier perswaded then old men, and the sicke then the whole. And where a man hath least reason for his doubts, there he is soonest brought to beleeue any thing. This notwithstanding, it is reported, that Cato was obedient vnto his schoolemaster, and would do what he commanded him: howbeit he would aske him still the cause and reason of enery thing. Indeed his schoolemaster was very gentle, and readier to teach him, then to strike him with his fift. His name was Sarpedo. Furthermore, when Cato was but a young boy, the people of ITALY which were confederates of the ROMAINES, fixed to be made free citizens of ROME. At that time it chanced one Pompedius Silo, a valiant fouldier, and of great estimation among the confederates of the Romaines, and a great friend besides of Drusus, to be lodged many dayes at his house. He in this time falling acquainted with these yong boyes, said one day vnto the Good boyes, intreat your vncle to speake for vs, that we may be made free citizens of very wisely vpon the strangers that lay in the house. Then Pompedius taking him aside, asked him:

And thou, my pretie boy, what fayeft thou to it? Wilt thou not pray thine vncle as well as thy armes, did put him out of the window, as if he would have let him have gone and speaking more sharply to him then he did before, he cast him many times out of his armes without the window, and faid, Promise vs then, or else I will let thee fall. But Cato abid it a long time, and neuer of his birth, had many yong boyes to supper, and amongst others this Cato. The boyes to occupie themselues till supper was readie, gathered themselues together great & smal, into some priuate place of the house. Their play was counterfeiting pleadings before the Iudges, accusing one another, & carying them that were condemned to prison. Amongst them a goodly young boy was caried by a bigger boy into a litle chamber, bound and a condemned person. The boy perceining he was locked vp, cried out vnto Cato: who mistrusting what it was, went straight to the chamber dore, & putting them by by forcethat withflood him to come vnto it, he took out the yong boy, and caned him very angerly with him to his own house, and all the other yong boies followed him alfo. So Cato had such name among the young boyes, that when Sylla made the game of yong boyes running on horsebacke, which the Romaines call Troia; to appoint them before that they might be readieat the day of the shew, he having gotten all the yong boyes of noble houses together, appointed them two Captaines. Of them, the boyes tooke the one, because of his mother Meiella, which was the wife of sylla: but they would none of the other called

Sextus, who was nephew to Pompey the Great, neither would they be exercised vnder him, nor follow him. Wherefore sylla asked them, which of them they would haue: they all cried then, did commonly bring Cato vnto Syllaes house, to wait vpon him the which was rather like vnto a iayle or prison, for the great number of prisoners which were daily brought thither, and put to death. Cato being then but fourteene yeares of age, and perceiuing that there were many heads brought which were said to be of great men, and that every body sighed & mourned to see the,

he asked his schoolemaster, how it was possible the tyrant scaped, that some one or other killed fire with choler he maruelled much at it, and afterwards had a verie good eye vnto him, lest rashly he should attempt something against squa. When he was but a little boy, some asked him also, he then confirmed the loue he bare to his brother in his deeds. For twenty yeares together he neuer supped without his brother Capio, neither went he euer out of his house into y market place, nor into the fields without him: but when his brother did annoint himself with sweet oiles of perfume, he would none of that, and in all things else, he led a streight and hard life. So that his brother C. epio being commended of euery man for his temperance, honestie, and sober life, he granted indeed that in respect of others, he led a sober and temperate like: but when I do (faid he) compare my life with my brother Catoes, me thinks then there is no difference betwist me and Scippius. This Scippius was at that time noted and pointed at, for his fine and curious effeminate life. After that Cato was once chosen Apolloes Priest, he went from his brother, and tooke his portion of the goods of his father, which amounted to the summe of an hundred and twentie talents. Then he fined more hardly then he did before. For he fell in acquaintance brother, to be good to his guests: Cato still held his peace and answered nothing, but shewed by his filence and looke, that he would not heare their request. Then Pompedius taking him vp in his quinched for it, nor shewed countenance of feare. Thereupon Pompedius setting him downe again, told his friends that stood by him: O what good hap doth this child promise one day vnto fante of again, total in strengs that Hood by Intil. What good hap ded not have one voice of all the peo-pleon our fide. Another time there were some of Catoes neare kinsmen, that keeping y feast day sold.

Cato, and Sextus himself did willingly give him the honor, as the worthier of both. Sylla was their syllaes love fathers friend, and therefore did fend for them many times to come vnro him, & he would talke with them: the which kindnesse he shewed to few men, for the maiesty and great authority he had. Sarpedo also (Catoes schoolemaster) thinking it a great preferment & safety for his scholers, him not? Because, quoth Sarpedo, that all men feare him more then they hate him. Why then, replied Cato againe, didst thou not giue me a sword that I might kill him, to deliuer my countrey of being a boy pned Cato againe, didit thou not give the a two fauther this flauish bondage? Sarpedo hearing the boy say so, and seeing his countenance and eyes on syrant.

whom he loued best? My brother, said he. Then the other continuing still to aske him and who next he answered likewise his brother. Then the third time againe, likewise his brother. Till at length he that asked him, was wearie with asking him fo oft. Yea and when he was come of age ther.
